Mr. WEBB. No; a preponderance of evidence suffices in a civil action. Guilt beyond a reasonable doubt must be shown in criminal actions.

Mr. BATHRICK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. Yes.

Mr. BATHRICK. Does not the gentleman think that the process against a trust or combination by injunction is a weakness because of the necessity of the plaintiff giving a bond? If the plaintiff applies to the court for an injunction, the size of the bond will be determined by the court on a temporary injunction, and the defendant or the person accused can come into court and perhaps show that the damages will be very large, and the bond should be large enough to cover all possible damages in case the injunction should be decided against the plaintiff. Thus he could run the defendant out of court by the size of the bond. There is the weakness of the injunction remedy, as it seems to me. I would like to get the gentleman's opinion on it.

Mr. WEBB. The size of the bond is within the discretion of the court. The gentleman would not give everybody the right to go into court and ask for an injunction without some bond covering the possible damage.

Mr. BATHRICK. The gentleman from North Carolina is familiar enough with the practice to know that plaintiffs are often deterred from applying for injunctions because of the necessity of putting up a bond. That is the weakness of the process.

Mr. WEBB. My friend knows that a bond in individual cases could not under the court's ruling be very large, because it would apply only to the individual's damage, and would not be like an injunction stopping the whole business of the defendant in all sections and States. It would be only in reference to a particular locality, and the damages could not be very great.

Mr. BATHRICK. Oh, yes; but the defendants would come in and try to show that the damages were going to be very large and that they required a very large bond.

Mr. WEBB. Then that is a weakness of our whole judicial system. A sensible judge can adjust that trouble. But a man that alleges a thing must prove it.

Mr. BATHRICK. As compared with a threatened term in jail or a fine under a criminal prosecution, the injunctive process is very weak, in my opinion.

Mr. WEBB. Well, that is the gentleman's opinion, and there are other men who agree with him.

Mr. BARTLETT. If the gentleman from North Carolina will pardon me, I call attention to the fact that the bond is only conditioned on the ground that the injunction was improvidently granted.

Mr. WEBB. Exactly.

Mr. RUSSELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. Certainly.

Mr. RUSSELL. I understand the proceeding by injunction for relief of the parties damaged is not the only remedy.

Mr. WEBB. Oh, no; it is only one of five different remedies.

Mr. RUSSELL. They have the right to sue for damages or for treble damages without any injunction proceeding at all.

Mr. WEBB. Certainly; the remedies are cumulative. The remedies pile up, and all of the remedies are open to the individual and to the Government in a suit.

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. I will.

Mr. HARDY. Under the bill does the Government have the authority to bring suit for injunction as well as private parties?

Mr. WEBB. Yes. Section 15 gives the district attorneys under the direction of the Attorney General the right to apply for an injunction.

Mr. HARDY. And when that is done there is no bond required.

Mr. WEBB. Not at all.

Mr. HARDY. In our State the statute authorized the district attorneys to bring injunction suits against the houses that I have spoken of, and the result is that the process brought by the district attorneys has closed up the places.

Mr. WEBB. Yes; this bill is as strong in civil remedies as a bill can be made, in my opinion.

Now let us pass to section 6, which refers to the "conclusiveness" or "prima facie" effect of judgments in Government suits against the trusts. As the House passed the section we made such judgment "conclusive." The Senate struck out the word "conclusive" and inserted "prima facie." Personally, I think the Senate did the best thing by making it "prima facie." I doubt whether the courts would have held that the "conclusive" provision was constitutional. On the other hand, I believe that the "prima facie" effect of the judgment is as powerful before a jury as if you had said that it was "conclusive." A great many lawyers, and some of the best ones in the Government service, think that a provision making the judgment conclusive would have rendered the bill unconstitutional, but with the "prima facie" provision it is constitutional and will be as effective as if we had left it "conclusive."

It is further provided in that section that the "prima facie" effect shall not apply to consent judgments that are taken before any evidence is introduced. There has been some criticism of this provision. For the life of me, I can not see the justice of the criticism. If the Government brings a suit against a trust or monopoly and it surrenders, we eliminate the effect of the "prima facie" judgment. If it fights and loses, then the "prima facie" effect is given final judgment in the suit.

Mr. SELDOMRIDGE. What section is that?

Mr. WEBB. Section 5 of the bill now before the House; old section 6 in the House bill.

Mr. BATHRICK. That means, in one analysis at least, that if a trust, having pursued unfair methods of competition, having crushed out its small competitors, and at last having gotten into the meshes of the law, desires to walk up, with the loot in its pocket, and say it pleads guilty, it avoids all use of the testimony taken in the Government action against it on the part of a private plaintiff who desires to recover damages.

Mr. WEBB. No; a consent judgment has the same effect that it would have had if the trust had fought out the case, but such judgment does not have a "prima facie" effect when used in evidence.

Mr. BATHRICK. If he consents to judgment.

Mr. WEBB. That is right. I want to say to the gentleman that we went over that with the Attorney General of the United States and a great many men who are just as much interested in the execution of the trust laws as is the gentleman. One attorney and a stenographer settled the celebrated New Haven case, whereas if we had given this prima facie effect to that judgment the Government would have been fighting now, and possibly for years, and it would have cost the Government millions of dollars to bring them to their knees, for they would not have "consented" to such a judgment. The Government does not bring these suits for the purpose of giving a private individual the right to sue or to help a private individual. The Government brings these suits for and on behalf of the whole people and in an effort to stop further monopoly and restraint of trade, for the benefit of all.

Mr. Speaker, in our old section 7, section 6 of the conference report, known as the labor section, the Senate inserted these words:

> The labor of a human being is not a commodity or article of commerce.

Of course that is a mere legislative declaration or postulate. I do not think it does any harm. I do not know that it does any good. Your conferees agreed to let it remain. The Senate struck out in that section the words "consumers," "orders," "or associations," and made the section apply, therefore, to labor, agricultural, or horticultural organizations, and struck out fraternal and consumers' organizations, and your conferees agreed to that.

In section 8 of the House bill, section 7 of the new bill, the holding-company section, we had a provision in this language: "Where the effect of such acquisition is to eliminate or substantially lessen competition."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, before the gentleman goes to that section, will he yield for a question?

Mr. WEBB. Certainly.

Mr. STAFFORD. Did not the conferees accept a very important amendment of the Senate the absence of which was the cause of a noted discussion in the papers between former Attorney General Wickersham and Mr. Untermyer—that as to this labor section as it passed the House, though the organization had been forbidden to do anything but carry out its legitimate objects, nevertheless, as the Attorney General claimed, they were permitted to indulge in unlawful practices, and the Senate incorporated the word "lawfully," so as to read, "lawfully carrying out the legitimate objects thereof," so as to overcome the objections pointed out by former Attorney General Wickersham?

Mr. WEBB. I do not know what moved the Senate to put that word in. We had no objection to it, and hence accepted the amendment.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman did not refer to it, and I regard it as a rather potent amendment.

Mr. WEBB. No; I did not refer to it, but the omission was not intentional. I do not think it affects the section one way or the other. I think it is put in simply to ease some people's conscience, and that is all. I do not think it gives any more or any less effect to this section as we passed it. We agreed to it. Of course, as I suggested, they could only carry out "legitimate" objects of the organization in a "lawful" manner, but we had no objection to putting in the word "lawfully."

Mr. SWITZER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. Yes.

Mr. SWITZER. Will the gentleman please state in more detail what the effect of this section would be?

Mr. WEBB. I can not now take the time to do that. I discussed that when the bill passed the House. The meaning of the section has not been affected at all, except that we have eliminated "consumers" and "fraternal" organizations from it.

Mr. Speaker, in reference to section 7 of the conference bill, being section 8 of the House bill, the holding-company provision, we had in that section the words "where the effect of such acquisition is to eliminate or substantially lessen competition." The Senate struck out the word "eliminate" and inserted the words "may be," so that it would read "where the effect of such acquisition may be to substantially lessen competition," and your conferees agreed to it, and also agreed to insert the words "or to restrain such commerce in any section or community," and to strike out the words "trade in any section or community," so that it will read as follows:

SEC. 7. That no corporation engaged in commerce shall acquire, directly or indirectly, the whole or any part of the stock or other share capital of another corporation engaged also in commerce where the effect of such acquisition may be to substantially lessen competition between the corporation whose stock is so acquired and the corporation making the acquisition, or to restrain such commerce in any section or community, or tend to create a monopoly of any line of commerce.

That is the effect of the amendment to this section. There is nothing material with reference to the remainder of that section.

We now come to the old House section 9, being section 8 of the bill as reported by the conferees. As I stated a while ago, the Senate struck out the language with reference to interlocking directorates of banks and added language with reference to the interlocking directorates of railroads and supply houses, leaving in interlocking directorates of industrial institutions. The Senate agreed to put back our provision as to banks with an amendment to this effect: That instead of having a two-and-a-half-million-dollar limitation, we increase the limitation to $5,000,000, and instead of having the limitation apply to cities of 100,000 population or over, we make it apply to cities of 200,000 population or over. There are only 28 cities in the United States that have more than 200,000 population, and only 270 banks that have more than $5,000,000 in capital, surplus, deposits, and undivided profits. The judgment of every Member of the House, I think, agrees upon the idea that there should not be this widespread interlocking directorates in these big banks, and we have undertaken to make the best provision possible under the difficult circumstances.

There are Members and Senators who object to this provision. They want no interlocking directorates of banks prohibited whatever; but we thought that a man who was a director of a bank with $5,000,000 capital, deposits, and surplus was sufficiently engaged in looking after its funds, and his hands were fairly well filled. Now, in reference to railroad interlocking directorates and supply houses, the Senate offered a substitute for it and we agreed to it. It is not as rigid as our section, but we believe it is as effective, if not more effective. We simply prohibited interlocking directorates. The Senate provision went some distance in that direction and the conferees worked out a final substitute for it which prohibits transactions between a supply house and a railroad which has a common director if the amount of the transactions exceed $50,000 in any one year. If it exceeds that, then the railroad must buy by competitive bidding and buy for the best interest of the common carrier, and each bidder's name must be given, and then the names of all bids and addresses of the persons making bids shall be transferred to the Interstate Commerce Commission. They shall enforce that provision under such rules and regulations as they may make. We believe that we have a section which will bring more material advantage than possibly this original section would.

Mr. LEVY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. Yes; for a question.

Mr. LEVY. Has the gentleman taken into consideration that the Interstate Commerce Commission has so much business before it now that they can not attend to it?

Mr. WEBB. Yes; we have taken that into consideration.

Mr. LEVY. It will take a year for them to render a decision. Why not refer it to some other commission?

Mr. WEBB. We will give them liberal opportunity in——

Mr. LEVY. There are five commissioners who are perfectly incompetent, and they have brought the greatest railroad system of this country into great financial stress. Does the gentleman want still to give them more power?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Which five? Will the gentleman name them?

Mr. LEVY. Mr. Daniels and the gentleman from Kentucky have voted fairly, but the other five——

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I refuse to yield further on this subject.

Mr. BARTLETT. Is it not a fact that the railroad managers have about brought the stockholders to bankruptcy?

Mr. LEVY. It is fortunate the railroads are not all bankrupt.

Mr. BATHRICK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. Yes.

Mr. BATHRICK. I simply ask for information——

Mr. WEBB. I will be glad to give to my friend anything I have in the way of information.

Mr. BATHRICK. Do I understand the gentleman had embodied in some part of the bill—my attention was distracted at the moment from his statement—that he has embodied in some part of the bill a provision including the first paragraph of section 9 substantially?

Mr. WEBB. Yes, sir; and I think it is an effective section, too.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. BEALL of Texas). But the gentleman from North Carolina has the floor.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I make the point there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from North Carolina yield to the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. WEBB. I would rather not; I am about to conclude.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, have I not the right to make the point of no quorum without the gentleman yielding for the purpose? Have I not the right to ask for a quorum?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from North Carolina has the floor.

Mr. HENRY. Have I not the right to have a quorum present in order to transact business?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair does not think the gentleman from Texas can take the gentleman from North Carolina off the floor.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I would like to be heard on the point of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from North Carolina has the floor and has not yielded.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I was about to take up section 17——

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from North Carolina has the floor and has not yielded.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from North Carolina has the floor.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from North Carolina has the floor, and no gentleman can be recognized until he yields. [Applause.]

Mr. HENRY. Does the Chair make that as a formal ruling?

Mr. COOPER. Regular order!

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair rules that the gentleman from North Carolina has the floor.

Mr. HENRY. Does the Chair rule that the point of no quorum can not be made now?

Mr. BARTLETT. The Chair does not recognize the gentleman.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair has not recognized the gentleman from Texas to make the point of no quorum or for any other purpose. [Applause.]

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from North Carolina has the floor.

Mr. HENRY. When will the Chair recognize me to make the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. When the gentleman from Texas is entitled to recognition. [Laughter.]

Mr. WEBB. I hope, Mr. Speaker, this will not be taken out of my time.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I call the gentleman from Texas to order.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I wish to submit a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from North Carolina yield for that purpose?

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I am very anxious to get through with this.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, have I not the right to submit a parliamentary inquiry at this stage of the proceedings?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. As the present occupant of the chair understands, the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] has not yielded.

Mr. HENRY. When will it be in order?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] will proceed.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, when will it be in order to submit a parliamentary inquiry?

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I am still proceeding.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] has the floor.

Mr. HENRY. Will not the gentleman yield for me to submit a parliamentary inquiry?

Mr. WEBB. I would rather not do it at this time, I will say to my friend.

Mr. HENRY. When will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. In a few minutes.

Mr. HENRY. In how many minutes?

Mr. WEBB. In five minutes. I want to continue as to section 17 if I may have order.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, will I be recognized, when the gentleman yields, to make the point of no quorum?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If the gentleman from North Carolina yields.

Mr. HENRY. When he yields the floor may I be recognized to make the point of no quorum?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That can be reached when the gentleman from North Carolina concludes.

Mr. HENRY. I presume it will not be reached——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] will please take his seat.

Mr. HENRY. I presume, under the circumstances, I will have to be outraged by the ruling of the Chair, as the Chair does not recognize the Constitution or the rules of this House——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will take his seat.

Mr. HENRY (continuing). Or the laws of parliamentary procedure.

Mr. COOPER. Regular order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. WEBB. Now, Mr. Speaker——

Mr. HENRY. For the present I will yield, because the Speaker is simply abusing the privileges of the Chair.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN. I do not understand that the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] has to yield the floor in order that the point of no quorum may be made. Does the Chair rule that a man can not make a point of order——

Mr. HENRY. He has already ruled that.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is the point of order that the gentleman from North Carolina is not proceeding in order?

Mr. HENRY. The gentleman from Texas was proceeding in order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas will please permit the Chair to make a statement to the gentleman from Illinois, that he understands that the gentleman from North Carolina has the floor, and that he is entitled to retain the floor until he yields upon the request of some gentleman. Of course, as the Chair understands it—but he may be incorrect—if a point of order is made that the gentleman from North Carolina is violating any rules of the House, it will be a point of order that the Chair will be compelled to entertain.

Mr. MANN. I rise to a point of order. The question is whether I may be permitted to state it or not, or whether the Chair holds that a man rising to a point of order can not state it.

Mr. WEBB. I do not want to be taken off my feet.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair has no way of knowing what the point of order of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] is until it is stated.

Mr. MANN. I make the point of order that any gentleman has the right to make the point of no quorum in accordance with the constitutional provision, and that the right of a quorum in the House does not depend on the special privilege of some Member on the floor as to whether he will yield or not.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois may be right about that. If he can find any authority to that effect, the Chair will be glad to hear it.

Mr. HENRY. The Chair would not permit me to offer authority. The Chair would not permit me to read the Constitution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is familiar with the Constitution. If there is any ruling that a Member having the floor can be taken off the floor by another Member for the purpose of making a point of no quorum——

Mr. HENRY. With all due respect——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Will the gentleman from Texas permit the Chair to finish the statement? If the gentleman can submit any ruling that he is entitled to make the point of no quorum when the gentleman from North Carolina has the floor without the gentleman from North Carolina yielding the Chair will yield ready obedience to it.

Mr. HENRY. Just as soon as I can get the Manual and the Constitution I will read it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. In the meanwhile the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] will proceed.

Mr. HENRY. With all due respect to the Chair, I want to make the point of no quorum at this juncture. I have a right to make that point, and if the Chair will let me read the Constitution——

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I regret very much that the point of no quorum has been interjected in my speech here.

Mr. HENRY. I will submit authority to the Chair, but I hope the Speaker, Mr. CLARK, will be in the chair when I submit it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair hopes so, too. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] will proceed.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, in section 17 of the bill we had the words "property or property rights"——

The SPEAKER resumed the chair.

The SPEAKER. The House will be in order.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I make the point that there is no quorum present.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I am still talking. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and thirty-seven Members are present—not a quorum.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama and the gentleman from North Carolina both move a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The SPEAKER. On this call 298 Members—a quorum—have answered to their names

Mr. WEBB. Mr Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The SPEAKER The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] moves to dispense with further proceedings under the call. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will open the doors.

Mr. WEBB rose.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] is recognized.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, before the point of no quorum was made I was about to briefly discuss section 17 of the bill as agreed to by the conference, which is section 15 of the bill as passed by the House. There is very little material amendment to this section. The Senate struck out the language "property or a property right of the applicant" which we had in the bill, and we have left it that way, so that the damage must result to the applicant, and so forth; and at the expiration of the time, which we set at 10 days, the time may be increased if good cause is shown, and the reasons for such extension shall be entered of record.

In section 19 of the conference bill, or section 17 of the House bill, we added the word "officers," as well as "agents, servants, employees, and attorneys, or those in active concert," and so forth, and after those words we put in the words "or participating."

Section 20 is practically as it passed the House as section 18. This is the much-discussed labor section, where certain acts are described and declared to be not unlawful under the laws of the United States. This is the celebrated section about which my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] made his vehement speech after the bill had passed almost unanimously in the House, and I presume out of deference to his position some of the Senate and the House conferees agreed to strike out this language in section 18 of the House bill, or section 20 of the conference bill:

Or from attending at or near a house or place where any person resides or works, or carries on business or happens to be, for the purpose of peacefully obtaining or communicating information.

Now, the House conferees agreed that those words should go out and the more euphonious ones, though just as effective and meaning the same thing, should be inserted, to wit:

Or from attending at any place where any such person or persons may lawfully be for the purpose of peacefully obtaining or communicating information.

We knew when the bill passed the House that we did not authorize anybody to be at a place where he might not lawfully be. We authorized nobody to violate the laws of the States; and so, in order to make it a little more euphonious and maybe a little less harsh-sounding, we agreed to these words, which do not change the meaning or the effect of the section in any degree.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from North Carolina yield to the gentleman from Iowa?

Mr. WEBB. Just for a question.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. That is all. As I understand, the words "such person" refers back to the word "individual" at the beginning of the section?

Mr. WEBB. We struck out "individual," which the Senate inserted, and restored the word "person," which includes persons, individuals, corporations, and everybody else that can act.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. It refers to the party that has gone to the particular place?

Mr. WEBB. Oh, yes.

Mr. AVIS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from North Carolina yield to the gentleman from West Virginia?

Mr. WEBB. Yes; for a question.

Mr. AVIS. I would like to ask the gentleman if in his opinion the two sections relating to labor are different from what the law is at the present time? Do they give any more right to labor than has been given by court decisions?

Mr. WEBB. I think they do. They make the law uniform where heretofore certain courts have held one thing and certain other courts have held another thing with reference to these labor questions. This is a codification of labor's rights, to apply to the whole United States.

Mr. AVIS. Does the gentleman think it gives them any more rights than they already had?

Mr. WEBB. I have not the time to go into the details of this section, and I can not now discuss what I already discussed fully months ago when the bill was before the House. I am now informing the House as to the amendments agreed to in the conference.

Mr. AVIS. I was asking the gentleman's opinion of the matter.

Mr. WEBB. I think the two sections constitute labor's bill of rights that they have been clamoring for for 25 years; and we have written into the statute law what is considered to be the best opinions of the courts as to labor and labor's rights.

Now, Mr Speaker, at the end of this paragraph we used the words "nor shall any of the acts specified in this paragraph be considered or held unlawful" when the bill passed the House. The Senate struck out the word "unlawful" and inserted the words "to be violations of any law of the United States," and the conferees agreed to it.

Now, in section 21, with reference to contempts, in the House bill we provided—

That any person who shall willfully disobey any lawful writ, process, order, rule, decree, or command of any district court of the United States or any court of the District of Columbia by doing any act or thing therein or thereby forbidden to be done by him if the act or thing so done by him be of such character as to constitute also a criminal offense under any statute of the United States or at common law.

The Senate struck out the words "at common law" and inserted "under the laws of any State in which the act was committed," and the House agreed to it. Those amendments are more or less immaterial.

Now, Mr. Speaker, that covers the ground as well as I am able to do it in the limited time. I realize that there is a wide difference of opinion as to trust legislation in the House, especially on the Republican side. Some of our Republican friends think the bill is too drastic. That idea cropped out in the Senate. Senator BORAH, an able Republican, declared that this legislation was useless, that the Sherman antitrust law was sufficient, and it was unnecessary to pass this bill.

Senator WEEKS declared that it was drastic because it was unfair to the United Shoe Machinery Co.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I make a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN. I do not think the gentleman can refer in the House to what has taken place in the Senate.

Mr. WEBB. I am not criticizing Senators. I am simply stating what I gather from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD——

Mr. MANN. Yes, I know; but that is against the rule.

The SPEAKER. It is against the rule to refer to what is done in the Senate.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I understand that; but under certain limitations it ought to be allowed. I heard a Senator the other day in the Senate read page after page of what House Members had said, both on the floor of the House and elsewhere; but I do not care to refer to it if it is objectionable to my friend.

The SPEAKER. It is against the rule, although it is frequently done when nobody raises the point of order.

Mr. WEBB. I was only illustrating the fact that there is a vast difference of opinion among Republicans, both Senators and Representatives, as to this legislation. It cropped out when the bill was presented to the House. Some of them said the bill was too drastic, and they were inclined to criticize the committee for reporting out a bill of that kind. Others of my Republican colleagues declared that the bill was not drastic enough and that it had no "teeth." So it appears that we are certain to be criticized, no matter what we do. It reminds me of a fellow who had been in the habit of getting drunk. He had been to town and was going home pretty well intoxicated. It was a cold night. He was pretty full and was staggering from side to side of the road. He had spent his substance in riotous living and was beginning to feel pretty poor, and as he stumbled along he soliloquized in this wise: "I wonder if my wife Nancy is sitting up burning the candle. If she is burning that candle when I get home, I will whip her, sure. I am too poor a man to have candles burned at night when I am not there."

Then he staggered along for a mile or two, and it grew very cold. He had forgotten his poverty, and was thinking about a good warm fire and a light in the window, and a good warm place to sleep, and he soliloquized like this: "I wonder if my wife Nancy has gone to bed, blown out the candle, and put out the fire, and has no warm welcome for me. If she has blown out that candle, I will whip her sure." So in any event, Mr. Speaker, Nancy was due to get a licking, and in any event the Democrats who presented this bill must be criticized by some Republicans, though 54 of them voted for it when it passed the House——

Mr. MANN. They will get a licking, too. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. WEBB. The Democrats of our committee are sure to be criticized, from one quarter or the other, by a part of our divided friends on the other side of the Chamber who can not get together themselves. Part of them are asking that criminal penalties be imposed; the other part would vote against this bill if criminal penalties were imposed; so we have a hard job to satisfy them all. We hope we will satisfy those fair-minded ones who will give us credit for having done the best we could with this troublesome question. [Applause.] I am obliged to the House for their attention.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD] is recognized for two hours and a half.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] has given us his views of this bill and has attempted to defend it and show its virtues. Allow me to point out some of its vices. This bill proposes a radical change from the policy that has been approved, both by Democrats and Republicans, in the past. There are no platform declarations in favor of any such policy as this. Heretofore whenever commerce has been restrained, whenever monopoly has been attempted, we have denounced it as a criminal offense. We have never undertaken to palter with it in any fashion. We have always said that a man who was willing to rob the many was no less guilty than the man who robbed a single individual.

In the bill presented here you are providing one rule for the individual who steals from you, and an entirely different rule for the one who steals from the community at large. The rich offender that robs the public of millions and in conscienceless fashion squeezes the last penny out of his helpless victim must not be sent to jail—he is too good for that; but if some poor fellow robs a henroost and gets caught, we betide him—jails are made for such as he. This bill contains a great many sections, but there are but four sections that deal directly with trusts by defining offenses that lessen competition or tend to create monopolies. They are sections 2, 3, 7, and 8. These sections were enacted as a part of the House bill. They then contained criminal penalties in line with a policy that has always been pursued in dealing with like offenses. Now they come back to us without such penalties, but with a provision for their enforcement that seems to me utterly ineffective for any practical purpose.

There are only two sections in the bill—both inserted in the Senate—that contain criminal penalties. But let me remind you that those only protect corporations. They do not deal with the acts that directly oppress the public; that put persons out of business; that send people to the poorhouse. They deal with offenses against corporations, and are designed to protect corporations against the dishonesty of their officers. It is a singular fact that only those two sections have criminal penalties. It would thus appear that those who are sponsors for this bill are more anxious to protect the stockholders of a corporation—perchance a trust—against the dishonesty of its officers than they are to protect the people injured by the trusts. If you illegally ruin a competitor or rob the public, you are only to be admonished to quit; but if you do the same thing to a corporation you go to jail. When this bill becomes a law it will give notice to the courts and to the prosecuting officers that hereafter a new policy is to be pursued, not one of punishment, but one of moral suasion.

I want to call your attention to the nature of these four sections, to show you to what extent they cover and are offered as a substitute for the Sherman law.

Section 2 defines an offense that is well known—that of driving out a competitor by selling below cost in the community where the competitor is doing business while recouping the loss in other localities. This has several times been condemned by our Supreme Court as a violation of the Sherman law. It restrains trade by destroying competition. During late years it has been used more than any other means for suppressing competition and maintaining monopoly. This offense was regarded of so great importance that the last Democratic platform declared that as one of the things that ought to be specifically condemned. No doubt those who wrote that platform expected that when written into law it would have stringent criminal penalties, but instead of that it has been put into this bill without any kind of a penalty. In the last few years some 20 States have found it necessary to pass stringent laws with drastic penalties against the practice.

The third section as written in the conference report declares illegal what is known as tying contracts. These contracts have become widely known as another of the chief means by which combinations in restraint of trade are being built up. Some of the most unconscionable trusts are making use of this form of combination to maintain monopoly.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I will.

Mr. STAFFORD. I wish to inquire whether, in the opinion of the gentleman, section 3 as agreed to by the conferees is as stringent in its effect as Senate section 2?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I consider it much less effective.

Mr. MOORE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. For a question.

Mr. MOORE. Does the gentleman observe any improvement here over the Sherman antitrust law in this sentence agreed upon in conference in section 3, "where the effect of such lease, sale, or contract for sale, or such condition, agreement, or understanding may be to substantially lessen competition or tend to create a monopoly in any line of commerce"?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. It is unquestionably much weaker than the Sherman law. I shall try to point out the reason why.

Mr. MOORE. It certainly has not made it any stronger.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. It certainly has not. It reenacts the Sherman law with limitations that will make these sections less effective than that law.

Section 7 prohibits one corporation from purchasing the capital stock of another corporation, but it is so limited and restricted that it is much less effective than the Sherman law. Those familiar with the litigation that has been going on in reference to trusts know that this is the modern method of creating trusts. One corporation will purchase the stock of another corporation and thus consolidate the corporations. There can be no competition between corporations owned by the same parties; people do not compete with themselves.

Section 8 relates to the interlocking of directors. That section if it had a criminal penalty might have had some effect. It may in some respects go beyond the Sherman law, but the evil that it is aimed at is reached by that law; but it is harmless with or without penalties for its enforcement. It does not reach the real evil, because it does not forbid the community of interest that interlocking directors represent. It will only tend to create dummy directors and conceal the real parties guilty of wrongdoing.

Under these four sections nearly every trust in this country can be proceeded against, and it seems to me that in the future this will be the method of procedure. This bill declares this to be the new policy of the Democratic Party. I hope that no Republican will vote for any such policy. [Applause on the Republican side.] If we abandon criminal penalties as a means for the enforcement of the Sherman law, no one will care for that law. Think of what greed has dared to do in the past with prison doors staring the offenders in the face, while the Government has been spending millions to enforce those penalties!

Now let me call your attention to the methods that are to be pursued in the enforcement of these four important propositions. Here is what it provides:

> The authority to enforce sections 2, 3, 7, and 8 of this act by the persons respectively subject thereto is hereby vested in the Interstate Commerce Commission where applicable to common carriers, in the Federal Reserve Board where applicable to banks, banking associations, and trust companies, and in the Federal Trade Commission where applicable to all other commerce.

The SPEAKER. Two hundred and sixty-three Members have answered to their names—a quorum.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

The doors were opened.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, in case a complaint is made of any violation of any of these sections an application is to be made to the commissions or board having jurisdiction for an investigation. No doubt, as has been customary under the Sherman law, an investigation will be started ex parte to begin with. Testimony will be taken and inspectors sent out to learn whether there is any reason to believe that an offense has been committed. If it is found that a successful prosecution can be had under any one of these sections, a complaint may be served upon the offender. That complaint has the effect of giving jurisdiction. It is equivalent to the bringing of a lawsuit. There is nothing in this bill that hastens or expedites the trial of any matter before one of these commissions. A trial must be had just the same as in a court. Attorneys will appear, evidence will be introduced on both sides, and when the thing is finally ended, if an offense is found to exist, the commission or the board, whichever may happen to try the matter, will make a report to that effect and serve a notice on the offending party to quit.

After the report has been made and the notice has been served, what happens? How is it enforced? No penalty is imposed, no fine is collected, not even the cost of the proceedings, and no one is sent to jail. There is no loss to the party who has been violating this law. He is not to part with any of his ill-gotten gains. If he is not satisfied to quit, he may bring a suit in a circuit court for the purpose of setting aside the report, or he may treat it with contempt. In case he does not comply, the commission or board may bring suit in some circuit court for the enforcement of the notice. There the party is treated just the same as if he had appealed from a judgment of a district court to the circuit court of appeals. In the circuit court the findings of fact by a commission or board will be conclusive if there is any evidence to support them. In this it does not differ from findings of fact made by a district court when considered on appeal. After it has been retried in the circuit court of appeals it may then go to the Supreme Court on certiorari. At the end of this wearisome proceeding, which must take years, as the experience of the past demonstrates, what is the result? There is still no penalty, no fine, no imprisonment. All that is done is to issue a writ of injunction forbidding the practice. Think of that as an effective remedy against important trust violations!

The party is not to lose anything except the costs perhaps at the end of the litigation in the circuit court or in the Supreme Court. He does not even lose the costs before the commission or board, as there is no provision that any costs can be taxed. What have you gained? You have taken four of the most important provisions of the Sherman law out of that law and placed them in four separate and distinct sections. You have turned these offenses over to a commission or board for trial, there they are to be tried the same as they are tried now in the district courts. At the end you get not an injunction, but a notice to quit. If you sue to enforce this notice you get an injunction limited by this section to the enforcement of this notice. It can not reach the other offenses usually connected with these illegal practices so as to afford complete relief as under the Sherman law.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I do.

Mr. MOORE. As a matter of fact, has it not been made more difficult to prosecute the trusts under this system than it was heretofore?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I think it makes it exceedingly difficult. Not only will it take years before the courts can determine just what rights parties have under this dual system, but it also greatly weakens present law.

It has been claimed that the various matters defined and declared illegal in this bill are outside and beyond the Sherman law. That contention rests upon the claim that the Sherman law does not forbid anything that simply tends to restrain commerce or competition, or that tends to monopoly; that it only condemns restraint of trade and monopoly. Such a contention is clearly without merit.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I suggest the lack of a quorum. I think this is one of the most interesting speeches the House has had made for a long time, and there ought to be more here to listen to it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois makes the point of order there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and fifty-one gentlemen are present—not a quorum.

The SPEAKER. On this vote 264 Members have responded to their names—a quorum.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will open the doors. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD] is recognized.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, none of the acts described in sections 2, 3, or 7 are declared illegal unless their effect may be to substantially lessen competition or tend to create a monopoly in any line of commerce. All acts of that kind are now forbidden by the Sherman law, and these sections simply repeat in somewhat different language what that act now forbids. The courts have repeatedly translated the Sherman law into the language used in this bill, save for some limitations that will greatly weaken that law, and to which I desire to direct your attention.

The Supreme Court in the Northern Securities Co. case, reported in the One hundred and ninety-third United States Reports, page 331, used this language:

> That to vitiate a combination such as the act of Congress condemns it need not be shown that the combination in fact results or will result in total suppression of trade or in a complete monopoly, but it is only essential to show that by its necessary operation it tends to restrain interstate or international trade or commerce or tends to create a monopoly in such trade or commerce and to deprive the public of the advantages that flow from free competition.

Take that language—it declares that anything that tends to restrain trade or to create a monopoly or to deprive the public of free competition is illegal under the Sherman law—the very language in this bill. Plainly, anything that tends to lessen competition tends to deprive the public of free competition. But let me read another passage from this same case. It says:

> The means employed in respect to the combinations forbidden by the antitrust act and which Congress deemed germane to the end to be accomplished was to prescribe as a rule for interstate and international commerce (not for domestic commerce) that it shall not be vexed by combinations or monopolies which restrain commerce by destroying or restricting competition. Congress has prescribed such a rule, but because in all prior cases in this court the antitrust act has been construed as forbidding any combination which by its necessary operation destroys or restricts free competition among those engaged in interstate commerce; in other words, that to destroy or to restrict free competition in interstate commerce was to restrain such commerce.

It will be noticed that the power to restrict competition, which is simply the power to lessen competition, is declared to be a restraint of trade. This construction of the antitrust act was absolutely necessary to the decision in that case. There was no restraint of trade unless the power to lessen competition constituted such restraint. There was no proof that any competition had been lessened, and it was claimed that less than 4 per cent of the traffic of the two roads that had been combined could be affected by the combination. Still the combination was held illegal. Substantially the same doctrine was laid down in the Union Pacific case, decided in 1912. There less than 4 per cent; in fact, less than 1 per cent, of the commerce was involved in the combination declared illegal. This doctrine is also found in the Knight case, reported in One hundred and fifty-sixth United States; in the Addystone Pipe Co. case, reported in One hundred and seventy-fifth United States; and in Waters-Pierce Co. against Texas, reported in Two hundred and twelfth United States.

The English Encyclopedia of Law and Procedure, volume 27, page 889, says that both under the common law and under this statute contracts that are designed to suppress or restrict competition are in restraint of trade.

I am aware that there are cases that hold certain restraints of trade or of competition not illegal, but this bill will not change those cases. Those decisions rest upon old common-law doctrines that our Supreme Court preserved by saying that Congress only intended to prohibit direct restraints and not indirect or incidental restraints. The object of the Sherman law is to preserve free competition. As every restraint of trade lessens competition, such restraints are forbidden. To lessen competition, restrains trade and defeats the only object of the law. While this may be conceded, it has been claimed that the Sherman law only covers combinations and that the sections in this bill do not deal with combinations, and hence the acts which they declare illegal are not covered by that law. This contention finds no support in either the language of the Sherman law or in court decisions. The first section of the Sherman law forbids all contracts or combinations in restraint of trade. Rice v. Standard Oil Co. (134 Fed., 464) and cases cited therein point out that it is not necessary to prove any combination if a contract in restraint of trade is shown. Chief Justice White in the Standard Oil Co. case said, in construing the act, that all restraints of trade and all acts that tend to monopoly are covered under the second section of the act, whether covered by any of the specific language of the act or not:

In Gompers v. Bucks Stove & Range Co. (221 U. S., 418), after citing Loewe v. Lawler, this court said (p. 438): "But the principle announced by the court was general. It (the Sherman Act) covered any illegal means by which interstate commerce is restrained, whether by unlawful combinations of capital or unlawful combinations of labor; and we think also whether the restraint be occasioned by unlawful contracts, trusts, pooling arrangements, blacklists, boycotts, coercion, threats, intimidation, and whether these be made effective, in whole or in part, by acts, words, or printed matter."

That these sections modify the Sherman Act is apparent. It is true that you may have an act denounced as an offense under two different statutes, but the Sherman law does not only define a crime, it also defines a man's rights in regard to property. Our courts can not be expected to assume that Congress intended that a person's right to property shall be held valid under one law in one court and void under other law in another court. They will harmonize the two laws by holding that this modifies the Sherman law, as it will be the last legislative expression on the subject.

In view of the fact that this bill covers offenses under the Sherman Act, it is important to consider whether it repeals any of the criminal penalties that now apply to acts defined in this bill. It is a familiar rule that if you reenact a statute and modify it or lessen or increase its penalties the old statute is repealed; that is, it is repealed by implication.

There is in this bill no provision that the Sherman law is not to be repealed as to any of the acts condemned in sections 2, 3, and 8. There is a provision in the last paragraph of section 7 which may preserve to some extent the Sherman law as to acts described in that section, but, like much of this bill, it is so doubtful in its language that it is hard to tell whether it preserves the law as against future offenses or only preserves it as to past offenses. But there is no such provision as to sections 2, 3, and 7. If they are inconsistent with that law, there can be no doubt they modify it. I think they are clearly in conflict.

For instance, sections 2, 3, and 7 provide that before an act shall be illegal competition must be substantially lessened. Nowhere has our Supreme Court said that competition must be substantially lessened to make restraint of trade illegal. They have repeatedly held that any direct restraint is illegal. But here you have added a limitation upon the power of the courts by requiring a substantially lessening of competition before an act can be declared illegal, instead of simply a lessening of or restriction of competition. Instead of free competition being the rule established by Congress, as said by the Supreme Court, this permits competition to be lessened.

This is a very vicious kind of legislation, because it leaves to the court an almost limitless discretion. Under the evidence in almost any case it may be held that there is no substantial lessening of competition. One court may find no substantial lessening of competition, while another, just as honest, might say there is. Take, for instance, the case to which I called your attention—the case of the Union Pacific Railroad. In that case the circuit court of appeals held that the competition was so small that it was negligible, while the Supreme Court held that that was not true, holding that they could not measure the quantity of the competition that was destroyed; that the law was that any contract or combination that restrained trade is a violation of the law, and as such is condemned. The court in the Northern Security Co. case cited with approval from an Ohio you have written into the bill a provision to the effect that comcase the following:

It is no answer to say that competition in the salt trade was not in fact destroyed or that the price of the commodity was not unreasonably advanced. Courts will not stop to inquire as to the degree of injury inflicted on the public; it is enough to know that the inevitable tendency of such contracts is injurious to the public.

This bill invites the court to make such an inquiry and substitutes the judgment of the court for the judgment of Congress.

Let me call your attention to the fact that the Democratic platform criticized the Supreme Court for having read into the Sherman law the word "unreasonable," so as to make it read "unreasonable restraint of trade." Now, in this bill you have done nothing to eliminate that word, although when we started to frame it a great many bills were introduced to effect that purpose. You have left the word unreasonable in the law, and you have added to the difficulty, added to the mischief, by requiring not only that the restraint must be unreasonable but that it shall be a substantial restraint of trade.

But you have done another thing that seems to me still worse—a thing that must necessarily modify the Sherman Act. You require that an act to be illegal must not only substantially lessen competition, but it must substantially lessen competition "in a line of commerce." Here is the language:

Where the effect may be to substantially lessen competition or tend to create monopoly in any line of commerce.

Under the decision of our Supreme Court a lessening of competition in any section, in any community, in any part of commerce, is a violation of the provisions of the Sherman law. But petition must be substantially lessened in a line of commerce before an act is illegal. How are men going to protect themselves under this law? For instance, take one of the large concerns like the Standard Oil Co. or the United States Steel Co., operating throughout the length and breadth of this country. How can the small man, operating, say, in one town, secure protection against the illegal methods of such a company? If he is ruined, his elimination will not substantially lessen competition in a line of trade. It would be utterly impossible to prove in a civil action brought to recover damages for a violation of this law a substantial lessening of competition in any line of commerce. Even if the whole commerce carried on by the United States Steel Co. should be affected to some extent, it may not in the judgment of a court establish that the whole line of commerce is substantially affected. This makes it necessary that it shall affect the commerce throughout the country——

Mr. GOOD. In that line.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Yes; in that line.

Now, this limitation has been written into sections 2, 3, and 7. It was never in the Sherman law. There never was any excuse for writing it in this bill. It can have but one purpose, and that is to change existing law. When the Supreme Court comes to construe the Sherman law it will certainly say that so far as sections 2, 3, and 8 cover offenses now covered by the Sherman law that law has been modified and the criminal penalties are repealed.

There is another significant fact that indicates clearly an intention to modify the Sherman law in addition to the fact that it reenacts in modified form essential features of it, and that is this: Section 7 has a paragraph that attempts to preserve in force the Sherman law as to matters covered by that section. If it had been the intention to preserve the Sherman law as against conflict with sections 2, 3, and 8, why was that provision in section 7 confined entirely to section 7 and not made to apply also to sections 2, 3, and 8? Will not the court necessarily have to say that if Congress had intended that sections 2, 3, and 8 should not modify the Sherman law, it would have made a provision to that effect the same as is made in section 7?

My attention has been called to a provision in section 11 relating to the effect of the orders and judgments made in the enforcement of these sections. It is claimed that as these are not to be a bar to any liability under the Sherman law that law is to remain in force. To contend that this saves the Sherman law begs the question. The Sherman law will still be in force when this statute is passed. The question is, How much of it will be in force? The acts that are declared illegal by these sections may be a part of a combination or conspiracy not covered by these particular sections, hence it is important that the right to prosecute regardless of any judgment that may be entered under these sections should still be preserved. But that provision does not attempt to preserve the act itself. It simply preserves the right to prosecute as to any offense that may still remain under that law.

I want to call your attention in this connection to section 14. That section is said to make guilt personal. That section is a fraud. It was introduced simply for the purpose of deceiving those who do not know what the law is.

The Criminal Code has this provision:

Whoever directly commits any act constituting an offense defined in any law of the United States, or aids, abets, counsels, commands, induces, or procures its commission, is a principal.

That broad and comprehensive language is to be supplanted by section 14, and here is the language:

That whenever a corporation shall violate any of the penal provisions of the antitrust laws such violation shall be deemed to be also that of the individual directors, officers, or agents of such corporation who shall have authorized, ordered, or done any of the acts constituting in whole or in part such violation.

Under the language of this new section only those who authorize, order, or do any of the acts forbidden are guilty, while under the present law not only are those guilty, but in addition all who abet, counsel, induce, or procure the commission of the act, whether they authorize or command it or not. The penalty in this new section is just exactly the same as in the present Sherman law. There is no increase in the penalty. The effect of this section is to relieve persons now liable to the penalties of the Sherman law. It may be that those who have been instrumental in pushing this section may have occasion some day to regret that they tried to fool the public. To relieve from criminal penalties and fool the public are all the purposes this section has.

Not only have men been convicted and sent to prison under the present act, but a large number have been fined. All who have been fined could have been sent to prison. In every case when this question has been before our courts it has been held that the individual as well as the corporation was liable. Not a single instance has been cited where anyone escaped because guilt is not personal under the law. The Attorney General called to our attention the fact that there is no necessity for such a section and submitted to the Judiciary Committee copies of indictments under which men had been indicted.

Allow me briefly to call your attention to section 7. When this bill was before this House I called attention to a number of objections to it. Some of those objections have been obviated by amendments, but it is still open to the objection that I made then that it expressly permits holding companies. This section attempts to deal in a comprehensive fashion with the effect on commerce created by the purchase by one corporation of the capital stock of another corporation. It is said that the second paragraph deals with holding companies. Its language is broad enough for that purpose, but the first part of the third paragraph excepts from its operation the class of corporations we know as holding companies, and all holding companies can easily amend their charters so as to come clearly within this exception. That paragraph provides that corporations that "purchase such stock solely for investment and not using the same by voting or otherwise to bring about or in attempting to bring about the substantial lessening of competition" are not forbidden. That was just the kind of a trust created by the Northern Security Co. It had never used the stock by voting or otherwise to lessen or to attempt to lessen competition. The Supreme Court, however, held that there could be no competition between two companies the ownership of which was consolidated in a third company, and very properly dissolved the combination; still that is just the kind of a corporation permitted under this exception. In a letter from the Attorney General read to the conferees he called attention to this very paragraph and to the fact that it describes a holding company, and suggested that it ought to be amended, but no amendment was made to the provision.

In conclusion I want to call your attention to some of the provisions in reference to labor. Outside of one or two provisions I do not believe that the bill changes the law now applicable to labor.

The first sentence in section 6 deserves some notice. It reads as follows:

That the labor of a human being is not a commodity or article of commerce.

The Attorney General, in the letter I referred to, called attention to the danger that lurked in such a statement. As it reads it is hard to tell what it means. Of course, no one has ever contended that labor is a tangible material thing like the groceries or clothes that we purchase in commerce, but that labor is an article or part of commerce everybody on this floor has recognized by passing labor legislation. Some of those in favor of the proposed legislation claim that this wipes out the Sherman law as applied to labor. If that is true, it will not only wipe out the Sherman law but every other law in the interest of labor that rests upon the power of Congress over commerce. It will wipe out the employers' liability act and a number of other acts passed to protect labor in interstate commerce. Its language is not limited to the Sherman law. It is general. The declaration, if it means anything, means that labor shall not be construed to be an instrumentality in interstate commerce. If it was intended to exempt labor from the Sherman law, it ought to have been written in plain language and not in an oracular sentence, such as this. If this provision is to be construed as now contended for it will be one of the grievances of labor, not a boon. Labor can not afford to be outlawed. It is entitled to and will ask the protection of law like other citizens.

I believe that labor will find itself sorely disappointed with the so-called Bill of Rights written into this measure. Section 20 forbids the issue of injunctions in certain cases. Labor organizations have asked for such legislation. But what does it do? It grants relief to pretty much everybody, but denies it to those for whose benefit this section is said to be drawn. You read it and you will find that there is no provision against issuing an injunction in favor of an employer and against one seeking employment. It is the one seeking employment that has been asking legislation. It is the person that strikes that is enjoined in the cases complained of. When a person has struck he is seeking employment and is not an employee; he may be enjoined in the old-fashioned way and on the same old grounds. The one who has been asking for protection against injunctions is denied relief and is mocked by a section that grants that relief to others not asking for it. Some have claimed that a striker is an employee; but this section settles that, because in the second paragraph it is provided that the employer may discharge him at any time. As soon as an employee strikes he discharges himself, and if he does not, the employer can discharge him under this very section. When he is discharged he is a person seeking employment and not an employee, and as such he can be enjoined under this bill, the same as he can now.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. The relationship of employer and employee does not exist when the man who was formerly the employee is on a strike?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Certainly not.

Mr. MADDEN. And so, of course, the provisions of this bill regulating the issue of injunctions by an employer against an employee does not restrict an employer in enjoining a man on a strike?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. This section only protects people that have no grievance.

Mr. MOORE. Is it not true that when the bill was in the House the proponents of the measure insisted that a striker was an employee and had that status?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I do not remember; but it is perfectly plain that the employer may discharge the striker before he secures his injunction, because in this paragraph it is provided that no such restraining order or injunction shall prohibit any person or persons, whether singly or in concert, from terminating any relation of employment, and the things that can not be enjoined are by the last sentence of the section declared to be legal.

Mr. MOORE. In what position does that place the striker?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. He has no protection under the first paragraph of this section.

Mr. MOORE. And he is the man whom they were supposed to protect when the bill was before the House?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Yes.

Mr. MOORE. To get any benefit from this provision the man would have to be in actual employment?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Yes; and he would not be likely to want an injunction against his employer.

Mr. MOORE. He would have to keep his job while he sued his employer. That is rather an interesting process for him to go through.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. There is another feature of this section that may be worth noticing. It certainly authorizes both the primary and secondary boycott, but it also authorizes the blacklist on the part of employers. I presume one was intended to offset the other. I am not prepared to say which will be the most effective weapon of warfare. Those who stand sponsors for this bill claim that it neither authorizes the one nor the other. They claim that the bill does not change existing law in regard to labor except that it prevents courts from declaring labor organizations illegal and gives a jury trial when an injunction has been violated. There is absolutely no question as to the legality of labor organizations. Such organizations have been repeatedly held by the highest court of our land to be legal. The bill adds nothing in that respect, nor is it certain that it grants a jury trial in contempt cases. Courts now have the power to submit questions of fact in such cases to a jury. Under the language of this bill why is it not optional with the court whether it will submit any such question to a jury? The language of the provision relied upon is that—such trial may be by the court, or, on demand of the accused, by a jury, in which latter event the court may impanel a jury from the jurors then in attendance, or the court or the judge thereof in chambers may cause a sufficient number of jurors to be selected and summoned, as provided by law, to attend at the time and place, at which time a jury shall be selected and impaneled as upon a trial for a misdemeanor.

It will be noticed that this provision says that the trial may be by the court or it may be by a jury if demanded by the accused, and that the court may impanel a jury; the only mandatory provision appears to relate to the manner in which a jury is to be selected. To have the effect of giving a jury trial the provision must repeal existing law, and it must do so in clear language. Can it be said that this provision takes from our courts the right to try contempt cases without a jury? Why does not this section say that, on demand of the accused, the trial shall be, and not that it may be, by a jury? Clearly this can not be an oversight. It must have been intentional, so that courts may do as they consider proper under the circumstances.

I believe in protecting labor and its organizations. I believe that their rights should be carefully guarded. No one is worthy of a place upon this floor who does not sympathize with their struggle for better wages, for better conditions, a happier and better lot. They do not ask to be placed beyond the reach of the law, and resent the empty promises and pretenses of those who seek to deceive them. This bill grants to labor no bill of rights not heretofore recognized outside of the matters I have called attention to. This bill only puts into statutory form present law. I am perfectly willing that the rights of labor should be written into the statute, but when you write it do it in plain English, so that we know what it means, and so there can be no question about it. [Applause.] It will take a good deal of litigation to determine whether it changes existing law or not.

I want to say to my Democratic friends, you started out with a great deal of bragging about what you were going to do to the trusts. You introduced a multitude of bills that certainly had teeth in them. As the days and the weeks and the months have passed, one by one those bills have disappeared, one by one those brave promises have been forgotten, one by one you have pulled the teeth out of this bill, until the thing you present to us now is a toothless measure that can never do anybody any harm.

If you were to ask the trusts what sort of legislation they wanted you to pass on trusts, do you not feel confident they would tell you this is the right kind of a measure? Under this they will never spend any sleepless nights for fear of a prison. Would they not ask you for a bill that would complicate the present situation with all sorts of legal conundrums, that would complicate it by not attempting to define the thousand and one questions that must of necessity come up under the two varying systems that you provide? This bill will mean a mint of money to the lawyers and years and years of delay. Now that the Sherman law has become plain by the decisions of our Supreme Court, now when there is some chance to make that law effective, you step in and write upon the statute books a law that is a surrender of your past position, a surrender of every effort that has been made in years past.

The idea of sending these men that are guilty of robbing the public to a commission there to dicker and compromise in secret for the privilege of continuing their unlawful practices is ridiculous as a remedy. Make your laws effective. If you had written in section 14 a penalty of not less than one nor more than five years in prison and had wiped out your fine, you would have made the trust magnates find out what the law is. There is no difficulty to-day in knowing what the Sherman law means. Anybody that cares a rap can tell to almost a dead certainty whether he is inside or outside of the law. If you will make the offenders toe the mark by the stringent criminal penalties that you promised during the last campaign you will make them deal fairly with the public. If you had written that kind of a bill, you would not be here explaining and apologizing for this measure.

I will tell you what your troubles are. You are scared. The industrial condition is such that you dare not pass a trust bill. This is not the time to write such a law. When you met in December you thought that you could write one, but as the months have gone by and as you have seen the idle freight cars accumulate, seen the business and income of railroads diminish until they have had to beg for increased rates to save them from bankruptcy, seen the factories cease operation, seen thousands of idle men tramping the streets from one end of this land to the other, seen industries paralyzed, and a money panic that has forced into circulation more than $300,000,000 in emergency currency, you have realized that you could not pass a trust law; but not willing to confess a failure, you are trying to fool the public with this bill. [Applause on the Republican side.]

SENATE.

THURSDAY, October 8, 1914.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we seek Thy face and favor that we may have the courage of life's great obligation and duty. We not only look into the face of man unafraid and seek to conquer the accidental circumstances of life, but as kings and priests unto God Thou hast given to us to have dominion over the work of Thy hands. Thou hast given to us Thy Holy Word to guide us in the discharge of these our duties. Grant us this day the inspiration that cometh from above, that with convictions founded upon Thy revealed truth and with the boundless faith of those who believe in God we may address ourselves to the tasks of the day. Bless us in Christ's name. Amen.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on request of Mr. JAMES and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

THE TIDAL BASIN (S. DOC. NO. 593).

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in response to a resolution of August 25, 1914, a report regarding the practicability and desirability and cost of converting the tidal basin in the Potomac Park into a public bathing beach, which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia and ordered to be printed.

THE ROCKEFELLER AND CARNEGIE FOUNDATIONS (S. DOC. NO. 592).

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, stating, in response to a resolution of August 5, that the organizations known as the General Education Board of the Rockefeller Foundation and the Carnegie Foundation are not related to the work of the department, etc., which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

UNITED STATES EXPRESS CO. (S. DOC. NO. 594).

FORTIFICATION OF SWEET WINE (S. DOC. NO. 591).

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, in response to a resolution of September 28 (calendar day, October 3), 1914, a statement containing the names and addresses of the manufacturers of sweet wine who use wine spirits or grape brandy in the fortification of sweet wines, etc., which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed.

THE PRESIDENT.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, the Washington Post this morning contains an editorial highly commendatory of the President, and as it is decidedly in contrast with its unfriendly position concerning the Executive and his administration I ask unanimous consent for leave to insert the editorial, without reading, in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The editorial referred to is as follows:

[From the Washington Post, Thursday, October 8, 1914.]

THE PRESIDENT.

The American people are proud of the manner in which the President has sustained the dignity and prestige of the United States during the troublous times succeeding the outbreak of the European war.

This mighty, free, democratic Nation, peopled by men who possess full individual and political rights, with absolute freedom of opinion and with intelligence to form a correct opinion, is the only nation of the first rank in the world that is not involved in war. It is on friendly terms with all nations, and wishes to retain their friendship.

The President has interpreted to foreign nations the true spirit of the United States. He has made plain to them the desire of this Nation to maintain a policy of strict neutrality and impartial friendship, while guarding its own rights. He has shown that this Nation intends to adhere scrupulously to its ancient rule of refraining from participating in the politics of Europe. He has striven to make clear the fact that the United States will continue its independent course; that it seeks no advantage at the expense of the nations now at war, and that it stands ready and anxious to use its friendly offices in behalf of peace among them all.

The real greatness of the Nation has been reflected by the words and the attitude of the President. His own achievements in behalf of the maintenance of peace between the United States and Mexico add weight to his utterances. The good faith of the United States as an advocate of world peace is not and can not fairly be impugned. It is also apparent to the world that this Nation is absolutely free from intrigue or double-dealing in its relations with other countries. It has no allies; it has no secret ententes; it is not playing one nation against another. It stands apart, upheld by its own independence, its free manhood, and its boundless strength. Its will is expressed by intelligent opinion, not by shot and shell. It has no ambitions which clash with the peaceful ambitions of any other nation. It profits most when other nations are peaceful and prosperous.

Americans are justly proud of the majestic figure of the United States, looming up above the world's battle clouds, serene in its own might, with good will in its heart toward every nation. They are grateful to the President for the great and simple dignity with which he has maintained the time-honored rule of Jefferson—"Peace, commerce, and honest friendship with all nations, entangling alliances with none."

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House agrees to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 11745) to provide for certificate of title to homestead entry by a female American citizen who has intermarried with an alien.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (H. R. 11745) to provide for certificate of title to homestead entry by a female American citizen who has intermarried with an alien, and it was thereupon signed by the Vice President.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE PRESIDENT presented petitions of sundry citizens of Pittsburgh and New Brighton, in the State of Pennsylvania; of Muskegon, Mich.; Montrose, Colo.; Bovina Center, N. Y.; and Hanna City, Ill., praying for the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution to prohibit polygamy, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I have received many telegrams from Michigan in reference to the so-called revenue-tax bill, one from a citizen of Michigan living at Flushing, as follows:

FLUSHING, MICH., October 7, 1914.

Hon. CHARLES E. TOWNSEND,
Washington, D. C.:

Farmers of Michigan ask for $500,000,000 to loan at 3 per cent. Security: Hogs, hay, and potatoes—better security than cotton. Please present this to proper committee and amend Sheppard bill accordingly.

IRA T. SAYRE.

I have several telegrams here, I repeat, in reference to the revenue bill, one of which I desire to read. It is dated Holland, Mich., October 7, 1914.

HOLLAND, MICH., October 7, 1914.

Senator CHARLES E. TOWNSEND,
Washington, D. C.:

The proposed stamp tax on proprietary medicinal preparations is again class legislation, hitting Michigan specially hard, and creates conditions for concerns in the pharmaceutical trade that are confiscatory and absolutely prohibitive to successful continuance. The drug trade is already burdened with far more than its share in war cost. The advance in drugs and chemicals has already made it extremely difficult for manufacturers to maintain their preparations without advance, and the addition of this proposed tax is more than the industry can bear. Please use your influence to avoid the throttling of pharmaceutical manufacturing, which is so important a part of Michigan's successful industries.

DEPREE CHEMICAL CO.,
By CON DEPREE, General Manager.

To the same effect I have telegrams signed by the Pyramid Drug Co., of Marshall; Grant W. Stevens, president of the Retail Druggists' Association of Detroit; E. J. Heywood and F. H. Pepper, of Detroit; J. H. Webster, president of the Detroit Retail Druggists' Association; the Michigan Drug Co., of Detroit; and the Herpicide Co., of Detroit, which I ask to have referred to the Committee on Finance.

The VICE PRESIDENT. They will be so referred.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I desire to submit a number of telegrams just received by me protesting against the proposed tax on proprietary medicines. I do not care to have them read into the RECORD, because they are of the same general tenor as those submitted by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND], but I do ask to have the names of the protestants inserted in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the telegrams were referred to the Committee on Finance, and the names attached thereto were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Telegrams from B. E. Haney, of Portland; the Retail Druggists' Association of Portland; George Moulton, 639 Washington Street, Portland; the Plummer Drug Co., of Portland; the Brook Drug Co., of Portland; and Yelman & Bader, 800 Front Street, Portland, all in the State of Oregon.

Mr. FLETCHER. I have a telegram from the president of The Florida Metropolis to the same effect, which I should like to have printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the telegram was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

JACKSONVILLE, FLA., October 7.

Hon. D. U. FLETCHER,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

According to representations made to us by proprietary medicine manufacturers, we are convinced that war tax would impose unnecessarily severe hardship on them. We trust you will see your way clear to oppose a tax on people's medicines which will reach into the homes and tend to advertise and prolong hard times.

G. A. MCCLELLAN,
President The Florida Metropolis.

Mr. BURTON. I have three telegrams pertaining to the pend the revenue bill, which I ask to have read at the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read.

The Secretary read as follows:

CINCINNATI, OHIO, October 7, 1914.

Hon. THEODORE E. BURTON,
Washington, D. C.:

We emphatically protest against war tax on proprietary medicines, the people's medicines, in time of peace. Worst piece of politics the Democratic Party ever pulled off. If there must be a war tax, place it where it will not go into the homes of the people. Every stamp seen by the people will delay prosperity.

THE PAPE, THOMPSON & PAPE CO.

CINCINNATI, OHIO, October 7, 1914.

Hon. THEODORE E. BURTON,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

In behalf of 60,000 workers in the brewing industry, we enter emphatic protest against the unfair advance in the beer tax to $1.75 per barrel. Beer is the workingman's beverage, and we protest that the workers shall carry the entire burden. This tax will entail only burdens on the working class and on an industry which has been taxed to the limit, without protection from the Government. We are now facing extermination of the brewing industry in Ohio, Colorado, Washington, Oregon, and California, with State and National officials secretly working in favor of destroying what the Government considers its milch cow in time of need.

JOSEPH PROEBSTLE,
International Secretary,
International Union United Brewery Workmen.

CINCINNATI, OHIO, October 7, 1914.

Hon. THEODORE E. BURTON,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

If Democratic Party ever expects normal times, do not allow war stamps to be seen by the people. We protest strongly against proprietary medicine war tax, which stamps would be seen in every household in the United States. Is this underhanded work of doctors' trust? Every stamp acts as a red flag and advertises hard times and the soup house.

THE WALTER LUTHER DODGE CO.

Mr. GRONNA. I have here a telegram from Hon. J. T. Hardy, a distinguished citizen of my State, protesting against a tax on automobiles. It consists of only a couple of lines, and I ask to have it printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Finance.

There being no objection, the telegram was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FARGO, N. DAK., October 7, 1914.

Senator A. J. GRONNA,
Washington, D. C.:

The Fargo Automobile Club, 180 members, protest against proposed horsepower tax unless similar tax is levied on all wheeled vehicles. Letter follows.

J. P. HARDY, President.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I have received a telegram from E. A. Pat Paffrath, of Fort Worth, Tex., which I ask may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the telegram was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FORT WORTH, TEX., October 4, 1914.

Senator MORRIS SHEPPARD,
Washington, D. C.:

Am glad our people have observed peace Sunday as per request of our President, the greatest constructive living Christian statesman, but we should not forget to relieve the distress of our suffering cotton growers. If our Government could spend $400,000,000 to build the Panama Canal, why can't our Government lend $400,000,000 of its credit on cotton to our cotton farmers and relieve the commerce of our own people, and do it now and inspire our people with new hope?

E. A. PAT PAFFRATH.

Mr. PERKINS presented memorials of F. S. Albertson and Charles S. Wiley, of Long Beach, Cal.; the Bank of Corning and Maywood Garage, Corning, Cal.; F. O. Renstrom Co. and Pacific Kissel Car Branch, San Francisco, Cal., remonstrating against the proposed tax on automobiles, which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a memorial of Langley & Michaels Co., San Francisco, Cal., remonstrating against proposed tax on proprietary medicines, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented memorials of sundry automobile dealers of San Jose and San Francisco, in the State of California, remonstrating against the proposed tax on automobiles, which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented memorials of Kirk, Geary & Co., of Sacramento, Cal., remonstrating against proposed tax on drugs; Farmers & Merchants' Bank and First National Bank of Mountain View, Cal., against proposed tax on banks; and Chamber of Commerce of Sacramento, Cal., against the proposed tax on wines, which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

granting pensions to civil-service employees, which was referred to the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment.

He also presented a memorial of the Delaware Automobile Association, of Wilmington, Del., remonstrating against the proposed tax on gasoline and motor cars, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. SHIVELY presented petitions of the Northwest Indiana Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, in session at La Fayette, Ind., and of the Hoosier Winona Club, of Laporte, Ind., praying for national prohibition, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

THE SPLENDID CONDITION AND BUSINESS PROSPECTS OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, during the last few days, in view of the pending revenue measure, there has been much said in this body, on the other side of the Chamber, about the depressed financial condition of the country. There seems to be no appreciation of the fact that this revenue measure is not an additional revenue measure, but simply a measure for raising revenue from new sources. There seems to be no cognizance taken of the fact that the less revenue that is raised from one source the more revenue must be raised from another source, and that it amounts to no more, in the aggregate, to the people, who must bear it all in any event.

Last Saturday there were several addresses delivered on the Republican side of the Chamber which depicted in very gloomy terms the alleged depressed financial, industrial, and commercial condition of the country. The Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES], in making some strictures upon and criticism of the administration, quoted and read from the Washington Post. That is a paper which has been quoted very much in this Chamber in the last year in criticism of the Democratic administration.

In view of that fact, I send to the desk and ask to have read an editorial from the Washington Post of the 4th instant.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. That has already been printed in the RECORD.

Mr. SMOOT. I think that editorial was inserted in the RECORD on the request of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS].

Mr. FLETCHER. It is not the same.

Mr. MYERS. The Senator from Florida says it is not the same.

Mr. FLETCHER. The Senator from Colorado had an editorial printed which appeared in this morning's Post. The one offered by the Senator from Montana appeared on the 4th instant, I understand.

Mr. MYERS. It is a different article, but I will be satisfied if it be printed in the RECORD without reading.

Mr. SMOOT. That will be very much better, I think.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Montana?

Mr. JONES. I want to ask the Senator from Montana——

Mr. MYERS. I ask that the editorial be read, as some Senators around me desire it to be read. I will, however, yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. JONES. I understood the Senator from Montana referred to me as having placed some quotations from the Washington Post in my speech?

Mr. MYERS. I did.

Mr. JONES. The Senator said they were extensive. I do not remember inserting in my speech anything from the Post except about eight lines giving the imports of certain products; that is all.

Mr. MYERS. The Senator misunderstood me. I said the Senator had made reference to the Washington Post in the address he made on last Saturday, and further said that the Washington Post was a paper which had been very much quoted in the last year in criticism of the administration. I send to the desk and ask to have read the editorial referred to by me from the Washington Post of the 4th instant.

Mr. JONES. In that connection I wish to suggest to the Senator that I did not quote from the Post in criticism of the administration. I simply quoted from figures that it contained in regard to imports; that is all.

Mr. MYERS. I should like to have read the editorial I have sent to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the reading of the editorial?

Mr. OLIVER. I object to the reading of the editorial. I am perfectly willing that it shall be printed in the RECORD without reading.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is, Shall the editorial be read? [Putting the question.] The ayes seem to have it. The ayes have it, and the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

THE SPLENDID CONDITION AND BUSINESS PROSPECTS OF THE UNITED STATES.

The present and future condition of the United States affords ground for solid satisfaction and optimism among Americans who are best acquainted with its largest affairs.

The derangements caused by the war in Europe are temporary, and their effect is not so injurious as was feared at first. The aftermath will be permanent benefits to this country—an enormous expansion of business, which is even now in sight.

The public debt of the United States is very small in comparison with the immense wealth and resources of the country. The bonds of the United States are largely, if not almost wholly, held by Americans. This debt, interest and principal, can be paid without effort as it becomes due, and the money goes to our own people. In a broad sense it might be said that the United States is out of debt, with a huge surplus of wealth stored in its Treasury and among the people.

The private securities of American corporations held abroad are said to reach $4,000,000,000. If Americans were suddenly compelled to take over these securities, there would be good reason for anxiety, but no such condition exists. There is no way of dumping these securities upon the United States. We do not have to send gold to Europe in great quantities unless we wish to do so. The comparatively small amounts now going out are ample for obligations coming due. The banks are handling this business without difficulty, and no European nation has shown the slightest sign of uneasiness so far as its financial claims upon the United States are concerned.

Europe is in need of the food and necessities of life which are produced in such great abundance in this country. The slackening in the demand for cotton is but temporary. Cotton is a necessity under modern conditions. Europe will call for it in such quantities that the present supply and next year's crop will be absorbed, to say nothing of the increased demand for home manufacture. This staple represents wealth. It is a collateral security that will sustain the South, and the most far-sighted southerners are giving warning against radical curtailment of next year's crop. The world must have cotton, and it must buy it from the United States. Meanwhile it is held and owned by American citizens as an asset of enormous value.

While the war rages the stream of gold that was poured into Europe by travelers is checked at its source. It remains in the United States. It exceeds the entire amount of the war tax. This money will flow through the channels of American business and will practically offset all the damages inflicted by the war.

When the war ends Europe will tackle the job of rehabilitation. It will turn to the best market for food, clothing, building materials, bridges, railroad material, steel, coal, fuel oil, machinery, and all the supplies required in building up waste places and restoring communications and business. Every man in the United States engaged in production, every farm and factory will feel the impulse of prosperity created by this foreign demand.

The European nations, while just now engaged in burning up their property and their energies in the fires of war, are not exterminating themselves. What is lost must be restored. What is torn down must be rebuilt. The moment peace is declared this recuperative process will begin. It will be as widespread and as powerful for reconstruction as war is for destruction. The marvelous rapidity with which slopes on the very lips of Vesuvius are reclothed with vines and orchards, the magic which raised San Francisco from ashes, will be manifested throughout Europe when the millions now engaged in war turn their energies to restoration. Then they will draw upon the greatest storehouse of materials that exists in the world—the United States.

The demoralization of production in Europe and the needs of war are creating a big business for the United States; but this commerce is as nothing compared with the demand that will arise when Europe takes stock of its devastation and begins the task of rehabilitation.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, if that editorial shows anything, it shows conclusively that no special tax bill is necessary. The argument that it presents is all against the necessity for the proposed special taxes.

I have here a telegram from the Washington State Automobile Association expressing pleasure at the elimination of the special tax in regard to automobiles and gasoline. The telegram expresses this hope:

We sincerely hope a uniform policy of taxation against all users of highways and streets shall be allowed, if any are to be taxed, graduating the same on the mileage basis. This position is concurred in by the Automobile Club of Seattle and the Western Motor Car Magazine.

I have also a telegram opposing the tax on real-estate and loan brokers, which says:

This business is extraordinarily depressed nearly everywhere, immense competition here and probably elsewhere, and tax would break up hundreds of small brokers everywhere. Can not business affording reasonable income be substituted? Small broker, moderate sized city, should pay little compared with big broker in large city.

This is from Spokane and is signed by Mauser & Mauser, Dent Bros., C. A. Lindsay, O. E. Guernsey, Boyd & Sorsenson, and Colin Campbell.

I have also a telegram from the Northwest Motor Co., of Seattle, Wash., protesting against the proposed tax on automobiles. I ask that these several telegrams be referred to the Committee on Finance.

The VICE PRESIDENT. They will be so referred.

PROPOSED TAX ON FIRE INSURANCE POLICIES.

Mr. STERLING. I hold in my hand a letter from the commissioner of insurance of South Dakota relating to the proposed tax on fire insurance policies which I ask to have read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The Secretary read as follows:

CHICAGO, September 30, 1914.

Hon. THOMAS STERLING,
Senate Chamber, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: I desire to call your attention to a bill now pending in the Congress which passed the House on Friday of last week and known as Union Calendar 337, House bill 18891, introduced by Mr. UNDERWOOD, reported by the Ways and Means Committee, and entitled "A bill to increase the internal revenue, and for other purposes."

Upon page 281 of the printed bill, beginning at line 9, will be found a provision relating to "insurance—marine, inland, fire"—and, in substance, this provision requires the payment of a stamp tax upon each fire insurance policy amounting to one-half of 1 per cent of the premium.

This is copied from the old Spanish War tax, and the facts about the operation of that tax, as applied to fire insurance, are as follows:

No credits were allowed by the department in the administration of the Spanish War tax for any return premiums or amounts paid for reinsurance.

In 1913 the gross premiums of stock fire insurance companies in the United States were in round figures $474,000,000, and the net premiums were $324,000,000. In other words, there was returned to the policyholders by reason of the cancellation of policy contracts and amounts paid for reinsurance the sum of $150,000,000.

Every policy issued in the United States contains a provision that it may be canceled under certain conditions, either at the request of the insured or of the company, and it is also true that when the agents send in lines that they have solicited that are in excess of the net lines the companies will write the companies immediately relieve themselves of liability by reinsuring a portion of the line in some other company.

A transaction of this kind involves but one risk and one premium, and yet under the ruling of the department construing the Spanish War tax the company initially writing the business paid the tax, and also the reinsuring company, and when policies were canceled there was no means of securing any rebate for the tax upon the unearned and returned premium.

I do not understand that the companies are desiring to oppose this tax in a general way, but are asking that the bill as it passed the House be amended so that reinsurance will be exempt from taxation and the companies can obtain a rebate upon premiums returned upon canceled policies.

It seems very evident that under the ruling of the department in administering the Spanish War tax the companies were taxed twice upon these items of return premiums and reinsurance, and this could not have been the intention of the legislature.

I am inclined to believe that all departments of insurance will view this matter as I do. From my examination I am satisfied that the companies should have the amendment to the law, and I hope you will use such efforts as you can to secure it.

Yours, very truly,

O. K. STABLEIN,
Commissioner of Insurance, South Dakota.

PROPOSED TAX ON BROKERS.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I present a memorial signed by a number of brokers in the city of Spokane, Wash., protesting against a tax on real-estate and loan brokers. While the memorial is signed by a large number of brokers and citizens of Spokane, I will not ask that their names be printed, but I ask that the petition itself be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the memorial, omitting the signatures, was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SPOKANE, WASH., October 3, 1914.

Hon. MILES POINDEXTER.

DEAR SIR: In addition to the telegram already sent, we understand by the realty board of this city, we, the undersigned real-estate agents of this city, request you in every manner possible to protest against the imposition of a $50 war tax on brokers, so far as it affects the business of a real-estate and loan broker, for the following reasons:

First. The real-estate and loan broker of a city with 100,000 people, such as Spokane, should not be asked to pay as much as a broker of the city of the size, say, of New York City, Chicago, Cincinnati, etc.

Second. The business of real estate is to-day in no condition to stand a tax of $50, as people do not buy real estate here for cash to-day for speculation, and very little for homes, owing to present financial conditions, and we believe the same conditions to prevail in most, if not all, parts of the United States. The same conditions affect the loan broker.

Third. In our opinion, from what we understand, this tax, owing to said present conditions, would drive over one-half of the real-estate and loan agents out of business; therefore the Government would not derive the expected revenue from this source, and it would do better to tax an occupation more able to stand it. As in our opinion we reflect the views of most of the agents of this city, we urge you to oppose this part of the war-revenue bill.

JOHN MITCHELL.

Mr. CLAPP. From the Committee on Naval Affairs I report back favorably without amendment the bill (H. R. 12161) to remove the charge of desertion against John Mitchell, and I submit a report (No. 811) thereon. This is a bill which has already passed the House, and I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to the consideration of the bill, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, authorized to remove the charge of desertion against John Mitchell, who served on the U. S. S. Great Western, Oriole, and Huntress, and to issue to the said John Mitchell, or in case of his death to his heirs or other legal representatives, a certificate of discharge: Provided, That no pay or bounty for any period of time during which the said John Mitchell was absent from his command without leave of absence shall accrue or be payable by virtue of the passage of this act.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PENSIONS AND INCREASE OF PENSIONS.

Mr. SHIVELY. From the Committee on Pensions I report back favorably with an amendment the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 361) to correct certain errors in H. R. 12045, H. R. 12914, H. R. 13542, H. R. 14234, H. R. 14738, H. R. 15692, and H. R. 16294. It will take only a minute to pass the joint resolution, and I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration. (S. Rept. 809.)

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution, which had been reported from the Committee on Pensions with an amendment, to add at the end of the joint resolution the following:

That the item in the act (Private, No. 86, 63d Cong., 2d sess.) granting an increase of pension to Harriet E. Perkins be corrected and amended so as to read as follows:

"The name of Harriet E. Perkins, widow of Edwin C. Perkins, late of Company C, Twenty-second Regiment Massachusetts Volunteer Infantry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $20 per month in lieu of that she is now receiving."

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the joint resolution to be read the third time.

The joint resolution was read the third time and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A joint resolution to correct certain errors in H. R. 12045, H. R. 12914, H. R. 13542, H. R. 14234, H. R. 14738, H. R. 15692, and H. R. 16294, and for other purposes."

JOHN BROWNLOW ZIEGLER.

Mr. KERN. From the Committee on Privileges and Elections I report back favorably without amendment the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 192) granting American citizenship to John Brownlow Ziegler. On behalf of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. LANE] I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the joint resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution, which was read, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That John Brownlow Ziegler, residing in the city of Portland, county of Multnomah, State of Oregon, be, and he is hereby, unconditionally admitted to the character and privileges of a naturalized citizen of the United States.

Mr. SMOOT. For the RECORD I should like to have the Senator from Indiana state the facts in this case and why it is necessary to pass the joint resolution at this time.

Mr. KERN. The Senator from Oregon [Mr. LANE], I think, is familiar with the circumstances and is better able to explain the matter than am I.

Mr. LANE. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me, I will state that I am personally acquainted with the gentleman who is seeking to be readmitted to American citizenship. The facts in relation to the case are, I am informed, that a few years ago, when lands in Alberta, Canada, were being opened up on very advantageous terms to American citizens—Senators will remember that they were described as, and proved to be, great wheat-growing lands—Mr. Ziegler went up there for the purpose of taking advantage of that opportunity. He did not remain, but came back, I think, the same summer or fall, and made application for readmission to American citizenship, having applied during the time he was in Canada for citizenship in that country.

He has been nominated by the Progressives, the Prohibitionists, and the Democrats for the State legislature. He is a man who takes a great and intelligent interest in public affairs and is the author of an amendment to the city charter of Portland protecting the public right to the water front. The joint resolution is designed to afford him an opportunity to become again a citizen of the United States in time to be voted for at the election to represent the Democrats, the Progressives, and the Prohibitionists in the Oregon State Legislature.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator if Mr. Ziegler entered lands in Canada?

Mr. LANE. I think not. I am informed that he did not like the country and came home. He was misled, I am told, as to the value of the land and the opportunities there.

Mr. SMOOT. I know there were tens of thousands of Americans who went up there and who purchased land, but never took out their papers in that country.

Mr. LANE. Many people did that; they remained there until they raised a good crop and made some money, and then came home; they remained there only for one or two seasons.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, may I suggest to my colleague that there are precedents for just such a joint resolution as this, where emergencies have existed making it desirable that a person be admitted to American citizenship?

Mr. SMOOT. All I wanted was the information, so that it would appear in the RECORD.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I do not know that I shall object to this joint resolution, but, if I am not mistaken, measures of this nature have always been referred to the Committee on Immigration. It is true, as the Senator from Oregon has just said, that we have heretofore considered measures of this nature; we have had two of them, I think, at this session; but in both those cases the bills were referred to the Committee on Immigration, and I should like to know why this measure was referred to a different committee?

Mr. LANE. Mr. President, when I introduced the joint resolution, I will say for the information of the Senator, that I asked that it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, it being my assumption that it properly belonged to that committee; but a difference of opinion arose in the Senate as to the committee to which the bill should be referred. I did not care where it went, so long as it received consideration at the hands of a good, fair committee. The President of the Senate designated the Committee on Privileges and Elections to take charge of the joint resolution, as it seemed to relate to matters within the jurisdiction of that committee. There was no prejudice at all. As Senators will remember, at that time the Committee on the Judiciary was very busy in connection with another matter; but I think I asked that the bill be referred to that committee.

The man is not an immigrant; he was born in the State of Tennessee, and has lived all his life in this country, with the exception, perhaps, of six months, in which he was in the Province of Alberta, Canada. He is a native-born American.

Mr. GRONNA. He has never been a citizen of any other country?

Mr. LANE. He applied for citizenship in the Province of Alberta, but renounced it and came back home and made application to be readmitted to American citizenship.

Mr. GRONNA. I assume he took up land in Canada and that, in order to do so, he would have to sign the same papers and make the same agreement that every homesteader makes who desires to take up land in Canada; that he is subject to military duty in that country, and that he has to become a citizen of that country before he can make final proof of his homestead.

Mr. LANE. I think not. I think, if he did make application for land, that he relinquished his claim, for he came back the same season that he went to Alberta. He went there early in 1905, came back in the fall of 1905, and has resided in the city of Portland ever since.

I know when I was mayor of the city of Portland he was one of the most active citizens we had in the interest and behalf of the proper, careful, and economical expenditure of the public money. He was a good citizen. At times he was almost too critical; he watched affairs closely, and has been of material advantage to the city of Portland. I have said that he is the author of an amendment to the city charter providing a common-user clause for the streets and the lines of railway over streets and public property to the harbor. If he had been a citizen of Oregon 40 years ago, he would have saved that town $40,000,000 in the way of public property.

Mr. VARDAMAN. That is the sort of men we need in this country.

Mr. GRONNA. I desire to say to my friend from Oregon that I know of hundreds of men who have gone to Canada, men who were born in the United States, and who have always been citizens of the United States, who are now citizens of Canada or subjects of Great Britain. I find no fault with the Senator's resolution. I am not going to object to its consideration, but I should like to know why measures of this kind, which are of the highest importance, are sometimes referred to the Committee on Immigration, sometimes to the Committee on the Judiciary, and in this case the Committee on Privileges and Elections makes the report.

Mr. LANE. I will say to the Senator that really I do not know.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will answer the question and give the information. When this question was before the Senate a statement was made as to the condition of this man. There were suggestions that the joint resolution be referred to the Committee on Immigration, to the Committee on the Judiciary, and to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. After hearing a large number of Senators the Chair said that as this man was a native-born citizen and not a foreign-born citizen, if there was no objection the joint resolution would go to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. That is the way it was referred to that committee.

Mr. LANE. I will say also, for the information of the Senator, that a large number of good farmers and good citizens have left the Northwest, from the Senator's State and also from the State in which I reside, and have gone into Canada, for the reason that the lands were virgin soil and have raised large crops of wheat. Many of them have stayed there. If we can get any of the good ones to come back, I think it would be a good idea to do so.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution is in the Senate and open to amendment.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ELWIN CARLTON TAYLOR.

Mr. THORNTON. From the Committee on Naval Affairs I submit a favorable report on the bill (S. 6199) to reinstate Elwin Carlton Taylor as a passed assistant surgeon in the United States Navy. I call the attention of the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. HUGHES] to the bill.

Mr. HUGHES. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I ask the Senator from New Jersey to explain, in a few words, why this bill should be passed.

Mr. HUGHES. I can only refer the Senator to the letter of the Secretary of the Navy that there is great need for the services of this class of officers, and the record of this particular individual while in the service was of such a character that the Secretary states in his communication that while, as a general rule, he is opposed to legislation of this character, he regards the present case as sufficiently meritorious to justify him in asking Congress to take favorable action on the bill.

I was about to ask to have the letter read from the desk. It contains all the information I have on the subject. A similar bill has been unanimously passed by the House.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask that the letter from the Secretary of the Navy may be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read the letter, as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE NAVY,
Washington, August 18, 1914.

The CHAIRMAN COMMITTEE ON NAVAL AFFAIRS,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: In further reference to the memorandum of your committee of recent date, inclosing a copy of the bill (S. 6199) to reinstate Elwin Carlton Taylor as a passed assistant surgeon in the United States Navy, and requesting the views of the department thereon, I have the honor to inform you as follows:

Elwin Carlton Taylor was born May 7, 1875, and is now approximately 38 years and 10 months of age. He was appointed an assistant surgeon in the Navy October 12, 1903; was promoted to passed assistant surgeon October 12, 1906; and resigned March 12, 1908. He entered the Navy again June 27, 1912, as an acting assistant surgeon and is serving in that capacity at the present time. His total naval service amounts to about six years, and his record as an officer in the regular service and as an acting assistant surgeon is excellent.

Under date of March 4, 1914, the department, in commenting on the bill H. R. 7194, for the relief of this officer, recommended certain amendments to that bill. The proposed measure now under consideration (S. 6199) has embodied in it the recommendations contained in the department's letter of March 4, 1914.

While the department's general policy continues adverse to the enactment of special legislation and to legislation seeking to make an officer an extra number except in specially meritorious cases, nevertheless, in view of Dr. Taylor's creditable services in the Navy and to the need of medical officers with his experience, I recommend that favorable action be taken on the bill S. 6199.

Faithfully, yours, JOSEPHUS DANIELS,
Secretary of the Navy.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President of the United States, in his discretion, be, and he hereby is, authorized to appoint Acting Asst. Surg. Elwin Carlton Taylor, United States Navy, to the grade of passed assistant surgeon, United States Navy, as an additional number, to rank next after the fifty-ninth officer in lineal standing on the list of passed assistant surgeons, and that no back pay or allowances shall accrue as a result of the passage of this act: Provided, That the said Elwin Carlton Taylor shall be required to satisfactorily pass the usual examinations required by law to determine his physical, mental, moral, and professional fitness to perform the duties of the grade to which he is to be appointed.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT GASTONIA, N. C.

Mr. SWANSON. From the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds I report back favorably without amendment the bill (H. R. 17764) to provide for sale of portion of post-office site in Gastonia, N. C., and I submit a report (No. 810) thereon I call the attention of the junior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] to the bill.

Mr. OVERMAN. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to sell at public sale for a consideration of not less than $2,500 the following piece or parcel of land lying and being in the city of Gastonia, N. C., recently acquired by the Government of the United States for a public building, and more particularly described as follows: Beginning at the northeast corner of the site and running south 40 minutes east 58 feet to an iron pipe marking a corner of the site; thence west 6 degrees 33 minutes south 35 feet to an iron pipe; thence north no degrees 25 minutes west about 58 feet to the northern boundary of the site; thence east 6 degrees north about 35 feet to the place of beginning. And the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to execute a quitclaim deed to the purchaser of the foregoing piece of land, which shall transfer title from the United States to such purchaser.

SEC. 2. That the proceeds arising from the sale of the property described be covered into the Treasury of the United States as a miscellaneous receipt.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

VANCE PARK, CHARLOTTE, N. C.

Mr. SWANSON. From the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds I report back favorably without amendment the bill (H. R. 15575) donating the old iron fence around Vance Park, Charlotte, N. C., to the Mecklenburg Declaration of Independence Chapter, to be placed around Craighead Cemetery, near Sugar Creek Church, in Mecklenburg County, and I submit a report (No. 812) thereon.

Mr. OVERMAN. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill. It is a brief bill and local in its character.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the old iron fence around Vance Park, in the city of Charlotte, N. C., now being removed in the construction of a United States post-office and courthouse building, is hereby donated to the Mecklenburg Declaration of Independence Chapter, Daughters of the American Revolution, Charlotte, N. C., for the purpose of being placed around the historic revolutionary Craighead Cemetery, near Sugar Creek Church, in Mecklenburg County: Provided, That without expense to the United States the grounds shall be left in good condition upon the removal of the fence, including any proper and incidental repairs.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOSEPH P. LEITER.

Mr. FLETCHER. From the Committee on Military Affairs I report back adversely the bill (H. R. 10719) for the relief of Joseph P. Leiter, and I submit a report (No. 808) thereon. I suppose the proper order would be to request that the bill be indefinitely postponed. I believe, however, the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] is somewhat interested in the bill, and I desire to call his attention to it. As I have just stated, it is a bill for the relief of Joseph P. Leiter. If the Senator from Ohio prefers, the bill may go to the calendar.

Mr. BURTON. I should prefer to have the bill go to the calendar.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed on the calendar.

AGRICULTURAL COOPERATION AND RURAL CREDIT IN EUROPE.

Mr. FLETCHER. From the Committee on Printing I report back favorably with an amendment Senate resolution 404, submitted by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] June 26, and I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There was no objection.

The amendment of the Committee on Printing was, in line 1, before the word "thousand," to strike out "twenty" and insert "ten."

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That 10,000 additional copies of part 1 of Senate Document No. 261, "Agricultural Cooperation and Rural Credit in Europe," be printed for the use of the Senate document room.

DANISH AGRICULTURE (S. DOC. NO. 589).

Mr. FLETCHER. On June 26 I presented to the Senate a manuscript entitled "Danish Agriculture," being an address delivered by Hon. Rudolf Schou, counselor of state, of Copenhagen, Denmark, and it was referred to the Committee on Printing for action. I am directed by the Committee on Printing to report a resolution, for which I ask present consideration.

The resolution (S. Res. 464) was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the manuscript submitted by Mr. FLETCHER on June 26, 1914, entitled "Danish Agriculture," an address delivered by Hon. Rudolf Schou, counselor of state, Copenhagen, Denmark, be printed as a Senate document.

DEVELOPMENT OF THE WEST (S. DOC. NO. 588).

Mr. FLETCHER. On September 12 the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] presented two articles on western topics, and they were referred to the Committee on Printing for action. I am directed by the Committee on Printing to report the following resolution and ask for its present consideration.

The resolution (S. Res. 463) was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the manuscript submitted by Mr. ASHURST on September 12, 1914, entitled "Development of the West," being a series of articles on western topics by Hon. FRANCIS G. NEWLANDS, United States Senator from Nevada, be printed as a Senate document.

THE CHESAPEAKE & DELAWARE CANAL.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I submit a resolution for which I ask immediate consideration. It is self-explanatory, and simply requests information.

Mr. SMOOT. Let the resolution be read.

Mr. BRYAN. I ask that the resolution may be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the resolution.

The resolution (S. Res. 465) was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War is hereby directed to furnish for the use of the Senate such information as he can secure as to the price at which the existing Chesapeake & Delaware Canal and all the property, rights of property, franchises, and appurtenances used or required in connection therewith or appertaining thereto can be purchased; and

Resolved further, That the Secretary of War is directed to secure, prepare, and report to the Senate summaries of reports of Government commissions, officers, and engineers heretofore made, and such facts, information, and opinions of the boards or officers of the Army and Navy as he may deem proper or pertinent as to the advantage or disadvantages, commercial, naval, and military, of the acquisition of said canal by the United States.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, I am not going to object to the resolution, but I think it comes very near to a violation of the statute, which is to the effect that after one report has been made upon any river and harbor project no other or further report shall be made without the action of Congress, by concurrent resolution or otherwise. I query whether the Secretary of War, under that statutory provision, is justified in giving the information asked for in this resolution. That, however, is a question for him to decide.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I may say that there have been so many reports made heretofore on this matter that it is very desirable, I think, that there shall be summaries furnished of those reports and of the various opinions which have been rendered. That is the only object of the resolution. Doubtless the resolution can not be complied with because of the large amount of official information now on file; and to prevent any misconception or misrepresentation regarding this matter, so that we may have the facts before us, I have introduced this resolution, that they may be condensed and furnished the Senate, so that they may be available when desired. I thought the Senator would not object to the resolution, and I offered it with the concurrence of the acting chairman of the Committee on Commerce. There has been so much said on this subject that I wanted the latest and most complete summary of all the official information to be had.

Mr. BURTON. The resolution, however, goes a little further than that. It asks the Secretary of War to report the price at which the canal can be purchased.

Mr. SAULSBURY. That is true. There is no doubt of that.

Mr. BURTON. There are two distinct subjects in the resolution. So far as it is a request for a mere summary of existing documents, I do not think any objection would lie under the law; but the War Department necessarily should be very careful not to violate the statute to the effect that further reports shall not be made without the authorization of Congress; otherwise, favoritism will prevail. In past years numerous efforts were made to obtain reports, the furnishing of which would have been an evasion of the law, and I think finally the War Department adopted the rule that no such report would be made without the concurrent action of both Houses of Congress.

The resolution was considered, by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

THE INITIATIVE AND REFERENDUM.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I ask permission to insert in the RECORD a memorandum relating to the initiative and referendum, explaining what it is, where it is in use, and how it works.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection?

Mr. SMOOT. I will ask the Senator if this memorandum is any different from that which we have had printed before as public documents?

Mr. OWEN. Yes. It is simply a short explanation of what the initiative and referendum is.

Mr. SMOOT. I was counting the other day the number of articles upon the same subject we have had printed as public documents, and I found that we already have had 33 of them printed. Of course I am not going to object to this, but really I want to say that I should like to see the day arrive when our CONGRESSIONAL RECORD will be a record of what is done in Congress, and will not be filled with editorials from every paper in the United States, not filled with the correspondence of all the Senators and Members of Congress, and not filled with extraneous stuff to the amount of about 70 per cent of the whole RECORD. I want to live to see that day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There being no objection, the request of the Senator from Oklahoma is granted.

The matter referred to is as follows:

THE INITIATIVE AND REFERENDUM—WHAT IT IS—WHERE IT IS IN USE—HOW IT WORKS.

What is direct legislation?

Direct legislation is the right of the people to enact or reject laws by their votes at the polls, just as they now vote upon candidates or constitutional amendments. It is exercised through the initiative and referendum.

What is the "initiative"?

The initiative is a method by which the people can propose a law or constitutional amendment by petition. The petition is filed with the secretary of state four months prior to a general election, and submitted by him to the voters at the ensuing election. If a majority of the voters voting on the question vote "yes," the law is enacted and goes into operation. If a majority vote "no," it is rejected. Example: The people of Maine for years demanded a direct primary law. The legislature refused to pass it. An initiative petition, signed by 12,000 voters, was filed. The law was submitted at the general election of 1911 and adopted by a vote of 65,810 to 21,774. It has since been in operation.

What is the "referendum"?

The referendum is a method by which the people may reject at the polls acts of the legislature which do not suit them. A petition against a law must be filed within 90 days after the legislature adjourns. The law is then suspended and a vote is taken upon it at the next general election. If a majority vote "no," the law is vetoed; if "yes," the legislature is sustained. Example: The Legislature of South Dakota passed a State militia bill. It was opposed because it put an added heavy expense on the taxpayers and because the people were against militarism. A referendum petition was filed, the bill was suspended from operation, and rejected at the general election of 1910 by a vote of 57,440 "no" to 17,854 "yes." And so the law was "vetoed" by the people.

Are the initiative and referendum "new" and "revolutionary" doctrines?

No. From the beginning of our Government, the American people have retained the right to vote on certain questions, such as State constitutions, bond issues, city charters, location of State and county seats of government, boundary lines, local option, etc. Also they have voted on amendments to State constitutions, city charters, and occasional laws, but only when the legislature would permit them. The initiative and referendum give the people the power to vote on any measure they desire and when they want to, without the permission of the legislature.

How large petitions are required?

Eight per cent of the voters of a State are usually required on initiative petitions and 5 per cent upon referendum petitions. A better system is to require a flat number of signatures. The splendid amendment pending in Mississippi requires 7,500 qualified voters upon initiative petitions and 6,000 for the referendum. Maine requires 12,000 for the initiative and 10,000 for the referendum. One man in convention or legislature can make a motion and 10,000 citizens combined should not be denied this right.

Why do we need the initiative and referendum?

"The methods of our legislatures make the operations of political machines easy, for very little of our legislation is formed and effected by open debate upon the floor. Almost all of it is framed in lawyers' offices, discussed in committee rooms, and passed without debate. Bills that the machine and its backers do not desire are smothered in committee; measures which they do desire are brought out and hurried through their passage. It happens again and again that great groups of such bills are rushed through in the hurried hours that mark the close of the legislative sessions, when every one's vigilance is weakened by fatigue and when it is possible to do secret things.

"When we stand in the presence of these things and see how complete and sinister their operation has been, we cry out with no little truth that we no longer have representative government. * * *

"If we felt that we had genuine representative government in our State legislatures no one would propose the initiative and referendum in America. They are being proposed now as a means of bringing our representatives back to the consciousness that what they are bound in duty and in mere policy to do is to represent the sovereign people whom they profess to serve, and not the private interests which creep into their counsels by way of machine orders and committee conferences. * * *

"It must be remembered by every candid man who discusses these matters that we are contrasting the operation of the initiative and referendum not with the representative government which we have in theory, but with the actual state of affairs."—(President Woodrow Wilson, in an address at Kansas City, May 5, 1911.)

Who favor and who oppose direct legislation?

The men of every political party who believe in the American doctrine of government by the people are favorable. It has been adopted in the platforms of all political parties at various times and places. Organizations of the producing classes, such as farm and labor organizations, reform organizations, etc., are especially strong for it. It is strenuously—but often secretly—opposed by all reactionary politicians, all the big trusts and corporations, nearly all the corporation lawyers, and every corrupt political boss in the United States. This is the line-up.

Where are they in operation?

In many States and in a large number of cities throughout the Nation. The following is a table of the 17 States in which initiative and referendum amendments to the State constitutions have been submitted by the legislatures and adopted by the people:

[From Bulletin No. 1, issued by the bureau of information of the National Popular Government League. Compiled by Judson King, executive secretary, Washington, D. C.]

[1] Amendment not self-executing; legislature has refused to pass an enabling act hence people have never been able to use it.
[2] Referendum only; initiative added.

Is the movement growing?

Yes; and rapidly. Initiative and referendum amendments will be voted upon at the general election November 3, 1914, in the States of Mississippi, Wisconsin, Minnesota, North Dakota, Texas, and Maryland. It is a live political issue in nearly every other State.

BRYAN FOR THE MISSISSIPPI AMENDMENT.

Hon. William Jennings Bryan, Secretary of State, has written a letter indorsing the Mississippi amendment and urging its adoption. It shows his attitude upon the initiative and referendum. He says, in part:

"I am gratified to learn that the Legislature of Mississippi at its last session submitted a constitutional amendment providing for the initiative and referendum. I have examined the amendment and believe it to be one of the best submitted. As you know, I have for a number of years been an active advocate of the initiative and referendum. We put it in our State platform in Nebraska 18 years ago, and since that time I have spoken for it in many States.

A DEMOCRATIC PRINCIPLE.

"The principles underlying the initiative and referendum are so democratic that these reforms are sure to commend themselves to the Democratic Party. It is commending itself, too, to a large majority of the Republican Party, who at heart have faith in the capacity of the people for self-government. There are only two objections that can be honestly made to the initiative and referendum. One is the aristocratic objection, which is based upon the lack of confidence in the masses, and the other the plutocratic, which is based upon the idea that the masses can not be trusted to deal justly with property interests.

THE PEOPLE CAN BE TRUSTED.

"Both of these objections are groundless. The masses have proven, wherever given an opportunity, their ability to deal with questions of government. The aristocratic idea of representative government is that the people themselves are not intelligent enough to decide public questions, but should select a few superior men to think for them and act for them. This reasoning is, of course, fallacious as well as undemocratic. The people can act more intelligently upon a proposed reform of government than they can upon an individual, because they can understand a proposed reform better than they can a person; and then, too, a proposed reform does not change after the election, while the individual may.

THE PLUTOCRATS ARE WRONG.

"The plutocratic argument against the initiative and referendum is equally unsound. The people are conservative; they can be trusted not to violate the rights of property. Experience will show that violations of property rights are more often traceable to the avarice of those who are able to obtain a monopoly than to the masses, who can have no selfish interest in the doing of injustice.

THE DANGER FROM NEGLECT.

"I have no doubt that a majority of those who vote upon the proposed amendment will vote for it; the only danger in Mississippi is the danger that the friends of the initiative and referendum had to encounter in Arkansas, namely, the failure to vote. Your constitution requires that the amendment shall receive not merely a majority of the votes cast upon that subject but a majority of all votes cast at that election, and experience shows that a great many people fail to vote on amendments unless an active campaign is waged to bring the amendment clearly to the attention of the people. I hope, therefore, that those in favor of the initiative and referendum will see to it that every voter is reminded of the fact that the amendment is to be acted upon, so that it will not be lost by failure of some of the voters to express themselves on this particular subject.

"I regard the initiative and referendum as the greatest modern improvement in the strengthening of representative government."

SENATOR LA FOLLETTE URGES ADOPTION OF THE INITIATIVE AND REFERENDUM IN WISCONSIN.

United States Senator LA FOLLETTE, of Wisconsin, is a distinguished champion of popular government. In urging the adoption of the pending amendment in his own State he says:

"For years the American people have been engaged in a terrific struggle with the allied forces of organized wealth and political corruption. Battles have been won and lost. The unequal contest goes on. The lesson is obvious. The people must have in reserve new weapons for every emergency if they are to regain and preserve control of their Government.

"The forces of special privilege are deeply intrenched. Their resources are inexhaustible. Their efforts never relax. Their political methods are insidious. It is impossible for the people to maintain perfect organization in mass. They are often taken unawares and are liable to lose at one stroke the achievements of years of effort. In such a crisis nothing but the united power of the people expressed directly through the ballot can overcome the enemy.

"Through the initiative, referendum, and recall the people in any emergency can absolutely control. The initiative and referendum make it possible for them to demand a direct vote and repeal bad laws which have been enacted, or to enact by direct vote good measures which their representatives refuse to consider. The recall enables the people to dismiss from public service those representatives who dishonor their commissions by betraying the public interest. These measures will prove so effective a check against unworthy representatives that it will rarely be found necessary to invoke them.

"If there is a State in this Nation in which the people are capable of deciding questions for themselves, it is Wisconsin. We should adopt the initiative, referendum, and recall by an overwhelming vote on November 3."

How has direct legislation worked in the States where it has been tried?

It has worked well. Although reactionary politicians in these States would be delighted to have the initiative and referendum abolished, they do not dare to start a movement for their repeal. They know it would spell their political death, because the people believe in the initiative and referendum and value it highly, especially after they have used it a few years. The experience of all these States can be summed up in a recent statement by Mr. William Spence, master of the farmers State Grange of Oregon, in which he said:

"The common people of Oregon would not give up the referendum. It has done too much good. No one fights against it here but the corporations and grafting politicians it has put out of a job."

The corporation newspapers and lawyers are trying to convince the people of other States that the initiative and referendum have failed where tried. What hurts them is that the people are using their power for their own benefit and not for the benefit of the interests. The Government is passing from the hands of the bosses into the hands of the people. The bosses do not like it and that is the whole story in a nutshell.

Was not this Nation founded upon the principle of "representative government," and is not the initiative and referendum in conflict with that principle?

Former Senator Joseph W. Bailey, of Texas, made this contention the chief basis of an attack upon initiative and referendum at the time he retired from the United States Senate, and it is being widely used by reactionaries throughout the Nation. Senator Bailey's argument was completely annihilated by Senator ROBERT L. OWEN, of Oklahoma, in reply to Bailey. Here is a quotation:

"This Republic was not founded on any so-called 'representative principle.' The representative is merely a convenience, a servant, an agency, subject of right to the direct control of the people.

"This Republic was founded on the principle that the people were sovereign and had a right, if they pleased, to manage their business directly, a God-given right, vested in them, inalienable and indefeasible, and directly to alter, amend, or abolish any law. Every State constitution declares and exemplifies this fundamental principle. Every State constitution, except one, was established by the direct lawmaking power of the people.

"The option to use the initiative and referendum is not in conflict with the present convenient system of legislating through representatives, but is in harmony with that system and makes it more representative, not less representative."

[NOTE.—Senator OWEN'S complete speech, entitled "People's Rule v. Boss Rule," can be had upon application to the National Popular Government League, Washington, D. C.]

ANSWERS TO OBJECTIONS.

The following are the most familiar objections made to the establishment of the initiative and referendum and answers by eminent public men.

I. THE PEOPLE ARE NOT INTELLIGENT ENOUGH TO VOTE UPON LAWS.

"The alleged ignorance of the people has been urged in all ages against progress in government. It was the chief argument made against the establishment of the American Republic. Some ultra-conservative people may honestly believe the people are incompetent, but the objection is usually made by those who fear the intelligence, not the ignorance, of the people.

"The judgment of a whole State, expressed at the ballot box, after full discussion and opportunity for information, which the State should furnish, is about the safest guide in the affairs of government I know of.

"Our whole system of government assumes the capacity of the people to judge the worth of legislative acts. We elect men upon the measures they advocate or oppose. We reelect them or not, as we think the measures they have enacted good or bad. Is it not absurd, then, to hold that the people have brains enough to vote upon the men but not intelligence enough to vote upon the measures themselves, printed in black and white? I confess it is a mystery to me how some men can conceive the people to be 'intelligent citizens' just before election and 'an irresponsible mob' immediately after election." (Hon. GEORGE W. NORRIS, United States Senator from Nebraska.)

II. WHAT IS THE USE OF THE LEGISLATURE IF THE PEOPLE ARE TO ENACT LAWS?

"The initiative and referendum do not abolish the legislature or the need for one. They are called into action only in emergencies, when the legislature fails to accomplish the will of the people, and usually upon important questions. Since the initiative and referendum were established in Oregon over 98 per cent of the laws have been enacted by the legislature. In other States the percentage is higher than this." (Hon. ROBERT CROSSER, Congressman at large from Ohio and author of the Ohio provision for the initiative and referendum.)

III. THERE WOULD BE TOO MANY ELECTIONS, AND THE COST WOULD BANKRUPT THE STATE.

"Men making this objection are either misinformed or willfully misstating the truth. All initiative and referendum provisions require that questions submitted to the people through popular petition should be voted upon at the regular general elections. Special elections can only be held on questions of immediate moment and magnitude, and then only when especially ordered by the State legislature or by the governor, as may be provided by law. In 11 years the initiative and referendum has cost the people of Oregon but a few cents apiece." (Hon. MOSES E. CLAPP, United States Senator from Minnesota.)

IV. THERE WOULD BE TOO MANY QUESTIONS ON THE BALLOT, AND THE PEOPLE WOULD BECOME CONFUSED.

"In the last three elections, due largely to the failure of the legislature to carry out the will of the people, a relatively large number of questions have been submitted in Oregon through the initiative and referendum. Political experts have been astonished at the ease and intelligence with which the voters dispose of these questions. The citizens of Oregon are not worried, but there seems to be great alarm among eastern newspaper editors lest the minds of our people be overstrained. I fear that the fact that we are voting on vital issues, which certain people would not like to see raised, is what troubles some. The people of Oregon consider that they are as capable of deciding on 30 measures with 4 months' preparation and more as the legislature is on 824 measures in 40 days." (William S. U'Ren, father of the "Oregon system.")

"Up to 1912, 11 States have secured working State-wide initiative and referendum amendments—6 good ones, the others limited or defective. From 1898, to and including 1912 election, there were voted upon in those States a total of 176 initiative and referendum measures, placed on the ballot by petition, as shown by the following table:

[1] None from 1898 to 1908.
[2] Had referendum only. Amendments and laws submitted by legislature not included.

V. THE SYSTEM IS TOO EXPENSIVE.

"The most expensive government in the world is that managed by a privileged few. The less democratic the more costly—witness Russia or the frightful squandering of the public funds in States controlled by political machines. The referendum is the greatest foe to extravagance in public affairs known—witness the results in Oregon, South Dakota, Montana, and other States. Since measures are ordinarily submitted at general elections the added cost is but slight. If the State adopts the expensive and inefficient system of publishing pending measures in newspapers, this cost will be quite heavy, but if they adopt the Oregon, Arizona, and California plan of sending a pamphlet to the voters the expenses will be but a few thousand dollars for the entire State and the education of the voters by this means is worth a thousand times more than it costs." (Hon. Carl Schurz Vrooman, Assistant Secretary of Agriculture.)

VI. HOW WILL THE PEOPLE BE INFORMED SO AS TO VOTE INTELLIGENTLY ON PENDING QUESTIONS? BY PUBLICITY PAMPHLETS ISSUED BY THE STATE TO EACH CITIZEN.

"The problem of educating voters upon questions submitted under the initiative and referendum has been solved in California by having the secretary of state send to the voters through the mails a little pamphlet containing copies of the proposed laws, a reprint of the ballot title, and also with explanatory arguments for and against each measure. In Oregon the system also includes the right of citizens or organization to present arguments, they paying the exact cost of the space taken. These pamphlets are read and studied by an unexpectedly large proportion of our citizens and who are thereby enabled to vote intelligently. I consider the pamphlet system of great importance, as it is far better and cheaper than newspaper advertising." (Dr. John Randolph Haynes, Los Angeles, father of direct legislation in California.)

VII. IF WE HAVE DIRECT LEGISLATION, THE COLORED PEOPLE AND FOREIGNERS WILL CONTROL THE GOVERNMENT.

"During our campaign for the initiative and referendum in Arkansas in 1910 every conceivable argument calculated to frighten the voters into rejecting these people's rule measures was brought against us by the reactionary few.

"We were told that 'legalized anarchy' would follow its adoption; that there would a 'French Revolution'; that we would 'lapse into barbarism'; and as a crowning absurdity we were warned that with the initiative and referendum 'the State would be controlled by negroes.' My answer to this tirade was, and is now, that this is a white man's country and white men will continue to govern it, and that what the predatory corporations, their lawyers, and politicians feared was the white people's intelligence and not the negro's ignorance. Also that it was foolish to talk about anarchy unless a majority of the people were anarchists, since nothing could be done to which a majority of the voters did not agree and that it was an insult to call the voters anarchists." (Hon. George W. Donaghey, former governor of Arkansas.)

The way to handle that portion of the "foreign vote" which can be purchased, or any other class of purchasable voters, is the enactment of a stringent corrupt-practices act which will put in jail the men who try to bribe them. As a matter of fact, election returns show that the ignorant and careless voters of any class do not vote upon initiative and referendum questions. It requires too much intelligence.

THE DANGER FROM "JOKERS."

To work successfully, initiative and referendum provisions must be drawn with exceeding care. The people of Oregon have accomplished great results, because they have the best system produced to 1912. California and Arizona are also good. The chief "jokers" and so-called "safeguards and restrictions" which destroy the efficiency of the "initiative and referendum" are as follows:

First. To require a large number of signatures to petitions or put hampering restrictions upon the people in securing them.

Second. To insert a clause which permits the legislature to deny the people the right of a referendum on anything the legislature declares to call an "emergency."

Third. To deny the right of referendum upon all appropriations.

Fourth. To deny the right of the people to initiate an amendment to the State constitution.

Fifth. To require a majority of the votes cast for candidates "in the election" as necessary to enact measures instead of a majority of the vote cast "on the question."

Sixth. To require pending measures to be advertised only in newspapers. This is frightfully expensive and inadequate. The pamphlet system is the only cheap and effective plan.

WHERE TO GET INFORMATION.

The National Popular Government League, a nonpartisan organization, maintains a bureau of information upon every phase of the initiative, referendum, recall, and other measures designed to place more political power in the hands of the people.

CLAIM OF NORWAY (H. DOC. NO. 1172).

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which was read:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith a report from the Secretary of State in relation to a claim presented by the Government of Norway against this Government on account of the action of the authorities of Hudson County, N. J., in holding for their appearance as witnesses in a criminal case in that county, in violation of treaty provisions between the United States and Norway, as the Norwegian Government alleges, three members of the crew of a Norwegian ship called the Ingrid, and I recommend that, as an act of grace, and without reference to the question of the liability of the United States, an appropriation be made to effect a settlement of this claim in accordance with the recommendation of the Secretary of State.

WOODROW WILSON.

THE WHITE HOUSE, October 7, 1914.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, I understand that the message will be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It was the impression of the Chair that it should go there before going to the Committee on Appropriations in order to obtain the opinion of the Committee on Foreign Relations, and it will be so referred.

THE COTTON SITUATION IN THE SOUTH.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The morning business is closed.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I gave notice that to-day, immediately after the conclusion of the morning business, I would address the Senate on the subject of the cotton situation in the South. On October 3 I published a letter in the papers of Alabama, which has had very wide circulation. Preliminary to the remarks that I intend to submit I desire to read that letter to the Senate. It is as follows:

"UNITED STATES SENATE,
"Washington, D. C., October 3, 1914.

"To the people of Alabama:

"As one of the representatives from the South interested in the production of cotton, I feel a deep sense of responsibility in the emergency confronting the cotton-growing section of our country as a result of the sudden European war.

"I have given to the subject my earnest thought and anxious solicitude. I had hoped the recent conference of governors with Members of Congress from the cotton-growing States would work out some feasible plan for handling the situation. It developed that nothing could be agreed upon. The governors insisted upon Federal aid, while the Members of Congress contended that it was impossible to secure legislation by Congress either for the purchase of cotton or for lending money directly to the farmer with the cotton as security. The truth is that if every Senator and Congressman from the cotton-growing States should drop every other subject and give his entire attention to a bill providing that the Government should buy a portion of the cotton crop at a fixed price or loan money directly to the farmer, secured by the cotton, at a certain price, it would be impossible to secure the passage of such a bill.

"The cotton-growing States have 20 Senators out of 96 and 98 Congressmen out of 435. The people of the other States are interested in the low price of cotton, just as our people are interested in cheaper flour and woolen goods. The producers of many other articles are likewise in distress as a result of the war and are looking about for relief.

"When it is proposed that the Government should buy or lend on cotton the suggestion is promptly made to include copper, tobacco, naval stores, and various things produced by other sections of the country. With the character and volume of opposition to any legislation looking to the special relief of the cotton grower it would be impossible to secure a vote before time to plant the next crop, even if a bill could be framed at all that would command sufficient votes to pass it.

"I feel it to be my duty to the people of Alabama to notify them that their representatives in Washington can secure no legislation looking to the purchase of cotton or lending of money to the farmer on his cotton as security. Certainly no legislation can be secured in time to relieve the present distressing condition.

"I think it would be wicked for me to hold out any false hope to our people. It is the duty of a representative, according to my conception, to deal frankly and candidly with the people. If he realizes he can not secure the relief they desire, he should so advise them, so that they will not build their hopes and make their plans upon a foundation of sand.

"Every Senator and Congressman in Washington who knows anything about the situation and is candid enough to admit it realizes that no law can be passed at this time for the Government to buy cotton or to loan money direct to the farmer.

"I have given careful and serious consideration to all the plans that have been proposed for temporary or permanent relief. I realize that the real trouble is just beginning, and that our people do not yet entirely appreciate the serious situation ahead of them. All who are well informed believe that the war will not soon end. The time for the payment of debts is arriving. The farmer owes the retail merchant. The retail merchant is indebted to the wholesale merchant and the bank. The wholesale merchant owes the bank. The farmer has nothing with which to pay except his cotton, for which there is no market. I doubt if the crop could be sold under present conditions for 6 cents a pound. I am told that eastern spinners are talking of being able to buy their supply at 3 cents a pound.

"This crop was raised at a cost of about 10 cents, and a sale at a less price will result in loss. After the present crop had been grown this great crisis arose without the fault of the farmer, and if he can not get above cost for his cotton he can not pay what he owes the merchant. If he can not pay the merchant, the merchant can not pay the wholesaler or the bank. What is the result? Judgments, executions, sales, sacrifice of property, bankruptcy, and debts unpaid.

"Is there any way to avoid this great calamity? I think there is. I beg to suggest a plan which, in my judgment, will bring relief. I have submitted it to some of the best financiers of the country, who tell me it is feasible, sound, and practicable, and will make an oasis of Alabama in the cotton desert.

"In brief, and without too many details, it is as follows:

"Let the governor call a special session of the legislature at once for consideration of the cotton situation alone. The danger of ruin is so great that no member would dare trifle with the welfare of the people by trying to inject partisan politics into its deliberations. Have the legislature submit to the people in a special session called as quickly as possible an amendment to the constitution authorizing the State to issue bonds in the sum of $40,000,000. The bonds should be issued in denominations of $10, $20, $50, $100, and $1,000. It is estimated that the crop in Alabama for this year will amount to 1,600,000 bales, if it is all gathered. The State should buy one-half of the crop of each Alabama producer at 10 cents a pound. One-half of this crop would be 800,000 bales, which at 10 cents per pound would require an issue of $40,000,000 worth of bonds.

"It is impossible at this time to sell bonds in the open market, so that it will be necessary to pay for the cotton bought by the State with these bonds. The legislature should also provide that they be accepted for all taxes, both State and county.

"If I am asked how the State of Alabama would pay its obligations to the citizens, the answer is that the patriotic people of Alabama would accept these notes of the State for all demands. School-teachers, the old soldiers, officeholders, and any class would be glad to accept them, because they can pay and discharge their obligations with them. Of course all the taxes in Alabama would not be paid with these notes or bonds. Abundant currency would be available to pay the interest on the State bonds or other obligations required to be paid in currency."

And I allude to the bonded indebtedness of Alabama heretofore issued.

"It should also provide a warehouse system or authorize the counties to establish warehouses under such rules and regulations as the legislature may in its wisdom prescribe.

"Under the proposed plan a farmer would take his cotton to the warehouse and secure a warrant. He would then take his warehouse warrant to the probate judge, or some other agent designated by the State, and get bonds for his cotton at 10 cents per pound."

Or, rather, he would get the State's notes for the cotton.

"The question will be asked. What will the farmer do with the bonds? His merchant will accept them in payments of debts or for the sale of merchandise. The banks will accept the bonds in payment of notes and mortgages. Is there a merchant or banker who would not prefer to have a State bond with the State's credit behind it and secured by cotton deposited in bonded warehouses than a debt against a man who had no means of paying it? It may be asked, How will the merchant pay his debts with these bonds? The answer is, The bank will accept them in payment of notes and mortgages. The national banks can send them to Washington and get 90 per cent in currency on them, and when the State is ready to redeem them will get the other 10 per cent.

"The small bonds or State cotton warrants in denominations of $10, $20, and $50 should not bear any interest. They will readily pass from hand to hand so that one $10 warrant may pay hundreds of dollars of debts, and one $50 warrant may pay thousands of dollars of debts under this process of liquidation. They would find their way into the hands of the bank, who would surrender them to the State for retirement and receive in lieu thereof Alabama State cotton bonds bearing 4 per cent interest. Under the provisions of the Aldrich-Vreeland Act or the regional bank act banks could send them to the Treasury at Washington and obtain 90 per cent in currency, which would enter into circulation in the same community in which the cotton warrant had been circulated.

"The State cotton bonds should be payable on or before three years from issue, with interest payable annually. This interest should be provided for by the levy of a tax of $1 or more per bale, according to the discretion of the legislature, on that portion of the present crop sold to the State, and the levy of a tax of 50 cents a bale, if that amount appeared to be necessary, on the next year's crop, and 25 cents an acre on all land planted in cotton next year. This should be continued until the cotton purchased by the State is disposed of.

"It is estimated that 4,000,000 acres were planted in cotton this year in Alabama. If the present situation, aided by the tax, should reduce the acreage and crop next year by one-third, the State would have, with which to pay interest and carrying charges, when the first year's interest falls due, the following funds:

Interest on $40,000,000 of bonds, at 4 per cent	$1,600,000
Tax on cotton bought by the State	800,000
Tax on 1915 crop	500,000
Tax on 1915 acreage	666,666
Total	1,966,666
Interest to be paid	1,600,000
Balance in favor of State	366,666

"The interest on this bond issue, if all of them should bear interest, would be $1,600,000; but as denominations of $10, $20, and $50, designated as State cotton warrants, do not bear interest, the amount estimated for interest will be largely in excess of the sum required. These State cotton warrants of small denominations, when they have performed their function and found their way into the banks and the banker has accumulated $1,000 or more of them, would be sent to the treasury at Montgomery in exchange for Alabama State cotton bonds bearing interest at 4 per cent. This being true, it will be observed that the amount estimated for interest and carrying charges will also be largely in excess of requirements."

There is where the interest charge begins. When these small notes that have been circulated, having performed the functions of a circulating medium, have discharged their duty and have found their way into the banks, then they will in turn be sent to the State treasury at Montgomery and exchanged for State cotton interest-bearing notes.

"The legislature could direct that this balance in favor of the State should be used to defray operating expenses and other necessary charges connected with the inauguration and management of the plan. Therefore the State would not be required to contribute a dollar to the expense, but the cost would be borne by those who profit and are benefited by it.

"This money should be kept separate and used for no other purpose than paying the interest on the bonds. Should a surplus be left after the transaction is closed, it should be turned over to the agricultural department of the State for promoting diversification of crops or returned to the farmer who paid it.

"In view of the fact that no cotton will be bought by the State, after the 800,000 bales have been purchased out of the present crop, it will be necessary, in order to make up for the loss of $800,000 collected the first year to increase the amount of tax on cotton and acreage for 1916 with which to pay the interest on the bonds.

"State bonds, secured by actual cotton and provided with an interest and carrying fund of that kind, would be as good security as can be found in the world.

"The bonds would pass at their face value and be accepted as money in payment of all obligations.

"Before they are due the price of cotton, by reason of settling conditions and acreage reduction, will certainly reach a point where the State can dispose of the cotton held by it at cost, and possibly at large profit, and retire the bonds without loss to the State.

"I do not believe that it would be necessary for the State to buy half the crop. The consumption of cotton goods must go on even if the war continues. Just as soon as the people of other Southern States see how relief has been secured by the people of Alabama they will demand similar action. Nothing can stop it.

"I am reliably informed that the surplus above the present needs of operating mills is not over 3,000,000 bales. So long as that surplus is on the market buyers will name their own prices. Notice that 800,000 bales will be taken off the market in Alabama and that other cotton States are likely to adopt a similar plan, and also reduce acreage, will be a great warning to the spinners that they had better get busy. If other States follow our example, there will be a rush for cotton, and the remainder of the crop will be sold at a profit to the grower.

"We are confronted with a situation fraught with disastrous consequences to the people of the South unless some heroic measure is resorted to. This is no time for quibbling or abstract discussion of paternalism and other such doctrines of government. While we are not actually at war, we have all the business consequences of war. The farmer can not handle the situation. There are too many of them and they are too far separated to bring about any effective organization to meet the situation on such short notice.

"It is the duty of the State government, for the support of which taxes have been paid with such regularity, to step into the breach and work out a plan and lend its credit until this perilous period has passed. Under the plan it can do so without impairing its credit and without the loss ultimately of a dollar.

"Why hesitate about adopting it? If the newspapers will advocate it, and every farmer and business man who wants relief according to the plan suggested will make his wishes known by writing a letter or post card to the governor at once, I have no doubt but that Gov. O'Neal, who is deeply concerned over the situation, will promptly call the legislature together to submit a constitutional amendment to the vote of the people and pass necessary laws for carrying out the details of the plan. No time should be wasted. If prompt action is taken, the State can be ready before January 1 to begin the purchase of cotton.

"The tax on cotton and acreage will be a very small item to each farmer compared with that of selling his cotton at 6 or 7 cents, and possibly 5 cents, as now appears to be the intention of the spinners.

"This plan is offered with a positive conviction that it will afford relief to the people of Alabama. Let us lead the way for our sister States. We hope they will follow our example. I believe many of them will, but if they do not, we will be the one Southern State whose farmers will not have been ruined by the war in Europe.

"I urge the calling of citizens' mass meetings and of farmers' union locals in all parts of the State without delay to make known the wishes of the people on this subject, at which time resolutions should be adopted and forwarded to Gov. O'Neal.

"I request that some citizen in every town and community call a meeting at once. It is necessary that some one take the lead. If no one else will, do it yourself. It is time for action.

"Faithfully, yours,

"J. H. BANKHEAD."

Mr. President, the letter which I have just read, I will say, as a premise to some remarks which I now intend to make, has had a very large circulation in Alabama, and already a number of counties, cities, and towns have held meetings and adopted resolutions urging the governor of the State to take some action.

Mr. President, I realize that the Senate is not the place where great interest is found in statistics. However, at this period of national and international business distress I venture to submit to the attention of the Senate a very brief statistical statement about cotton.

Cotton was not grown as a staple previous to the year 1770, and during that year the shipment of American cotton to Liverpool is recorded as follows: Ten bales from Charleston, 3 bales from New York, 4 bags from Virginia, and 3 barrels from North Carolina, but a search of the records shows that exports of cotton from 1791 to 1914, inclusive, amounted to over 304,000,000 bales, but I have been unable to find any estimate of the total value of this amount of cotton exported. However, exports from 1850 to 1914, inclusive, were more than 276,000,000 bales, with a value of nearly $15,000,000,000.

The production of cotton in the South for the year 1913 amounted to nearly 14,000,000 bales, with a value, including the seed, of over a billion dollars. The production for the year 1913 in my own State of Alabama was nearly one and a half million bales, with a value, including the seed, of over $100,000,000.

The value of exported cotton during the year 1912 exceeded a half billion dollars, and constituted more than one-fourth of the total value of all articles of domestic merchandise exported during that year, and exceeded in value the exports of iron and steel manufacture, meat and dairy products, and breadstuffs combined. Again, in 1913, approximately 9,000,000 bales of cotton were exported, with a value in excess of $500,000,000, and only a little less than one-fourth of the total value of all articles of domestic merchandise exported that year.

As an illustration of the effect of the European war on the international trade of this country, as measured by our cotton exports, it is a remarkable fact that during the month of August, 1914, for the first time since the Civil War, our cotton exports dropped to 21,210 bales, and, what is still more remarkable, we imported 27,087 bales during that period. Due to the war in Europe, exports of cotton during the month of August were practically suspended; and due to the war in Mexico, imports of cotton from that country increased. During September of this year the amount of cotton exported was a little in excess of 100,000 bales, while during the month of September, 1913, they amounted to a little less than 1,000,000 bales.

These figures, I trust, will indicate the importance of cotton in the economic affairs not only of this Nation but of the world, and they will, I trust, convey to the Senate an idea of the appalling business conditions that now exist in the Southern States.

Had it not been for the great decline in the sale of our cotton crop abroad, the necessity for a $100,000,000 gold pool to protect our foreign debts would have never arisen. The cotton crop has always held the balance of trade in our favor. During the month of September, when the necessity for this pool arose, cotton exports were only about 100,000 bales, as against 1,000,000 bales during the same period last year.

To save the farmers of the South and the business interests of the entire country from the disaster confronting them by the suspension of the world's cotton market is a most serious and perplexing question, to which statesmen and financiers are giving their earnest attention and solicitude.

Different plans have been discussed, but no comprehensive one has been offered or accepted, broad and safe enough to meet the situation.

Of all the plans that have come to my attention none is more pathetic than that of the Alabama farmer who sought relief, as expressed in a letter to his bank, which, omitting names, is as follows:

———— ————, ALA., September 1½, 1914.

———— ———— BANK, ————, Ala.

GENTS: I have heerd that ferrein countries in Europe are issueing merrytoriums, so that the peope can put off paying there detts a while. Now, I have 18 bales of cotton and owe detts amounting to about $600. I can't sell my cotton for enuff to pay out and leave anything to pay taxes and live on next year. If they are selling merrytoriums in N. Y., I wisht you would see what it will cost to buy me one for the amount of my detts good for 6 mos.

Yours, truly,

———— ————.

I read this letter because it is a pathetic example of the distress of the southern farmer at this time.

Mr. President, it will be observed there is nothing new or novel in the plan suggested. It is no more than what has been done by the great banking institutions of the country when a panic, business stagnation, or a great disturbance in the money market is threatened. They promptly close the doors of their vaults, cease to pay their obligations in currency, and issue clearing-house certificates, which are nothing more than a mere promise to pay after the financial clouds have lifted. In this way the banks have oftentimes saved themselves and the business interests of the country from disaster and bankruptcy. No one can point to a single instance where the holder of a clearing-house certificate has ever lost a dollar. The security behind a certificate of this character can be no better or safer than the bond of the State secured by cotton in its possession, properly stored and insured.

In my own State, in 1887, when an overproduction of pig iron depressed prices to a point below the cost of manufacture, the Alabama pig-iron producers, together with other producers in this country, realized that the sale of iron at $6 per ton at the Alabama furnaces would soon lead to bankruptcy, and they formed what was known as the American Pig Iron Warrant Association, and established at or near their furnaces pig-iron warrant yards. In these yards I have seen what appeared to be acres of pig iron, upon which warrants were issued by the association at a fixed price per ton. These warrants were used in paying the obligations of the producers, were pledged with the banks, and, in fact, were finally listed on the New York Stock Exchange, and were the subject of daily quotations, the same as any other stock-exchange security. By this simple practical and efficient method the iron manufacturers of my State saved themselves from business bankruptcy and were able to continue operations, giving employment to labor and contributing generally to the business welfare of the community in which they were located instead of bringing disaster upon the locality by being forced to shut down. To-day the same condition exists in Alabama, except the commodity is cotton instead of pig iron; and the application of the same method and common-sense business principles which saved the pig-iron manufacturers in 1887, if adopted by the people of that State, will solve the present situation and protect the Alabama farmer from ruin and disaster.

Again in 1893, when Birmingham was younger and not so strong as she is to-day, her banks, which were not as great and strong as they are now, found themselves unable to pay their depositors and confronted with the necessity of closing their doors, without hesitation, declared they would issue clearing-house certificates, with which the daily business transactions of the community would be conducted and settled. The result was that this clearing-house script circulated as money, and the merchants finally offered a premium of 5 per cent for it in the payment of their merchandise sales. The plan saved the banks of Birmingham from failure and its merchants and the people from business disaster, just as the pig-iron warrants saved the iron men of Alabama and their creditors from business ruin and bankruptcy.

With such successful precedents of business salvation, should the people of Alabama or, indeed, the people of any other Southern State hesitate to proceed with the plan I have proposed, which is sounder, safer, and stronger, and thereby save themselves, or will they falter and hesitate and ultimately be forced to sell their cotton at 5, 6, or 7 cents per pound, and leave their debts unpaid and their business system bankrupted?

Briefly permit me to describe the operation of the plan proposed. In doing so it will perhaps be necessary to reiterate some things said in the letter, which I have just read. When the Legislature of Alabama has duly authorized and put into effect the plan suggested, the farmer will carry his cotton to the warehouse, conducted and administered by State authorities, and receive a cotton-warehouse warrant, and pay a dollar a bale bond interest tax. This warrant he will present to some duly authorized agent of the State, for which he will receive State notes or bonds in denominations of $10, $20, and $50. These bonds of small denominations should not bear any interest, for the simple reason that bearing no interest they will seek retirement through the substitution of interest-bearing Alabama State cotton bonds. The farmer will pay the merchant with these warrants of small denomination, the merchant will pay the wholesaler or the jobber, and the wholesaler will pay the bank. The banker, when he has accumulated say $5,000 of these small State notes or bonds, will send them to the proper State authority and receive in lieu thereof Alabama State cotton bonds in denominations of $1,000 or multiples thereof, bearing 4 per cent interest, which he would forward through the proper channels to the Treasury in Washington and receive $4,500, or 90 per cent of the total amount in United States currency, issued under the provision of the Aldrich-Vreeland Act, or through the Federal Reserve Board. Congress has therefore provided all the necessary currency aid that is required, under the plan proposed, to transfer Alabama cotton into the same currency that the Treasury is issuing to the national banks of the country at the present time.

Some Senator may ask if there is a precedent for such action. I frankly answer there is none. Neither can any Senator cite me to conditions similar to that now existing as it relates to the cotton crop of the South. When an emergency arises we are justified in establishing precedents, and such an emergency now confronts us.

I would resent any suggestion that the bonds issued under this plan would not be a safe investment, because the interest is to be paid with the bale tax and the acre tax assessed upon and collected from the farmers of Alabama, and their cotton purchased by the State and stored in its own warehouses will be amply sufficient to pay the principal. To say that this cotton will not have a value sufficient to pay the principal is to say that millions of dollars of notes coming from the national banks of the South and pledged with the Secretary of the Treasury, upon which currency under the Aldrich-Vreeland law is being issued, is not sufficient security. It is equivalent to saying that the world must discontinue the purchase of cotton. It is as great and important a factor in the world's commerce as foodstuffs. To say that the bonds proposed are not a safe and sound investment is to declare that millions of dollars of notes held by New York and other banks in this country, upon which the present crop was financed, planted, and grown, are insecure and a dangerous investment. On the cotton crop of the South its banking credit and nearly all other credit is based. No other single commodity on earth commands greater confidence and credit and is such a debt payer as cotton. The South clothes the world and partly feeds it. England itself will recover more quickly from the ravages and devastation of their present war than she would from a permanent failure in the supply of cotton she annually obtains from the Southern States. From the ruin and desolation of our own Civil War the South has recovered its present wealth and prosperity because cotton has made her rich.

Mr. President, because of the suffering and distress now threatening the farmers of the South my sympathies may be stronger than some of those in my hearing. I am a farmer myself; was raised on my father's cotton farm in Lamar County, Ala. I have planted cotton, cultivated it, and gathered and marketed it, and I confess to the Senate that my sympathies, my feelings, and my solicitude for the farmers in Alabama have not been so aroused since the time I returned to my home at the close of the Civil War and witnessed the devastation and ruin that had been visited upon the people of my State. I feel that the present emergency and the threatened disaster confronting the people of Alabama demands that I should leave nothing undone that I am able to do in assisting them in this hour of disaster.

The buy-a-bale movement at 10 cents per pound was well conceived and founded upon a laudable sentiment. Many thousand bales of cotton will find a market through its operation; but it is only a drop in the great ocean of distressed cotton. Many patriotic men and women have resolved to wear only fabrics made of cotton; but this attempted relief only tends to emphasize the real situation.

It will not do to say that only the cotton producers are interested in an attempt to solve the problem confronting them. It may be sectional in its application, but it is universal in its result. The whole of the United States is intensely interested and immediately connected with the conditions confronting the cotton growers of the South. The cotton crop is the largest and most important factor in the commercial life of the Nation. It is by the sale of cotton in foreign markets that trade balances have been largely in our favor.

The situation is a desperate one, though I do not despair. I believe that the common sense of the people of Alabama and of the cotton-growing States will teach them they must rely upon their own efforts, aided by the States.

Mr. President, I can not feel it in my heart to say that the war in Europe will prove a blessing to the United States. I do say, however, that in my opinion it will result in great benefit financially and commercially. I believe at the end of the war the United States will be the financial center of the world and that our agricultural and manufactured products will be in demand to supply the pressing needs of every civilized Government on the globe. It must be true, since imports from foreign countries under existing conditions will be greatly reduced, and it must follow also that our exports will be largely increased. If we do not exchange commodities with them, they must pay their balance to us in gold; and as a result the United States will become the richest and most prosperous country in the world. It is what we sell that makes us rich. What we consume at home adds nothing to our national wealth, does not increase the bank account, or pay off the mortgage. It simply contributes to our comfort and happiness.

The Government of the United States has made ample provision by which abundant currency may be obtained in the handling of our products, and a danger, Mr. President, may lurk in this abundant and easy currency. It may induce undue inflation and speculation, which in the end, when settlement day arrives, will prove to be an evil rather than a benefit. However, we must trust all this to the future good sense and judgment of our people. It is folly to talk about scarcity of money to meet every demand of business. This morning's statement of circulation shows the amount to be $3,402,422,570, or $37 per capita, an increase of $20,000,000 over September 1 of this year. To that amount may be easily added $1,000,000,000, or $10 per capita, under the provision of the regional-bank act and the Aldrich-Vreeland bill. Will anyone say that this vast sum is not entirely sufficient to meet every demand that will be made upon it, when we realize that the circulation may be increased approximately to $5,000,000,000, approaching a per capita circulation of $50? We understand that the amount of currency has very little connection with the present distressed conditions prevailing in certain sections of the country. The surplus of any product fixes the price of the whole. If there is a surplus of cotton, in other words, if more cotton is produced than the trade will take at a reasonable price, the surplus must first be disposed of before normal conditions can be restored. The size of the crop is not responsible for the existing conditions in the South. If the world's condition were normal, the price of cotton would be normal. The large consumers of raw cotton have practically ceased to buy. They are working up the stock on hand, and the manufactured product is being rapidly exhausted. This must result in the entire consumption of the raw and manufactured product, so that in a short time Europe will be entirely bare of cotton and cotton goods.

The war in Europe, in which nine distinct Governments are engaged, with 10,000,000 men on the firing line, nearly all of whom have been taken from productive pursuits, can not continue, but if it should be long drawn out these immense armies must be fed and clothed. Their fields will be barren from a lack of seeding and cultivation. Their men and boys have gone to the front. Their women and children can not feed and clothe this vast horde of nonproducers, whose demands are more in war than in peace, because of the unavoidable waste. If this terrific struggle, the most destructive of life and property the world has ever known, continues for six months, their supply of food and clothing will have been exhausted. Where is the only storehouse? There is but one answer—the United States. Foodstuffs will be in great demand, and at higher prices than ever before in our history. Every part of the country having for sale food, horses, and mules, and other things necessary in war, will reap the richest harvest they have ever enjoyed. What I have said of other agricultural products is true as to cotton. If the cotton States will impound or retire one-third or one-half of the present crop under the plan I have suggested, the problem will be solved, and their present distress relieved.

I call the attention of the Senator from Texas especially to this statement:

I am not unmindful of the fact that one or more of the cotton-growing States can not amend their constitutions within time to secure the benefit of the plan proposed. In that case there is no reason why the legislature should not, in a special session, authorize the counties to proceed under the same method proposed for the States. It might be true that county bonds would not circulate as freely as those of the State, but they would be based upon the same character of security, and would pay debts and cancel mortgages and crop liens in the county of issue and in adjoining counties with the same effect as the bonds of the State.

Mr. President, there is already a rift in the clouds Conditions generally are improving. Our exports of all products except cotton are rapidly increasing. The exports from New York for the week ending September 26 were $4,000,000 in excess of the exports for the same period last year. Exports for the seven days ending August 22 were only $8,000,000. Therefore we see that during the period from August 22 to September 26 exports from New York almost trebled. War-stricken Europe must be clothed and fed. Men and women may go hungry; they can not go unclad. Cotton is the chief product from which the clothing of the world is made, and the South is the chief producer. The time is near when the cotton crop must move. If it is not to be manufactured in Europe, it must be manufactured by our own mills. I confidently believe that every spindle and loom in the United States will be running double time within six months and that there will be a demand for a very large portion of the cotton crop. We can consume 10,000,000 bales if there is a demand for the product of our mills.

All that is necessary to restore normal conditions is the exercise of courage and the adoption of some such plan as I have outlined. I regard the man who urges the South to plant no cotton at all next year as its worst enemy. A crop equal to two-thirds of the present one would make an average for the two years of 12,500,000 bales, which would be 3,000,000 bales below the world's normal consumption. Can you realize what would happen when spinners are face to face with the proposition that they need 3,000,000 bales more than is in existence to meet their demands? If the cotton growers of the South will limit the acreage to an amount that may be reasonably expected to yield 10,000,000 bales next year, thereby making an average of 12,500,000 bales for the two years, there will be such a scramble for cotton that a runaway price will be the result. The consumption of cotton for 1917 will be more than ever in the history of the world. Shortage in manufacture during the war period must be overcome after peace is restored, so that we need have no fears for a long continuation of present distressing conditions. If the State of Alabama should adopt the plan suggested, we would only ask that the Government engrave our bonds at the cost to the State. We would ask this because, with its facilities at the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, it can do the work more expeditiously than any private printing concern. This small favor is all we would ask of the Government, realizing it has done all it can do when it has provided such ample and easy means for obtaining currency with which to transact the business contemplated by the plan proposed.

As soon as the process of impounding begins the scramble for cotton will also begin. Spinners at home and abroad will realize they have been hoisted on their own petard; they will realize they have been caught in a trap from which there is no escape except to buy cotton at or above 10 cents. The way is easy, the reward is rich. Why not do it, and restore confidence, and bring not only to the South but to the whole country—for we are one and inseparable—continued happiness and prosperity?

Mr. President, the Post yesterday morning carried the following headlines: "Favors cotton loan—Reserve Board may approve western plan this week." In St. Louis it is proposed to raise a fund of $150,000,000 with which to relieve the conditions in the cotton market. The plan is not set out in detail, but I presume the organization of this pool will undertake to relieve the situation by distribution of this amount of money to the banks throughout the cotton-growing States. I do not know whether they intend to loan this money directly to the farmer or not. If so, at what interest, and what price will be fixed on cotton? Or do they intend to buy outright the amount of cotton required to consume the pool? Either plan, Mr. President, will be a failure. We do not need more money with which to handle or finance the crop. We have a half billion dollars more currency now than last year, and a more valuable crop was easier financed. It is not money we need, it is a market. We have the cotton, nobody will buy it, and until a market is restored there can be no relief. Unless a considerable portion of the crop is bought or retired for the present, the whole crop will be sacrificed and the producer bankrupted.

There is a most magnificent wheat crop in the West. If every market that consumes bread should be suddenly closed, how would it affect the value of wheat? Where would the market be found? Who would want wheat if there was nobody to consume it? It would result in financial paralysis in the wheat-growing States. The cotton States are in a similar condition. The channel through which the cotton passes to the consumer is closed. No one will buy the raw material, consequently the market has collapsed. We may talk until our voices fail us about financing the cotton crop, but there are only two ways to relieve the situation; that is, for the Government of the United States to step in with its unlimited resources and do it or the State to take the initiative and do it. The Government of the United States will not do it, therefore the States must do it.

Mr. President, the miner does not attempt to circulate his gold dust and with it pay his obligations. He can not coin it, the law forbids. A way has been provided by which he may deposit his gold with the authorized agent of the Government and receive in return Government notes to the par value of the gold deposited. The cotton grower has the gold—"cotton." He can not circulate it in payment of his obligations, but he can deposit it with the authorized agent of the State of Alabama and receive the State's note equal to its par value, and these notes will circulate and pay his obligations. The greenback is based upon the tangible and intangible property of the United States—the credit of the Government—and this only is pledged for its redemption. These State notes are to be based on cotton, the equal of gold, pledged for the redemption of the notes.

Mr. President, this is not the character of the inflation that is dangerous; it can only be temporary. The plan provides for a speedy retirement when it has performed the function intended. These notes will speedily find their way into the banks when the conditions now obtaining shall have passed away. The ordinary circulating medium of the country will come out and supply their place. These small notes will not bear interest. The banks naturally will return them to the State treasury and receive for them a State cotton bond bearing 4 per cent interest. By this process this emergency currency—the State's note—will be retired perhaps within 12 months. Gold is the standard money of the world. Cotton is one of the standard staples. The world might find a substitute for gold; no one would venture to suggest a substitute for cotton.

Mr. President, the cotton producer is stranded in the middle of a financial ocean. There is no land in sight. They are starving and dying from thirst, and not a drop of water to be had. They have hoped and prayed that they might be rescued. They have hoped so long that hope deferred has made them heart sick. They have almost despaired. The man on watch thinks he sees a sail. He looks again; his heart beats faster; it is a sail. He tells his despairing comrades that a ship is in sight. The hull of the ship can be seen. The watchman waves the flag of distress. The captain on the bridge sees the tiny signal and speeds in that direction. The ship draws nearer and nearer. Soon she reaches the wreck, a lifeboat is lowered, and the wrecked cotton producer is taken on board, and the good ship hoists her sails of cotton and lands her passengers at a friendly port. The news of the rescue is carried to the dear ones on the farm, and they offer a fervent prayer for a long life and happiness for the captain and the crew who rescued the cotton producers from their perilous situation.

Now, Mr. President, I have said all I care to say on this subject. I want to repeat that there is nothing novel about it. It is just such a remedy as has been applied in all times of stress for years and years past. It is simply a proposition that the farmer of Alabama or other cotton State may deposit his cotton, which has a market the world over when conditions are normal, and receive notes with which he may discharge his present obligations and pay his debts and save himself from bankruptcy.

Now, what objection can there be to that? If the State of Alabama and the other Southern States want to employ means like this for their own benefit and for the salvation of their own people, who can object to it?

Mr. President, I believe that if the governors of the Southern States should issue a proclamation to-morrow convening their legislatures and send them a vigorous message, describing the conditions and recommend that legislation of this character be passed, cotton would immediately advance to 10 cents a pound. As soon as the consumers of cotton are made to understand that the surplus of cotton is to be taken out of the market and that they must depend alone upon that which is left for disposition, there will be a scramble for it. There is no question in my mind about that.

I do not know that I can say now how many of the States would be able to take advantage of this situation immediately. I do not believe that there will be any necessity, really, 15 days from now if the State governments would all act promptly and vigorously in this matter; and if they would say to the consumers of cotton, "If you want cotton at 10 cents a pound, you must get it now," it would have the desired effect.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator from Alabama a question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey in the chair). Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I do.

Mr. GRONNA. I have been much interested in the able speech made by the distinguished Senator from Alabama, and it is possible that the suggestions he has made are practical, but I want to ask the Senator this question: Is it not possible that the Federal Government could be of some help to the cotton growers, provided we enacted a proper rural-credit law?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I think the Federal Government, with its great resources, might be of great benefit to the growers of cotton, but the question is, Can the Government do it before it is too late?

Mr. GRONNA. I wish to call the Senator's attention to the fact that in the Democratic platform adopted at Baltimore the Democratic Party promised to enact rural-credit legislation, and they called attention to the fact that it was of equal importance with banking reform.

If the Senator from Alabama will permit me further, I believe the mere fact of the Federal Government enacting a law permitting the farmers to organize would be of immense value to the farmers. I recognize the fact that the cotton growers of the South, the same as the wheat growers of the West, are unorganized, and if there are any people on earth who need aid it is those people. I do not mean contributions, but I mean that they should be permitted to organize under certain specific laws, the same as men engaged in other industries are permitted to organize.

For that reason, I wanted to call the Senator's attention to the fact that we have pending before us now in the Senate and in the House rural-credit bills, but I understand such legislation is to be postponed, and not to be enacted at this session of Congress.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I have no doubt in the world but that the bill referred to by the Senator from North Dakota will remain in the committee when this crisis is passed.

I wish to repeat what I said before. It is not currency we need. We have all the currency at our command that is necessary for all purposes. It is not credit we need. We have all the credit that we can use. Mr. President, it is a market that we want. We have the cotton to sell, but who will buy it? There is our trouble. What we seek to do, sir, is to retire a sufficient amount of that crop, supposed to be the surplus over the present demand, until conditions are normal, until a price is fixed and the consumption of cotton the world over becomes normal. That is all we seek, and that is all we need. We do not need any more money. We have all the world can use.

I notice this morning that a pool is to be established of $150,000,000 to relieve the situation in the South. That is a speculative proposition. It will not have any effect whatever on the conditions. They will loan money out, $30 a bale, at 6 or 8 cents a pound, and that cotton still is on the market for sale. It will not take it out of the surplus and impound it for a year.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield further to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I do.

Mr. GRONNA. I agree with the Senator from Alabama that we do not need any more currency, but the rural-credit legislation proposed does not seek to issue more currency. I call the Senator's attention to the fact that in Europe, where they have a rural-credit system—and it has been in vogue in some of those countries for nearly 150 years—these agricultural bonds sell at a premium above Government bonds. I do not happen to have the statistics here, but I make that statement.

Mr. BANKHEAD. That may be true. These bonds may sell at a premium, and doubtless they will sell in this country at a premium, but that does not relieve the situation. That does not take a single bale of cotton out of the market, and that is what we want to do; that is all.

Mr. GRONNA. That is true; but I believe that we can help the southern cotton grower by the enactment of a proper rural-credit system.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I believe that is true, Mr. President, next year or the year after or some future time, but it can not meet the present condition. We want something done now. The cotton farmer has been stricken with a desperate case of acute indigestion. He wants present relief. It is too much cotton. There is plenty of money everywhere, but there is no market for the cotton. That is our trouble. Let us take the surplus off the market and you will see what will happen.

Mr. SHEPPARD obtained the floor.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair has recognized the junior Senator from Texas.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I yield to the Senator from Florida.

Mr. FLETCHER. I wish to make one suggestion with reference to the subject of rural credits. I think the Senator from North Dakota is pretty sound on that proposition. If we had succeeded in establishing a system of rural credits, this condition would have been very materially different, in my judgment. The trouble now is that we are unable to secure that sort of a system, or the establishment of that system, in time to relieve this emergency. It is not, in my judgment, going to be lasting, but it is acute at present, undoubtedly.

Mr. GRONNA. The Senator just stated, if I did not misunderstand him, that we are unable to secure a rural-credit system. I should like to know why we are unable to secure it.

Mr. FLETCHER. I say we are unable to secure it immediately—while cotton is now moving. You can not establish that system within a few days or a few weeks. It will take some little time in order to have the various suggestions which are embraced in various bills that are now before the Banking and Currency Committees of the two Houses thrashed out and enacted into law, and after they are enacted it will take some time to get the system into operation. It will not take a great while, but some time. I believe that is going to be done, and I believe it would have been much better if it had been done long before now. If it had been done, I am quite sure there would not have been this trouble and interruption and distress brought on by the sudden world-wide war.

Mr. GRONNA. If the Senator will permit me, why does it require more time to pass legislation that the farmers are interested in than to pass relief measures where the financial interests are interested? In this connection I wish to read from the platform of the Senator's own party.

Mr. BANKHEAD. That is familiar to everybody.

Mr. GRONNA (reading):

RURAL CREDITS.

Of equal importance with the question of currency reform is the question of rural credits or agricultural finance.

The Senator from Florida knows, because he has been very active in that work, that that investigation has been made. The Senator was chairman and is now chairman of that commission. I had the honor of introducing resolution No. 75 in this body more than two years ago, which provided for a small appropriation for an investigation in European countries of the system of rural credits. It was defeated many times on this floor, but finally it was passed. It was defeated by the Agricultural Committee of the House, and it was not until this plank in the Democratic platform was adopted at Baltimore that I was able to secure favorable action on that resolution. It was finally put into the Agricultural appropriation bill and it became a law.

Now, I want to know why it takes more time to enact remedial legislation which is so necessary for the welfare of the farmers than it does to enact laws beneficial to business institutions? The cotton grower of the South grows cotton, which has become a necessity, and we can no more get along without cotton than we can get along without bread. I want to know why when we have been in session for a year and a half it has been impossible for us to pass some legislation that will be of substantial benefit to the cotton growers of the South and to the farmers all over this country.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, in reference to the provision in the Democratic platform, I will say I am quite familiar with it and I had some little part even in preparing it and submitting it to the committee. I also know there is a provision quite as strong, if my recollection is right, in the platforms of the Republican Party and the Progressive Party. So that all political parties stand committed to the establishment of a proper rural-credit system in this country. There is no question about that.

The Senator from North Dakota has been diligent in proposing steps in this direction, and his resolution took somewhat the course of an amendment to the Agricultural appropriation bill, creating a commission on rural credits to cooperate with the American commission assembled under the auspices of the Southern Commercial Congress, of which I happened to be president; and of course I am familiar with their activities. The Senator will recall, undoubtedly, that an actual study of the various systems in European countries was made by the commission, and that work is covered in Senate Document No. 214, said to be the most authentic and complete and reliable collection of data and information on that great question in print anywhere in the world.

I will also call the Senator's attention to Senate Document No. 380, which embraces the report of the United States commission to this body. The commission is still in existence and will have some further report to make.

Not only that, but the bill has been submitted, as I said, to the Committee on Banking and Currency of both the House and Senate, and they have appointed subcommittees on rural credits, which gave hearings and made a study of the various bills which had been introduced and of the whole question, and recently they have reported a bill, which has been referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency. As soon as those committees can take up the matter, undoubtedly they will make a report.

But I will say to the Senator that while I am just as impatient as he can possibly be in this matter, and I realize the great importance of it to our agricultural interests, and therefore to the whole country, I also recognize that it is a question about which there is some difference of opinion as to the exact details, some lines of view leading in the direction of direct Government aid, while, on the other hand, there is a contention that such a thing is not to be thought of. Therefore it will take a little time to adjust these differences so that we may present a measure, as I believe eventually will be done, which will meet the indorsement of the best thought and research on this question.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Florida yield further?

Mr. FLETCHER. I am taking up the time of the Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD].

Mr. SHEPPARD. I yield to the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. GRONNA. I do not wish to be understood as criticizing the Senator from Florida nor the Senator from Alabama. I know that both Senators would be among the very first to help the people in the agricultural States, and that they would do what they could in order to give them relief. But I should like to know why, with the forces that put bills through this body and the other body, we can not get the same forces behind these rural-credit bills, which are of such great importance to the welfare of the agricultural districts. What I should like to know is why it is impossible to get these bills up for consideration and give them the study and discussion that they deserve. I certainly do not wish to criticize the Senator from Florida, because he has been diligent, I know, and has done everything that it is possible for a human being to do in order to have bills of this kind or some law of this kind go into effect.

Mr. FLETCHER. If the Senator will refer to the President's address of last December, he will see that his stand in this matter is pronounced and clear and distinct.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, I have listened with much interest to the discussion of the cotton situation by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD]. He has outlined a plan of State action in the present crisis. I deem it proper to say that a short time ago the southern Representatives and Senators in Congress, alarmed and aroused by the perilous condition of the cotton crop, invited the governors of the Southern States to meet them here for a conference. The governors of six States attended in person, namely, Cruce, of Oklahoma; Hall, of Louisiana; O'Neal, of Alabama; Slaton, of Georgia; Stuart, of Virginia; Trammell, of Florida; and the governors of five other Southern States had representatives, Gov. Hooper, of Tennessee, being represented by Commissioner of Agriculture Maj. Thomas F. Peck; Gov. Colquitt, of Texas, by Congresman R. L. HENRY; Gov. Hays, of Arkansas, by Senator JOE T. ROBINSON; Gov. Craig, of North Carolina, by Commissioner of Agriculture Maj. William A. Graham; and Gov. Blease, of South Carolina, by Mr. W. A. Stuckey. The conference took place on September 28 and 29. It was marked by an earnest, able, and patriotic discussion of the cotton situation from every standpoint. It developed that it was the almost unanimous opinion of the governors and representatives of governors that the problem could not be met by the States; that the intervention of the Federal Government was essential; and such, sir, is practically the universal opinion of the cotton farmers of the South. Most of the Southern States can not issue bonds without constitutional amendment, and constitutional processes are too slow for the disaster now impending. None of the States may coin money. That is an exclusive Federal prerogative.

It can not be said that the Southern States have been neglectful or indifferent in this matter. The governors, the legislators, and the people of those States have canvassed the situation with a vigilance born of desperation. Despite their traditional desire to exercise State functions and preserve State powers to the greatest extent possible under the Constitution, they have been driven by the iron logic of iron facts to the conclusion that the Federal Government is the only agency sufficiently powerful to save one-third of this Republic from the darkest calamity that has befallen it since the Civil War. It is idle to talk of State action with the cries of the 10,000,000 American men and women and children in the cotton fields of the South already resounding in our ears. Congress is in session and the machinery of the Federal Government may be immediately and easily set in motion. Before the legislatures of the cotton States can be assembled and proper action in the slightest degree secured the substance of the southern people, their chief source of subsistence, will have been swept away.

And so it comes to pass that the section which 50 years ago was swallowed up in the red gulf of war is again facing economic ruin. The South is to-day as much the victim of war conditions as if all the armies now swarming through the doors of death in Europe had laid waste every cotton field from the Atlantic to the Rio Grande. It is as if the flames from that hell of steel and fire in the other hemisphere had poured over the Atlantic and across the South, blasting the values on which the masses of our people depend to keep their bodies and their souls together.

The crisis that overwhelms the American cotton farmer to-day has elements that portend disaster for the American Nation. Of the 15,000,000 bales produced in the South this year 10,000,000 would now be going abroad but for the European war. The sale abroad of this 10,000,000 bales would have brought this country $600,000,000 in gold; would have preserved and strengthened its favorable balance of trade; would have continued to secure for it the commanding position it has heretofore occupied in world commerce; would have sustained its foreign exchanges and enabled it readily to have discharged its obligations abroad. The European war has practically annihilated the foreign market for cotton and crushed the domestic market. In August, 1913, cotton exports amounted to 357,000 bales; in August, 1914, to 21,210 bales; in September, 1913, they amounted to 930,000 bales; in September, 1914, to 120,000 bales. At this rate the total exports of the present crop will not equal one-half million bales. The loss of the country's principal export market, its principal source of gold payments from abroad, makes this cotton crisis a national one. What the final outcome will be for the Nation no human mind can predict. The retention in this country of 10,000,000 bales of cotton, which ordinarily would have gone abroad, has destroyed the local market for the remaining 5,000,000 bales, and the specter of ruin walks by the side of the southern cotton farmer and the southern business man. But for this struggle in Europe the product of the southern cotton farmers would be worth to-day more than a billion dollars. To-day it is practically valueless, so far as the bulk of the crop is concerned. The little cotton that is being sold does not bring enough to pay the debts the farmer incurred for its production. He faces winter and the holy Christmastide without the means to procure the necessities of existence. It is safe to say that most of the 10,000,000 people directly connected with the production of cotton are threatened with actual want; that another 10,000,000 who are dependent on this product for business occupation are threatened with bankruptcy.

The enormous purchases made by the South in other sections of the country can not be renewed, and obligations for former ones can not be discharged. The merchant and the banker, both in the South and in the North, the East, the West, must be ultimately more or less involved. The solution of the problem lies in some step by the National Government which will aid the South to gather and to hold the present cotton crop until conditions are readjusted. Whether the European war is to be long or short, the time will come when this surplus cotton will be demanded and utilized, and its terrible weight lifted from the portion intended for home consumption. The United States will thus save its balance of trade, and the domestic manufacture and consumption of cotton will revive. Unless something is done, probably half of the crop will be left in the fields, and even then such a surplus over domestic needs will remain as to make a living domestic price impossible.

Let me quote here from an editorial from the Washington Post of this morning containing a most forceful description of the present emergency and an appealing suggestion for national action:

A NATIONAL DANGER THAT CALLS FOR NATIONAL ACTION.

Exports of cotton this season to date amount to 181,721 bales. Last year in the same period 1,323,854 bales were exported.

This is the story of cotton in a nutshell. It shows the terrible danger that confronts the South. If this danger be not averted, it will bring about a collapse that will affect every person in the United States.

The South can not suffer without the East, North, and West suffering also. The country is one body, with four members. Just as the body suffers when an arm is cut off, so the Union suffers if the South is injured, or the West ruined, or the North devastated.

As it is the duty of the whole man to protect his members, so it is the duty of the Nation to protect all its parts. It can not thrive in one part while another part is stricken.

The United States is rich enough to protect itself against threatened ruin of the South. It has the vitality with which to meet and withstand this economic shock.

When the Middle West was submerged with the floods of the Mississippi and the Ohio, the Nation rose and grappled with the danger and ruin that threatened it. California, Florida, Maine, and Washington were as whole-hearted in their help as were Ohio, Indiana, or Kentucky. There was no talk of sectional selfishness. All Americans recognized that the floods were a common peril, calling for common action.

When San Francisco was destroyed by earthquake and fire the Nation quickly did all that was necessary to repair the damage. The same instinctive recognition of a common duty was manifested when Portland burned, when Charleston suffered, when Chicago was destroyed, when Omaha was shaken by a tornado, and when New Orleans was threatened with plague.

The danger that confronts the South is as real as fire or flood or tornado or plague. It is not an intangible or imaginary danger. If not met and mastered, it means bankruptcy, poverty, hunger, starvation. No fire or flood or tornado could more effectually destroy the South than the war in Europe can destroy it, if the Nation does not come to the rescue.

This is the time for thought and action on a national scale—big thought, big action. It is a time for large exercise of patriotism that knows no section nor faction; a patriotism that thinks and acts with the majesty and magnitude of a continent.

Let Americans join, recognize clearly the danger that confronts them, plan adequately to meet the emergency, and act unanimously in putting the plan into effect.

No power on earth—not even the world in war—can cripple the United States if its own people act together.

Mr. President, let the Government lend its credit for a short time to cotton farmers on the security of their cotton properly warehoused, and, if the Government should deem it necessary, on the security of their personal responsibility, and the situation will be saved.

The great chairman of the Banking and Currency Committee of the Senate, Hon. ROBERT L. OWEN, one of the most accomplished and progressive statesmen of his time, who adds a chivalrous heart to a mighty brain, tells me that this might be done without violating a single economic principle. We had a hearing on this subject before the Banking and Currency Committee of the Senate on Tuesday of this week, and I take this occasion to thank the members of that committee for the sympathetic attention and consideration they accorded those who came to seek relief for the stricken South.

Let me say here that cotton is an absolutely safe security. Because of its adaptation to human needs it will sell in regions of the earth where United States bonds will be rejected. Properly baled and sheltered it is practically nonperishable.

Let me call attention to the fact that from 1863 to 1868, inclusive, the Federal Government collected direct taxes on cotton to the amount of $68,072,388.99. This enormous sum was taken at a time when the South was least able to pay it; when her resources had been exhausted by a terrible war; when her fields, and homes, and cities had been rendered desolate by invasion.

The constitutionality of this tax was so questionable that the Supreme Court of the United States on February 20, 1871, divided equally on the subject, four justices holding that they were violative of the organic law. (See Farrington v. Saunders, Record of Briefs, U. S. Supreme Court, 216.)

The proper utilization of this sum in the present crisis would go far toward relieving the situation. Also there are $4,000,000 in the Treasury to-day representing the proceeds of cotton taken from southern plantations by the Federal Government after the war without the consent of the owners and without remuneration.

When the speculative market was prostrated in 1907 and owners of speculative securities could negotiate neither sales nor loans, the United States Treasury put its resources at the command of the metropolitan bankers. It sent enormous funds to New York City with instructions to lend them on these securities at a given rate and price, and the market was saved. The Government is lending millions to the farmers on irrigation projects in the West for the construction of homes, and all of us cheerfully joined in a recent enactment by which the time of payment was extended.

Mr. President, there is no agony surpassing that of him who sees the earnings of a year of patient toil and sacrifice disappear, who sees his wife and children so poorly clad that health and comfort are alike imperiled, who knows that he can not put shoes upon their feet or bread into their mouths. And yet, sir, such is the vision that haunts millions of our fellow countrymen on the other side of the Potomac. Senators of the North, the East, the West, these men are the sons and grandsons of the hosts who rallied behind—

The deadly calm of Stonewall's face,

who met your sires and grandsires in the test of battle and went down to an honorable, an unstained, a superb defeat. Nay, thousands of these men who face financial crucifixion are of that race your fathers gave their blood to liberate. Oh, sirs, the warring multitudes of 50 years ago are now at peace. Together they are camped behind the battlements of the New Jerusalem, brothers now forevermore. By the river of eternal life their bivouacs gleam, and soon the last survivor of each side here will join their comrades on that blissful shore. Their banners and their swords are lying near the throne of fadeless love to rise in hate no more. And what would give them greater joy to-day than to see this Government reach out its arms to the stricken South and bid it rise, to hear this Nation say to that unhappy people: "Your sorrows are my sorrows, your woes my woes. Every resource at my command is yours until there shall be secured to you the chance to live, the right to utilize your own in the manner in which you are entitled to employ it, the right to feel that you are a part of this Republic, equally beloved among its children, sharing equally its sympathy, its substance, its support."

Mr. President, I introduced the bill S. 6565, which provides for an issuance of currency to be loaned on cotton. I believed it to be entitled to a trial in the Senate, and at the hearing I obtained from the Banking and Currency Committee it was made the subject of a thorough argument. At the close of that hearing the chairman of the Banking and Currency Committee, Senator OWEN, made the following statement:

I have read the bill (S. 6565) for the temporary relief of the cotton growers of the United States, and it proposes that the Secretary of the Treasury shall deposit in the National banks and State banks of the cotton States $500,000,000, legal tender, and loaned to the banks at 3 per cent, and by the banks advanced to the cotton owner at 10 cents a hundred until cotton rises in price to 12 cents.

The witnesses before the committee have made it very clear what the distress in the South is. It is a national problem, however, because the cotton crop shipped abroad just about balances the demand upon the United States of our European indebtedness and gives us the so-called balance of trade heretofore in our favor. The truth is that except for the shipment of this cotton crop we would be obliged to pay a like amount to Europe, to whom we are indebted for certain interest charges and freight charges which do not appear in our balance of trade.

The paralysis of the cotton farmer who can not sell his cotton is immediately reflected upon the retail merchant, who can not collect from the farmer the amount due to him, and reflects upon the wholesale merchant, who can not collect from the retail merchant, and upon the manufacturer of supplies of all kinds, who can not collect from the wholesalers and jobbers, and upon the banks, who can not force the retail merchants to settlement, nor the wholesaler to settlement, nor the manufacturer to settlement. It results in a general dislocation of our system. It is not a question, however, of currency. There is an abundance of currency in the country to move the cotton. Currency is merely a form of human credit cut up in small pieces convenient for exchange from one hand to another in settling small debts. The real need is for somebody to furnish an acceptable form of credit to hold the surplus cotton of the United States until it can be adequately marketed.

Senate bill 6565 is, however, seriously objectionable, in that it proposes an issue of $500,000,000 of currency, immediately redeemable in gold, when the present gold supply of the Treasury is already pledged to the redemption of $346,000,000 of greenbacks and the maintenance of over $400,000,000 of silver at a parity, and the free gold in the Treasury will be needed, in all human probability, for the Federal reserve banks, immediately on the point of being organized, as well as to protect the Treasury against current demands.

The problem is one of credits. The United States could lend its credit for the purpose of carrying this surplus cotton. In doing so it ought to be paid the fair return for the loan of credit.

It ought to be safeguarded both by the credit of the cotton and the credit of the individuals who seek the accommodation.

The credit ought to be loaned in a form that would enable it to be absorbed by private persons throughout the world.

It ought to be in a form which would give the United States time in which to be reimbursed from the sale of the cotton, and therefore should be two-year notes, with the right to redeem in one.

In lending its credit the United States can not deal with private individuals conveniently, but the United States can organize artificial persons, consisting of groups of individuals, with whom the United States could deal with comparative ease. It has therefore occurred to me that Congress might authorize county cotton associations, membership to be measured in terms of pounds of cotton, on a basis of 7 cents a pound, which is a figure about the cost of actually producing cotton on moderately poor land in an average season. It is much higher than the cost on very rich lands in a good season, because it costs only 2 cents a pound, approximately, to pick cotton and should not cost over $5 an acre to prepare the ground, to plow, plant, cultivate; and, allowing a reasonable rental on land, 7 cents a pound would produce on an acre producing a third of a bale about $12, not counting the cotton seed, which in the case referred to would amount to about 350 pounds of cotton seed, worth approximately $1.75 in an average poor year; so that the total output would be about $14 on a poor acre yielding one-third of a bale and three times as much on land yielding a bale; and some land would produce a bale and a third, giving four times as much to the bale.

But since 7 cents is a fair estimate of the cost of production, the United States would not jeopardize its credit by lending its credit to this extent, especially if fortified by the credit of the individual members of a county cotton association having a double liability to the Government for the amount of the accommodation extended. In other words, the Government in accommodating private persons, even for a national purpose, ought to be abundantly secured by those who ask the accommodation of credit, and they have no right to complain if the United States asks them to put their private credit behind the loan made to them to safeguard the United States against the remotest possibility of loss. It therefore has occurred to me that the county cotton association could be established, with a president and treasurer and board of directors of five persons; that each man who contributes a bale of cotton to the association shall be given his interest measured in dollars and cents on a 7-cent scale per pound, according to quality, to be determined by the officers of the association; that the Government could afford to extend a credit to this association, each member of which would be liable to the Government or to the association in the amount of his stock interest, and the association would be responsible to the Government for the faithful repayment of the loan of its credit.

Suppose, then, the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to lend Government notes bearing 4 per cent, due in two years from November 1, 1914, with the right of redeeming at any time after one year; that these notes bear 4 per cent interest, and that the Government authorize the association to use these notes in paying for cotton stored with the association to be insured by the association, leaving the 2 per cent charged by the association to pay the United States for the use of its credit. Let the individual farmer be given a primary credit at cost of his bale, with an equity to be paid to him when the cotton can be marketed at a figure acceptable to the directors of the association, less his proportionate part of the expense, measuring as part of the expense an interest charge against him of 6 per cent for the loan of these credit notes. These credit notes, passing into the farmers' hands, should be made legal tender; the merchant should receive them at par, the wholesaler, the jobber, the manufacturer, the banker. The Federal reserve bank system and the national bank system and the savings banks of the country could absorb this issue with facility. It would produce no shock whatever to the Government credit; it would relieve all classes of business and it would violate no precedents, because the Government has not hesitated to lend money to private institutions, banking institutions, for crop-moving purposes, to relieve the distress from overflow in the Mississippi Valley, and recently at Dayton, Ohio, and even has loaned public funds to private citizens to enable them to move more conveniently from the theater of war in Europe recently. We have precedents in abundance, and there never was as gigantic demand for national necessity for protection of this cotton crop from destruction, because it is worth a thousand millions in fiber and in seed, and the surplus cotton which can not be used or sold being in direct competition with that which is required for our national use will crush this price from 12 cents to 6 cents and to private producers of the country of about $450,000,000 at direct cost to them, and the injury done to this class of people will immediately reflect itself in the bankruptcy of the local machine, and the distress of the wholesaler, jobber, manufacturer. This injury to the purchasing classes ought not to be permitted in a country of intelligence and patriotism.

The issuance of currency as a relief measure has the fatal defect of the requirement of being payable on demand in gold and being an unproductive form of credit. It is a credit on time we need, not a demand credit.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Texas yield to me for a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. SHEPPARD. Very cheerfully.

Mr. POMERENE. The Senator from Texas has referred to what the Government did during the flood in Dayton——

Mr. SHEPPARD. I was reading the statement of the chairman of the Banking and Currency Committee.

Mr. POMERENE. Of course, we all appreciate what was done at that time, and I for one am ready to open the vaults and the doors of the Treasury on any occasion when a similar disaster may occur and wherever it may occur. Whatever moneys were loaned to banks in Dayton, of course, were properly secured by collateral which to the Secretary of the Treasury seeme all-sufficient.

But I want to offer this suggestion: Some weeks ago the Senate passed a warehouse-receipt bill, the purpose of which was to aid the South. I understand that bill has not yet come up for action in the House; but that was a measure which was prepared, as I understand the fact to be, by Senators from the cotton States. I voted for that bill because I had understood that, if it should pass and warehouse receipts were issued, the Secretary of the Treasury had stated that he would accept those warehouse receipts as collateral for the issuance of notes under the Aldrich-Vreeland Act. That bill as yet has not become a law, and therefore it can not be availed of.

The Senator has referred to the convention of the governors of the Southern States, and has suggested that some of the States could not issue bonds to relieve the situation without a constitutional amendment; but query: If the plan which was proposed for the organization of warehouses and the issuance of warehouse receipts would be a practicable plan if it were taken up by the National Government, why would it not be feasible for the legislatures of the several States, if the authority does not now exist, to provide by law for the organization of warehouses and for the issuance of warehouse receipts upon cotton, so that those receipts might be available for the purpose of issuing notes under the Aldrich-Vreeland plan after the manner intended by the Senate bill? Why could not that be done?

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, when the governors of the States and other representatives from the cotton section were here they said that they had looked into the situation carefully from every possible viewpoint and that it was their deliberate conclusion that the crisis could not be met by State action. I think the plan suggested by the Senator from Ohio has some very valuable features about it, but it does not solve the problem.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator from Texas yield to me for a moment?

Mr. SHEPPARD. Certainly.

Mr. VARDAMAN. In answer to the inquiry of the Senator from Ohio, I will say that some of the States—the State of Mississippi, for instance—can not participate in the benefits afforded under the Vreeland-Aldrich law. Under that act no banks except national banks can secure currency, and there are only 32 national banks in the State of Mississippi, while there are 326 State banks. I am confident that if the bill which passed the Senate, permitting State banks to share with national banks in the privileges of the Vreeland-Aldrich law and providing a warehouse system, had passed the House, it would very greatly have ameliorated the conditions there; but we have not enough national banks properly to care for the situation in the circumstances.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I realize the position the Senator took when that matter was up for discussion; but the Senator, I think, understands that there were some serious objections to the proposal. It is not necessary to go into the merits of those objections now. The Senator from Mississippi represents a State which, perhaps, is unfortunately situated in that there are not more national banks within its borders; but there is no reason in the world why the State banks can not take out charters under the Federal reserve act.

Mr. VARDAMAN. The Senator will not accept what I have said as a criticism of his suggestion, I hope, because it was not so intended.

Mr. POMERENE. Oh, no.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I was simply informing the Senator from Ohio of the unfortunate condition existing in the South which made the plan discussed by him not altogether of sufficient scope to meet the emergent situation. There is no question in the world that if we could get money under the plan prescribed by the Vreeland-Aldrich law, and all the State banks were permitted to share in it, it would go, I repeat, a long way toward ameliorating the condition there; but as matters are at present we can not avail ourselves of that act.

Really, if I may be pardoned for saying so in the time of the Senator from Texas, the only power beneath the stars that I know of now that can give the necessary relief to save the South from bankruptcy is the Federal Government. I am not of those who believe that it is feasible or practicable or possible to pass a bill fixing an arbitrary price for cotton; but if the Federal Government, through its Treasury, would place money in the South through its designated agents—the money to be loaned to the cotton growers on cotton at the market price of cotton—it would be of immeasurable advantage. I do not mean that it should be loaned at an arbitrary price of 12, 10, 8, or 7 cents a pound, but upon the market price of cotton. If it were loaned to them in that way for such time as would enable them to pass over this crisis, to bridge this financial chasm, I think the South would be immensely benefited and the entire Nation would be saved an enormous amount of money.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, it must occur to Senators that any plan which is adopted must be consistent with the principles of sound finance. The Nation can not do business on principles different from those followed by individuals and the States.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I do not ask that.

Mr. POMERENE. The Senator refers to the pledging, if I may call it such, of cotton at its market price as security; but the difficulty is that the Senator is not able to tell us what the market price of cotton is. It appeared before the committee the other day that, under normal conditions, the price of cotton ought to be about 15 cents—I believe that was about the figure named—and that it cost probably 12 cents to produce it. Now, it appears here to-day, from what the Senator from Texas has said, that 7 or 8 cents is about the market price.

Mr. VARDAMAN. If the Senator will yield to me for just one moment, if the Government were to issue money upon bonds or any other security or evidence of debt, would it not be issued upon the market price? You have the same way of ascertaining the market price of cotton that you have of ascertaining the market price of silver or bonds or any other commodity.

Mr. POMERENE. The Senator must understand that the price of silver is not so variable, that the price of gold is not so variable, and that the price of national bonds is not so variable as is the price of cotton.

Mr. VARDAMAN. They are all more so than cotton, I submit to the Senator.

Mr. POMERENE. I beg to differ from the Senator in that statement. This matter appeals to me very much, and when a feasible plan can be suggested I am willing to join hands with the Southern States to put it in operation. But I think that it must occur to Senators when they see that in the course of a month or six weeks the price of cotton has fallen from probably 15 cents to 7 cents that it may be——

Mr. VARDAMAN. Has not the Senator observed that in time of panic bonds depreciate in a greater amount than that?

Mr. POMERENE. Oh, as to industrial bonds, bonds of rather uncertain value, perhaps that is true; but, as I remember the Aldrich-Vreeland Act, there can be additional security provided as it may be needed and called for. But the thought that I wanted to leave with the Senate was that if it is a feasible plan for the National Government to provide a system of warehouse receipts for cotton which can be used by the Secretary of the Treasury as collateral security for the issue of notes under the Aldrich-Vreeland Act—and I understand, through the public prints at least, that the Secretary of the Treasury has signified his willingness to do that——

Mr. SHEPPARD. Not to the owner of the cotton.

Mr. POMERENE. I understand that, and, of course, that is true; but to the banks; that some system could be provided by each of the States, so that one could get a State warehouse receipt which would be just as available as a national warehouse receipt.

There is another consideration in that connection to which I should like to call attention. It seems to me that if the bankers of this country, and particularly in some of the Southern States, would take hold of the situation, as some of them do and as all of them ought to do, the condition might be very materially relieved.

Mr. WEST. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. O'GORMAN in the chair). Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I do.

Mr. WEST. The trouble about the States taking hold of the situation is the 10 per cent tax on State-bank issues. If we could only be relieved of the 10 per cent tax for six months, I think there could be a solution of the problem.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, it does seem to me, if the Senator will give just a little thought to the proposition, he will agree with me that we are not willing in this country any longer to have, and we must not have, 48 kinds of State-bank notes issued by 48 different States. I for one will never consent to it.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. SHEPPARD. Certainly.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Before the Senator from Ohio takes his seat, I want to suggest to him that many of the Southern States, on account of the unfortunate experience we had down there after the war, have inserted provisions in their constitutions which prevent them from issuing bonds or becoming surety for matters of this kind. I hope the Senator will not imagine that this appeal is made as a sectional appeal.

Mr. POMERENE. I do not so regard it.

Mr. VARDAMAN. We are making it as Americans; we are not making it as mendicants; we are simply a part of the harmonious whole of this great Republic; and we feel that governments are made for men rather than men for governments, and that the all-sufficient spirit of altruistic selfishness may move the Senate when it comes to act upon a matter of this character, not that the South may prosper alone, but that the whole Government may be benefited when the South prospers.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I have no doubt of the American spirit of the Senator, and I hope that he accords to me the same broad American spirit when I express myself as I do. I am willing to help the Southland, the Westland, the Northland, and the Eastland when we can; and I want, if we can, to find a solution of this problem and to do something that will relieve the South and be consistent with good business principles of finance and which will not jeopardize the national credit.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, I appreciate most deeply the spirit in which the Senator from Ohio has spoken. I believe it is the spirit which will prompt every Member of the Senate in approaching this problem, no matter to what party he belongs and no matter from what section he may come. With an appeal to Senators, regardless of party, to give this subject their best thought and their most earnest consideration, I shall soon conclude.

It will be seen that the chairman of the Banking and Currency Committee does not consider the bill S. 6565 a practicable measure. From conversation with other members of the committee I infer that they take the same view. Nevertheless, it must be admitted that the bill has served a useful purpose in bringing the southern situation before Congress and in developing the plan suggested by Senator OWEN. I believe that Congress now understands the danger confronting the South and the Nation. I shall gladly continue my efforts to develop some relief.

I now ask permission to insert as an appendix to my remarks my address before the Committee on Banking and Currency at the recent hearings.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

APPENDIX.

[Hearings on S. 6565, Tuesday, October 8, 1914, Committee on Banking and Currency, United States Senate, Washington, D. C.]

STATEMENT OF HON. MORRIS SHEPPARD, UNITED STATES SENATOR FROM THE STATE OF TEXAS.

Senator SHEPPARD. Mr. Chairman, I want to say that there will be several speakers, and I think it would be well for you to limit the time in advance, to such time as the committee can give us, and then stick to that. The amount of time that you will allow us will rest with the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. I think that is a very proper suggestion. I will limit the time, to start with, to 10 minutes.

Who is your first speaker?

Senator SHEPPARD. I think I shall open the discussion.

I want to say that the substantial features of this bill were indorsed by a national meeting of the Farmers' Union of the United States at its annual meeting held at Fort Worth in September, where 2,000 delegates were in attendance, representing all the cotton sections of the South. This bill represents their appeal for aid. It is a measure that they think is indispensable in the greatest emergency that has befallen them since the Civil War.

When the European war began, a little more than 60 days ago, the prospect in the South was for a 15,000,000-bale cotton crop, which would have brought an average price of 12 cents a pound, or a total of $900,000,000. I will state that this estimate has been confirmed by a statement that was given out by the Agricultural Department yesterday, a statement that the crop of this year would amount to 15,000,000 bales.

Senator HOLLIS. At what price per pound?

Senator SHEPPARD. The price would have been an average of 12 cents at least. I will ask some of the gentlemen present here who are more familiar with that than myself if that is not a modest estimate?

SEVERAL VOICES. Yes.

Senator SHAFROTH. That is solely in the United States; that is not the world's crop?

Senator SHEPPARD. The world over, because the price of cotton is always a world price.

Senator REED. Let me make a suggestion, Mr. Chairman—and I want to say that I am not making it with reference to this particular interruption that has been made, because I am as guilty of interrupting statements as anybody else can be—that when a man gets up to say something the committee, I think, ought to listen to him without interruption, especially when the time is limited as it is, and I am going to suggest that the speakers be not interrupted.

The CHAIRMAN. I think that is a good suggestion, and the Chair will ask the members to refrain from interrupting the speakers.

Senator SHEPPARD. Roughly speaking, two-thirds of this crop would have been sold abroad, bringing to this country $600,000,000 in gold. The seed, which is sold separately, would have brought, at prices then prevailing, an additional $140,000,000, making over $1,000,000,000 the proceeds of cotton—the annual proceeds. It should be added that the gold obtained for cotton sold abroad, our largest and most valuable export product, is our principal reliance for the payment of debts owed by this country to other countries and is the mainstay of our foreign exchanges.

It may be said that the effect of the European war has been the almost complete annihilation of the foreign market for raw cotton, the almost entire cessation of the trade in cotton at the hour of harvest, a decline in price of practically 50 per cent, and a paralysis of business, threatening general ruin throughout the South, which will affect, ultimately, every section of the country.

To give the committee an idea of how completely this foreign trade in cotton has been annihilated, let me say that the exports in August, 1913, amounted to 357,000 bales, and in August, 1914, to 21,210 bales. In September, 1913, the exports of cotton amounted to 930,000 bales; in September of this year they amounted to 120,000 bales.

The committee now has an idea of the complete destruction that has been visited on the principal source of gold supply that comes to this country from abroad.

The CHAIRMAN. You mean it is the shipment of cotton abroad upon which America bases its balance of trade with Europe?

Senator SHEPPARD. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Therefore it has a national bearing as well as a southern bearing?

Senator SHEPPARD. I thank the Chairman very much for that statement, because that was the point I had in mind. We thus see the national aspect of the question, and we see that the Government has every reason in the world to step in and prevent the disaster now pending.

But little cotton is being sold for either foreign or domestic consumption at the low prices now obtaining, and it is impossible to predict the extent of the financial disaster which may result. Cotton is the principal crop of the South, the basis of her prosperity; and her extensive purchases from other sections of the country are dependent almost entirely upon her ability to market her cotton crop. The strain on foreign exchanges, resulting in great part from the failure of the foreign market for our principal export article, cotton, has already necessitated the formation of a gold pool of $100,000,000 by American banks. If the farmer is compelled to leave a large portion of the present crop to rot in the fields, the price being too low to justify the expense of gathering—if some means can not be found by which he may be encouraged to store the surplus until the European demand revives, it is difficult to measure the sacrifices the Nation may have to make to meet its obligations abroad, to prevent an increasing flow of gold from our shores at the very time when it is needed here most. Adding to this the curtailment of the enormous purchases the South usually makes from other sections of the country, and of her ability to meet financial obligations in northern and eastern sections, it will not be denied that the crisis now confronting the South has aspects so distinctly national as to justify any aid the Government may legally render on the ground of a national emergency, if on no other.

The sudden decline in the price of her principal product has dazed and disheartened the people of the South. Cotton is preeminently the poor man's crop. The average farmer makes only a few bales, and these cost him from 9 cents to 10 cents a pound to produce. I think that is a modest statement as to the cost of production. With no market for our product, or a very limited one at a price distinctly below the cost of production, the South finds herself unable to meet her obligations, and the farmer finds himself unable to meet his obligations to the merchants and bankers who have provided him with the means of production. Thus he finds himself without means to buy the bare necessities of life for his family, not to speak of ordinary comforts, not to speak of the education of his children. In other words, the farmer is not going to get enough out of the crop to pay the debt that he has already contracted in order to produce the crop. So he faces a winter of starvation and distress, and you can imagine his state of mind. The shoeless feet and famished lips of his dear ones are part of the picture the immediate future presents to him.

And, gentlemen, we want to impress the situation on you, if we can. I do not feel that I am exaggerating it in the slightest, and I believe I will be sustained by men who have come here direct from the heart of the desolated and stricken South. These men, these cotton farmers, are descendants of the Confederate hosts that battled for four years for a cause in which they believed and for which they freely gave their blood. Here and there is an aged Confederate soldier who is still toiling on the land for which he fought. These men have borne, without complaint, the burdens of Federal taxation and have cheerfully contributed their share of the billions of dollars that have poured into other sections of the country in the shape of pensions. I know the patriotism and character of Americans in other sections too well to feel that the stricken South will have at their hands any other than the most sympathetic and considerate treatment.

Now, what do we of the South ask in this terrible hour? If the decline in cotton had come about from natural causes, or causes over which we could have had any control or which we could have foreseen, we would have had no case before the Federal Government except in so far as the Government itself might consider the problem a national one. What we ask is governmental aid in some form that will prevent the needless sacrifice of the present crop. If the crop can be held until it is known what the foreign demand will approximately be and until domestic consumption is revived, it is probable that three-fourths, or even four-fifths, of the crop may be marketed at such prices as will avert total ruin. The southern farmer turns instinctively to the National Government as the only power sufficiently strong to handle the situation. He saw Government funds deposited in New York in 1907 to save the market for speculative securities. He has seen panics averted by the mere declaration of the Secretary of the Treasury that hundreds of millions of dollars were in readiness to meet any unusual situation. He has heard of millions being deposited in banks to help him move his crops, and he wants to see the color of that money now.

If a great flood had swept the South from the Potomac to the Rio Grande, destroying property to the extent of hundreds of millions of dollars, the Nation would immediately act; there is no question about that. If a foreign enemy had begun a bombardment of southern ports and blocked all exportation every resource of the Government would be utilized in our behalf. Yet the South is as completely in the grasp of a war condition to-day, as far as her principal commodity is concerned—and many other commodities outside of foodstuffs, for that matter, because they are suffering also—as if a foreign enemy had blockaded every port and as if its guns were frowning at the entrance of every harbor. That is the situation exactly.

It is submitted that additional Treasury notes might be issued to be loaned to cotton farmers on cotton properly warehoused as security and at a price so low as to insure absolute safety and yet large enough to enable the present crop to be held until conditions are stable. The one hundred and twenty or one hundred and thirty millions of free gold now in the Treasury would furnish a redemption basis for a note issue that would go far toward solving the problem. We do not ask for charity; we ask merely for a chance to save an article which will sell, in normal times, where a United States bond would be rejected. We want a chance to use that article as security for an advance from the National Government. We present this bill here that has just been read as our conception of the situation. We ask the committee to consider that bill and see if we can not evolve some remedy that will meet the situation. I believe that we will have the sympathetic consideration of the committee. The bill is intended to point out the crisis and to pave the way for definite action. We want this great committee—a committee that has won a world-wide reputation already in reforming the Nation's banking and currency system—to give us the benefit of its best thought on this urgent subject.

Let me repeat here the language of Nehemiah on an occasion of overwhelming disaster many centuries ago:

"Then said I unto them, ye see the distress we are in, how Jerusalem lieth waste and the gates thereof are burned with fire: Come, and let us build up the wall of Jerusalem that we be no more a reproach."

Mr. WILLIAMS. Before the Senator takes his seat, will he state the remedy he proposes?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I have just read it, and I hardly feel that I can trespass further upon the time of the Senate.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Generally, it is a proposal that the Government advance money upon cotton at the price of 6 cents per pound, is it?

Mr. SHEPPARD. At 7 cents per pound.

Mr. TOWNSEND obtained the floor.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. TOWNSEND. What does the Senator wish—to ask a question?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I wish to address the Senate for a few minutes on the cotton question.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I have obtained the floor for the purpose of proceeding to address the Senate for a few moments myself.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If the Senator has the floor, I do not want to deprive him of it.

EMERGENCY REVENUE LEGISLATION.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, the pending bill proposing to impose an extraordinary tax of $105,000,000 upon some of the people of the United States at this time is a striking climax to 19 months of Democratic administration. Upon its passage we are told that Congress may adjourn, and its record will be submitted to the country in November, in order that the voters may pass upon it. It is the composite product of Democratic achievement, and to understand its meaning and its alleged necessity it becomes important to review the events which constitute its history. It is necessary to understand the conditions of the country in November, 1912, and political history since, in order that the situation in October, 1914, may be rightly understood and the philosophy of cause and effect properly applied.

At the time of the national election in 1912 the Republican Party, with the exception of a Democratic House in 1911, had been in full charge of the Government for over 15 years. Industry was never so prosperous, labor never so universally employed at so high a wage, our currency was never so stable, our national finances never so sound; progress along civic, industrial, and moral lines was never so sure and marked as they were prior to the election of 1912. Upon the commercial ruins wrought by Democratic policies from 1893 to 1897 an enormous industry had been erected. Our fiscal policy not only encouraged domestic production and placed the cost of the highest and best living at the lowest price, when measured by ability to purchase, known in history, but it kept the National Treasury full, notwithstanding that out of it from current revenues were paid nearly $300,000,000 for the construction of the Panama Canal. No bond issues in a time of peace, no burdensome extraordinary tax levies were then required to meet the expenses of government. The public debt was being rapidly extinguished, internal improvements were being constructed, the markets of the world, notwithstanding our lack of a merchant marine, were being captured by our manufacturers, the while our domestic commerce, the most stupendous in all the world, was held for American producers.

The Sherman antitrust law was for the first time since its enactment enforced against trusts and monopolies. Since the decisions in the Standard Oil and Tobacco cases not one new trust has been organized. The law had been declared sufficient to meet and destroy every possible effort to monopolize or improperly restrain trade.

The interstate-commerce act was made a living thing in the control of common carriers. Rebates were discontinued, the free pass was abolished, special privileges to favored shippers and localities were destroyed.

Laws for the protection of railroad employees and of the traveling public were enacted and enforced.

A Federal workman's compensation act was written into the statutes.

An employers' liability bill passed a Republican Senate and was smothered to death in a Democratic House.

An Industrial Relations Commission, having for its object the just solution of the problem of capital and labor, was legally enacted.

A Bureau of Mines and Mining and another of Labor were created.

The Panama Canal had been begun and was practically completed, and that canal, constructed by American money and American genius on American soil was declared to be the property of its builder and owner.

A pure-food law, protecting the people against impure, adulterated, and poisonous drugs and foods, was enacted.

The white-slave act was written into the statutes.

Meat inspection was provided by law.

A parcel-post system was established.

Postal savings banks were created.

Rural delivery of mail was extended to practically all of the people.

An emergency currency law, which has been a life preserver to the Democratic crew, shipwrecked in their unseaworthy currency boat, was passed.

Children, the material from which are made men and women who are at once the instruments as well as the objects of Government, were recognized as being of as much importance as cattle and hogs, and a Children's Bureau was created.

Two constitutional amendments, one for the direct election of United States Senators and another for the levying of an income tax, were submitted to the people.

A protective tariff was maintained under which Democratic farm mortgages were discharged, thousands of factories were erected, railroad construction was greatly extended, and every man who wanted to work found employment at the American wage.

These and many other laws promotive of the industrial, financial, civic, and moral welfare of the people were enacted under Republican administrations, and most of them during the six years immediately preceding March 4, 1913.

Gradually the people were coming more and more into the control of their Government. Men of ultrareactionary tendencies were at every biennial election being supplanted in public place by those of more progressive principles.

This in general was the condition of our country in 1912. In that year a political unrest appeared in the Republican Party. Indeed it appeared two years before, in 1909 and 1910. It had its nominal beginning in the passage of the Payne-Aldrich tariff bill. Ostensibly the struggle originated over schedules. The tariff bill was in the hands of men who, knowing that the people were favorable to protection, assumed to prepare it without due consideration of the rights of their colleagues, and if a true history of those events could be written it would disclose a set of arbitrary imperious leaders on one side and a set of equally arbitrary ambitious would-be leaders on the other. A Democratic House of Representatives was secured in 1910, not because of the people's faith in the Democratic Party, but because of speeches made by Republicans and circulated by Democrats.

"Cannonism" and "Aldrichism," which were synonyms for bossism, were the political cries of 1910 and 1912 campaigns, which were campaigns of prejudice and misrepresentation. The Democrats were beneficiaries of the contest between Republicans.

Through the overmastering influence of President Roosevelt, William H. Taft was nominated for President in 1908. The convention of that year was organized and controlled exactly as was the later one in 1912. The South was represented in the former convention, as it was in the latter, far in excess of the proportion to which it was entitled when measured by the Republican votes cast in that section. A strong Republican element, of which President Roosevelt was not a part, sought to change the convention rules in 1908 so as to eliminate a portion of the southern representation, but without avail. The effort was made again in 1912, and some of its leaders were of the faction which four years before had opposed it. And again the effort failed. The Republican platform of principles adopted in 1912 was such that either candidate for the Presidency in good conscience could have run upon it, but both could not do so at the same time. The minority in 1908 acquiesced in the action of the majority, but in 1912 Col. Roosevelt, while still proclaiming that he was a Republican, insisted that he was the choice of the party, and bolted the convention. He assembled an army of followers and made war upon the party which had given him his every political opportunity from police commissioner of New York to President of the United States. That he had a cause of complaint at the organization and conduct of the 1912 convention I have no doubt. That it was any different in principle from that by which he profited in 1908 I most respectfully deny. Both were partly bad, because in a measure they denied to the people fair and unbiased representation. The real trouble, however, originated in the conflict between the ambitions of men. In both conventions it was largely a contest between bosses and would-be bosses, with the balance of abstract right at both conventions with the "would be's." Those inequitable rules have now been changed, and the next Republican convention will be absolutely in the hands of the legally elected delegates. Democratic conventions have for years been dominated by personal and sectional interests in the same way, and the Baltimore convention did not register the will at that time of a majority of the Democrats in the United States whose representatives were there assembled. They were defrauded by political trickery; but that convention pledged itself to reform its methods thereafter. Inasmuch, however, as practically every other plank of that platform has been violated, this one may be repudiated also. The next Republican convention will be absolutely in the hands of delegates chosen directly by the people, who will be seated without regard to the national committee.

The Republican Party in 1912 was divided, as it was in 1872, into two factions, but the Democrats were wiser latterly than they were in the former campaign. They did not adopt one of the Republican candidates, but stood pat while Republicans forced victory upon them. Neither faction of the Republican Party desired Democratic success. It knew from bitter experience what that meant. And yet, through Republican dissension, the Democratic Party, constituting a minority of the people, was placed in power.

Since March 4, 1913, Democracy has been in full charge of all branches of the Government. There has been no division of either responsibility or power with any other party. There has been no division of responsibility or power in the Democratic Party. Indeed, it is impossible for a man to divide with himself, and Mr. Wilson has been President and Congress. Some Democratic Senators have at times declared their independence, but when the President has heard of their acts of insubordination he has sent for them, and, with a few rare exceptions, he got them. The fires of rebellion have been quenched and the erstwhile independent has become as submissive as the slave broken by the master's rod.

The Democratic Party came into power on a platform of principles declared by it in terms to be kept. It was not bait to catch votes, but it was a declaration of pledges to be observed, of principles to be followed.

Among the important, underscored provisions of that platform were these:

A tariff, except for revenue to meet the economical needs of government, is unconstitutional. The protective tariff is the principal cause of the unequal distribution of wealth and of the high cost of living.

The Republican Party is denounced for the "profligate waste of the money wrung from the people by oppressive taxation through the lavish appropriations of recent Republican Congresses."

It demands "a return to democratic simplicity and economy." And "a reduction in the number of useless offices, the salaries of which drain the substance of the people."

It condemns "the present method of depositing Government funds in a few favored banks in return for political favors" and pledges the Democratic Party to "provide by law for their deposit by competitive bidding in the banking institutions of the country, State and national, without discrimination as to locality."

It says, "We favor the exemption from toll of American ships engaged in coastwise trade passing through the canal." I shall not dwell upon the violation of this declaration. It will blot the page of our history which records it.

The platform indorsed the civil service in this language:

The law pertaining to the civil service should be honestly and rigidly enforced, to the end that merit and ability shall be the standard of appointment and promotion, rather than service rendered to a political party.

It insists upon the overthrow of "Cannonism," and offers itself to the country as an agency "through which the complete overthrow and extirpation of corruption, fraud, and machine rule in American politics can be effected."

It concludes all as follows:

Our platform is one of principles which we believe to be essential to our national welfare. Our pledges are made to be kept when in office as well as relied upon during the campaign, and we invite the cooperation of all citizens, regardless of party, who believe in maintaining unimpaired the institutions and traditions of our country.

By reason of the civil war among Republicans the Democratic Party rode into power on that platform I repeat that it came in when the moral, civic, political, and industrial conditions of the country were the most favorable and hopeful ever known in any land. It was a minority party, and yet it was legally vested with all the powers of government. Almost immediately the President assumed not only party leadership, as it was his right and duty to do, but he became the unquestioned, undisputed master of the majority in Congress. The majority in House and Senate surrendered their constitutional right to originate and enact legislation and became the obedient servants not of the people, but of the President. The secret caucus, condemned by author and candidate Wilson, has been the forum where laws have been made.

The public has not known, the minority has not known what arguments were made, what discussions occurred, what considerations were potential in the framing of those laws. Many times after the caucus bills had reached the Senate and were there subjected to criticism by the minority, and suggested amendments looking to the elimination of glaring errors had been made by Republicans, those amendments would not be adopted until the Democratic caucus had first considered them. "Cannonism," which was but the product of the House rules under which Republican and Democratic majorities had controlled the House of Representatives for years, was eliminated by a Republican House when it made it possible to consider bills without the consent of the Speaker and took from him the right to appoint the standing committees. The "kitchen-cabinet" system of Speakers Crisp, Reed, and Cannon, composed, however, of Members of the House, has been abolished, in a measure, and its place is now taken by the President, who conveys his orders to the leader of the House majority and to some trusty in the Senate. The Rules Committee under Republican administrations sometimes brought in rules for forcing bills through with limited debate, but those rules were seldom forced by caucus demand. In the open House their necessity and wisdom was determined. During the eight years that I was a Member of the House there were fewer by one-half of these so-called "gag" rules than have been passed in the three years that the Democrats have controlled the lower branch of Congress. Under Speaker Cannon the rules were adopted to carry out the will of the House majority. Under Speaker CLARK they have been adopted to carry out the will of the Executive. Instead of abolishing machine rule, as promised in its platform, the Democratic Party installed a political machine which has supplanted individual initiative and congressional independence.

Mr. President, the Congress of the United States, under the Constitution and in the welfare and perpetuity of the Republic, is second neither in power nor dignity to any branch of the Government. It is constituted of representatives of the people from whom they directly come and who pass upon their work every two or six years. Sir, from the Congress the people in the past have selected many of their wisest and most patriotic and able Presidents. The fathers thought that a body of men coming from every section and district of the country could be best trusted to legislate—that is, make the laws for that country—but they vested in the President the right to veto any of those laws which to him seemed unwise; yet even in cases of veto two-thirds of both Houses of the Congress could nevertheless enact them into laws. Under predetermined Executive legislation what a farce is made of this right to override a presidential veto. The President will not veto his own action.

The people have demanded that the action of their representatives should be open and public. Good business, good government, and good morals require that legislation for the people shall not be framed in the dark nor evolved in the secret caucus. Upon its every step from conception to consummation should shine the white light of unscreened publicity.

To some it may seem a trivial thing that the Executive encroaches upon the Congress, but the main difference between an absolute monarchy and a republic is that in the former the king is supreme, while in a republic the president is but one of the equal coordinate branches of the government; and yet, sir, to-day in Great Britain, which is a limited monarchy, the Parliament, in matters of legislation, is more independent and influential than is the Congress of the United States. Indeed, that high hereditary body, the House of Lords, yields to the people's Parliament. There the lawmaking branch—the initiating branch—is of the greatest importance, while here, through the encroachment of Executive power and by its servile submission to such encroachment, the Congress is becoming of secondary consideration.

The press, the showman, the Chautauqua lecturer, aye, many times the Congressmen themselves, have come to hold up to public scorn the legislative branch of our Government, without which the Republic could not endure. The questions asked are not what will Congress do about the tariff, about canal tolls, about the currency or the trusts, or any other great matter, but, rather, what does the President want? What measures will he insist upon becoming laws? What is his legislative program? When will he permit Congress to adjourn? It is believed to-day that whatever legislation the President wants he can obtain from Congress through secret Democratic caucus coercion. It has no legislative program of its own. He does have one of his own.

If the Congress continues to belittle its own dignity and power, the time will come when the taunts and slurs of the press and of other publicity agents may induce the people to abolish what will then have become the fiction of a legislative body and will vest all power in the President. Then the Republic dies and a monarchy is born.

But it may be asked, What has this to do with the proposition to levy additional tax burdens upon the people at a time when we are at peace with all the world, and our granaries are bursting with the products of the greatest harvest in our history? I shall endeavor to make the relation close before I am through. I shall show that much of the legislation of this Congress conceived in darkness, born in the secret party caucus, and reared into statutes by subservient tyros in legislation, has been illy considered, unwise, and extravagant, and that the pending bill is the humiliating result.

It was known and expected that the Democratic Party would revise the tariff. If it stands for anything, it is for free trade, except in so far as duties are necessary for obtaining revenues to meet the expenses of government. In April, 1913, the President assembled Congress in extraordinary session, and it has not adjourned since, nor doth it yet surely appear when it will be permitted to adjourn. Ostensibly it was called to revise the tariff, in accordance with the plank in the Democratic platform which I have heretofore mentioned. It was to be revised so as not to disturb but to benefit business and to reduce the cost of living. It was to aid American capital and labor by opening our markets to foreign competition and give our manufacturers enlarged opportunities abroad. This was the first and principal article in the constitution of the "New Freedom."

Under the secret-caucus method I have mentioned the administration prepared and enacted the existing tariff law. I do not believe any Democrat believes now that this law has accomplished any one of the benefits claimed for it by its advocates. From the day of its passage until this hour it has bred doubt instead of confidence; it has caused idleness instead of industry; it has dismantled factories, not built or enlarged them; it has taken from the Treasury of the United States $75,000,000 and placed it in foreign banks to the credit of importers; it has not reduced the price of living, but has increased the cost of obtaining it by lessening the ability of the consumer to buy.

Long before war became imminent in Europe this law had demonstrated the fallacy of the democratic argument, namely, if we buy more goods of foreign nations, those nations will buy more of us. Our purchases from foreign nations have increased $102,000,000, while our sales abroad have decreased in the same time $108,000,000. We have bought more; we have sold less.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I yield.

Mr. NELSON. If the Senator will allow me, when he studies the figures he will find that in the 10 months ending the 1st of August last, under the Democratic tariff law, we have lost $152,000,000 in our export trade, and there has been a gain of $82,000,000 in our imports in those 10 months since the tariff was enacted, up to the 1st of August, prior to the war.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I have tried to be ultraconservative when I have quoted figures. I have quoted from the reports of the Secretary of Commerce, and they cover, as I recall, nine months prior to the 1st of August. I am not clear as to the length of time, but in that report, where I obtained my information, I found that during those months we purchased abroad $102,000,000 more than we did in the same months the year before, and we sold $108,000,000 less.

Mr. NELSON. The figures I gave to the Senator cover the period from the time when the Democratic tariff law took effect. It took effect the 4th of October, 1913, the day after its passage, and from October to the 1st of August, for a period of 10 months, those are the figures, as I gave a moment ago.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I am obliged to the Senator for his suggestion.

Much that we have purchased from the foreigner we could and should have produced at home. We know that we have been the loser in our foreign commerce to the extent at least of $150,000,000 since the Underwood tariff became a law.

I am speaking now conservatively and am deducting from the total amount of trade against us the value of such goods as possibly we might not have been able to manufacture in this country.

This administration has donated to Canadian lumbermen $2,000,000, which is about the amount they contributed to the expenses of our Government last year, and if the Payne rate of $1 a thousand had been paid on the lumber foreigners shipped in during the first eight months of the Underwood bill, they would have paid more than twice $2,000,000, and no consumer has paid one cent less for his lumber under free trade.

It has already given to the Sugar Refining Trust over $10,000,000, and in two years, when all of the sugar tariff is removed, the gift will be increased many times that amount, and yet instead of the price of sugar to consumers going down it has risen, and to obtain the money for this gift and others like it this proposed tax is to be levied.

It has been not only generous but magnanimous to the foreign woolgrower and woolen manufacturer. To them at least $20,000,000 of money to be raised by this bill has been presented without a cent of benefit to American wearers of woolen clothes.

The importers of beef and cattle have been relieved from paying $5,000,000 toward the support of our Government, and that amount has been placed upon our own already overburdened taxpayers, and the consumer pays more for his meat.

The aggregate munificence of this administration to the importer based on the Payne rate applied to importations for this year would amount to the sum carried in the present bill, and if the old rate had reduced the importations one-half, we would still have obtained more than $50,000,000 from duties in excess of what we have received and will receive this year.

But these are not the only national losses American industry and enterprise have sustained since October 3, 1913. Domestic consumption has been reduced. Our people have not eaten as much, have not bought as many nor as good clothes. Inquire of your home boot and shoe dealer, and he will tell you that he is selling fewer and cheaper shoes, that he is now employing a cobbler where before he had an extra clerk, and that some of his customers who never wore a half-soled or a patched shoe before now are wearing both. The savings deposits of the banks have decreased, because instead of weekly savings weekly withdrawals are made, and were it not for the fact of 15 fat years under Republican policies, during which millions of savings were stored up to draw from now, the country's condition would be worse than it is at present. And here let me recall to Senators a statement which was made by the senior Senator from Alabama, when he was pleading with his party to exercise economy at the time the river and harbor bill was up. It grated so harshly on Democratic Senators' ears that they will not easily forget it, but neither will they mention it. I shall not be embarrassed by repeating it. He called his colleagues' attention to the fact that a revenue bill raising $100,000,000 would soon be in the Senate, and that it would probably be but a beginning of what would have to be raised hereafter. His suggestion may prove prophetic. The fiscal policy of this administration will have to be changed or else special taxation will be progressive. This proposed levy may carry the country through to the end of the fiscal year, but unless economy unknown to Democracy is practiced another extraordinary tax burden will be imposed next year.

I am not, however, hopeless of my country's industrial and financial future. It has survived Democratic administrations before, and it will survive this one. It will be poorer, but wiser. The European war, which is now the sheet anchor of Democratic hopes, the excuse which Democracy offers for the natural consequences of its own misdoings, will ere long prove a real financial good to some American industries. It is a heaven-crying pity that such an opportunity for profit should come to any country. Better our Nation in poverty than Europe in such a war; and yet it seems inevitable that some of our people will profit by this awful calamity for a season. The European war is now made the unpatriotic excuse of Democracy for Democratic blunders and southern depression, but ere long I believe it will become a real temporary benefactor to that party and section.

Cotton is the material of hard times. It is the chief example of an American product, raw and manufactured, which needs but little, if any, protection. The late tariff commission showed to my satisfaction that many American cotton products were sold here cheaper than they could be made abroad, and all that many cotton factories now need is for Congress to go home and quit meddling and speculating with business. If this Congress had never assembled, the present emergency would never have occurred. Let your cotton planters possess their souls in patience for a few months and the incarnated waves of war will discharge upon our shores a benefit to them. There is a tomorrow for cotton which would not have dawned under this administration had it not been for the European war. That day will not break for the copper and iron and wool and manufactured products of the East and North and West until this Government shall have adopted a new fiscal policy.

In the meanwhile do not ask us to levy a tax upon our people to save your cotton planters for a season, while ours, in many cases suffering as yours are suffering, are left helpless and hopeless indefinitely.

Referring again to the platform statements of the party in power, you will recall that the Republican Party was denounced "for the profligate waste of the money wrung from the people by oppressive taxation," referring, of course, to the tariff, "through the lavish appropriations of recent Republican Congresses." Now, the clear implication to be derived from that statement was that the Democratic Party if placed in power would not indulge in extravagance. Indeed, it demanded "a return to Democratic simplicity and economy." It also demanded "a reduction in the number of useless offices the salaries of which drain the substance of the people." What have been and are the evidences of Democratic reform in the expenditure of money and in the reduction of useless offices?

Up to date the appropriations of this Congress for the year ending June 30, 1915, have been $1,089,408,777, while for last year the total appropriation was $1,057,605,694, and for the last year of a Republican House and Senate the amount appropriated was $978,521,087. But this year's appropriations have not all been made, and besides it must be borne in mind that the expenditures for pensions this year are $11,500,000 less than they were one year ago. It must not be forgotten either that this year's appropriation for the Panama Canal is about $14,000,000 less than for the same purpose last year.

Mr. President, even with the false and unwise fiscal policy which has wrought and which will continue to work havoc with our commercial, financial, and industrial interests there would have been received this year money enough by the Government to meet expenses no greater than those incurred under the last Republican Congress. With proper economy we could have paid our debts. We, of course, can not remain solvent and with paternal generosity pay the legitimate expenses of the Southern States; we can not, under the guise of combating the boll weevil, conduct for the cotton section the extensive and costly processes of general agriculture; we can not carry their cotton in warehouses until the blight of Democracy has been lifted from the cotton mills and factories; we can not build railroads into the icebound regions of Alaska; we can not buy ships to embark upon a sea already crowded with empty vessels; in purchasing Government supplies, we can not play favorites for political or other mercenary reasons and pay from 50 to 100 per cent more for them than they could be obtained for from responsible bidders; we can not create million-dollar commissions to enter upon doubtful and illy defined duties pertaining to private enterprise; we can not display our profligacy and lack of patriotism by making a $25,000,000 present to Colombia; we can not create hundreds of new and useless offices "to waste the people's substance"; we can not do these things and keep the balance on the right side of the ledger.

The President in his last message to Congress calls attention to the fact that our revenues for August fell off $10,000,000 from those received in August a year ago. That is true, but they fell off only $2,500,000 from those of July, 1914. He was more politician than statesman when he said that, else he would have also stated that in July of this year the revenues from imports were $5,000,000 less than they were in July, 1913, and in February of this year the customs receipts were about $10,000,000 less than they were in February, 1913. He evidently used August because he could charge the falling off in that month to the European war. During all of the other months since the Underwood tariff was passed, save alone the month of May, the receipts from customs have been less than those of the corresponding months the year before, and no European war was on. As my distinguished colleague in the House, Mr. FORDNEY, has well said, the present war in Europe is not the cause of but it is the excuse for this unjust tax.

If I am unable to convince you of the extravagance of this Congress, let me call a Democratic witness, the chairman of the great Committee on Appropriations in the House of Representatives, Mr. FITZGERALD. At the end of every Congress the chairman of this committee is expected to summarize and justify the expenditures for which appropriations are made. On April 10, 1914, Mr. FITZGERALD, anticipating the task of justification that would later come to him, said this:

> Mr. Chairman, it may seem somewhat strange, but I hope it is not out of place, to remind Members on this side of the House that the Democratic platform pledged us in favor of economy and to the abolishment of useless offices; but it did not declare, Mr. Chairman, that the party favored economy at the expense of the Republicans and the abolition of useless offices in territory represented in this House by Republicans while favoring a different doctrine wherever a Democratic Representative would be affected. In a few months I shall be called upon in the discharge of my official duties to review the record that this Democratic House shall have made in its authorization of the expenditure of the public money. Whenever I think of the horrible mess I shall be called upon to present to the country on behalf of the Democratic Party I am tempted to quit my place. I am looking now at Democrats who seem to take amusement in soliciting votes on the floor of this House to overturn the Committee on Appropriations in its efforts to carry out the pledges of the Democratic platform. They seem to take it to be a huge joke not to obey their platform and to make ridiculous the efforts of the members of our party who do try to live up to the promises they made to the people. My colleagues upon this floor seem either to be so indifferent to a very perilous situation for our party or else, which I do not wish to believe, have so far forsaken Democratic practices and Democratic principles as not to deserve to continue in control of this Government.
> We charged the Republicans for 12 years of my service in the House under Republican administration with being grossly extravagant and reckless in the expenditure of the public money. I believe that charge to be true. I believed that my party, when placed in power, would demonstrate that the charges we had made in good faith were true. We are entitled to the help and to the support of the Members on this side of the House in honest efforts to carry out the pledges of the Democratic Party, and in our attempts to show that what we charged in order to get into power was true. We have not had that support. Our Democratic colleagues have not given that support to us thus far during this session of Congress. They have voted against recommendations they should not have voted against. They have unnecessarily piled up the public expenditures until the Democratic Party is becoming the laughingstock of the country.
> I appeal to them now before it is too late; I appeal to them now before we have gone beyond recall to stop the conduct of which they have been guilty. Do not continue to vote for these improper and improvident appropriations. Those who propose to continue to do so should at least have the courage openly to assert upon the floor of this House that they believe the professions of the Democratic Party have not been made in good faith, that they can not be carried out, and that we are not entitled to power because of those professions.

But Mr. FITZGERALD is not the only Democrat who has seen and dared to announce the truth about Democratic extravagance. Another Member of the House of Representatives, coming from the great State of Mississippi, Mr. SISSON, said this on the floor of the House last April:

> This is the most outrageously and criminally extravagant Congress that ever sat on the American Continent. I want to apologize to the Republicans for having called them extravagant when they were in control of the House. They were modest in comparison with the appropriations that we are now making.

In view of all this and more, will anyone dare to claim that the Democratic Party has kept faith with the people by its work in this Congress? Why, it has set a new high mark for the flood tide of extravagance.

Being by its platform committed to the abolition of useless offices, it was, ergo, against the creation of new offices; rather, I should, say, it was against that during the campaign in 1912; but the demands of the spoilsmen were so strong, the office seekers were so numerous, and the offices so comparatively few as to convert political platforms into fuel for the pyre on which Democratic principles were sacrificed. Recall, my Democratic friends, if your consciences will permit, the useless offices which you have created during this Congress; and if you can endure it, recall, also, the fact that in creating them you have also destroyed another plank of the Baltimore convention, viz, the one whereby you were pledged to an observance of the civil-service laws of your country.

Those laws have been shamelessly violated.

Tried and efficient employees have been severed from the service and their places filled under the spoils system. This has resulted in great extravagance, for the Government has been made to pay political debts.

After the Underwood tariff bill was enacted into law prosperity did not leap and bound throughout the length and breadth of the country. In spite of the President's threats to "hang as high as Haman" the wicked business men who failed; regardless of the expressed determination of the Secretary of Commerce to investigate and prosecute manufacturers who closed their shops or reduced the number of their employees; notwithstanding the promise of the Secretary of the Treasury to send the public treasure into parts of the country where business, not money, was short, the wheels of industry slowed down, sales were lessened, collections were bad, empty cars accumulated, locomotives became "dead," idle labor commenced to draw its savings from the banks, and even the President recognized the situation, and, while he called the trouble psychological, he applied a material remedy and thus was born another article in the "New Freedom." He discovered that money made business, whereas theretofore it was believed that business made money. Industry could never be free, bouyant, and yet substantial until our iniquitous currency laws were remedied.

The President had no definite concrete knowledge of just what ought to be done about the currency, but he was sure that action of some kind must be taken to supplement his tariff law. Some of the men around him, however, knew what they wanted, and that was more money. Its kind and quality and the method of obtaining it were not so important as the amount. In 1896, when prices were ruinously low, they wanted more money to increase prices and open factories; in 1913 and 1914, when prices were exceedingly high, they wanted more money to reduce prices and open factories. In some mysterious and as yet undisclosed place a currency bill was prepared and then presented to the Democratic House caucus. It contained all the facilities for issuing a fiat inflated currency which were buried under the voters' ballots in 1896. It allowed bankers to deposit their own notes in their own vaults as the reserves upon which their defenseless depositors and the holders of their bank-note currency must depend for security. Its one clear aim was to increase the currency with too little regard for its quality or for the safety of depositors. It provided for sectional regional banks to be controlled by a partisan political Reserve Board.

Under the whip and gag of the party caucus the bill passed the House and came to the Senate, where it was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency. On that committee were two Democrats, who, contrary to the desire of their Democratic colleagues, insisted on reading the bill before voting it out. These two Senators, together with the Republican members of the committee, and much to the disgust of the administration, found several hundred places in the measure which needed changing, and the changes were made. But those few changes did not make the bill good. Almost any change made it better. Every thoughtful man knew that the proper change was to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert a provision for one central government controlled bank, with branches wherever needed. But politics made it impossible to do the right thing, and the present law is the result. That it is sectional is shown by the fact that 2 of the 12 regional banks are located in one Democratic State. That it is possible to be controlled by partisan politics is demonstrated by the fact that the Federal Reserve Board is composed entirely of Democrats. That it is unable to meet the financial emergencies of the country is eloquently proclaimed by the fact that it is not taken advantage of by the administration in its present hour of distress, but reliance is had upon the condemned Aldrich-Vreeland emergency law. And even now a leading Democrat of the House is insisting that Congress proceed to amend this new currency law so that it can be made workable before adjournment.

The reserve board, being composed of experienced men, undoubtedly recognize the defects of the new law, and are striving to make it as harmless as possible before they put it in operation. It is an extravagant experiment, the expense of which must be met with this proposed unjust tax.

In connection with banks and currency, it is amusing, if not instructive, to refer again to the Baltimore platform and to the record of the administration on this subject. You will recall that it condemns—the present methods of depositing Government funds in a few favored banks in return for political favors—to provide by law for their deposit by competitive bidding in banking institutions of the country, State and national, without discrimination as to locality.

And pledges the Democratic Party—

Have the former methods of depositing Government moneys in banks been changed? Has the party by law and practice provided for deposits by competitive bidding to the banking institutions of the country? Have State and national banks been treated with impartiality?

The Government moneys were as widely distributed under the former administration as they are under this one. I have no knowledge of any competition for deposits. I know of no State banks which have been favored. I do know, however, that the President gave as one of the reasons for passing the pending bill that he did not wish to withdraw the $75,000,000 of Government funds now with favored banks. He preferred to tax the people for additional funds rather than to withdraw from these banks money already paid by and belonging to the people. I am informed on good authority that 79 per cent of the $75,000,000 of Government money now in private banks is in the Southern States.

I do know from reliable reports that while at the beginning of this administration it was apparently unfriendly to banks and big business, it now is depending upon their counsel, aid, and support—that is, upon the counsel and support of some of them.

We do not now know all the story of the relations between the United States Treasury and the Riggs Bank, of this city, and the Kuhn-Loeb Bank, of Wall Street, New York. We do know, however, that all Government deposits have been withdrawn from the former and that additional deposits have been placed with the latter, from whose directorate a member of the Federal Reserve Board was selected. Are the administration's skirts quite clear from the suspicion of favoritism to a Wall Street bank? We shall know about this later.

The financial experts of the country know that the Glass-Owen bill, so called, will be an expensive luxury, and that it will not assist in opening or maintaining a single industry or in giving an additional day's work to labor. It may be all right when there is no unusual strain, but the Aldrich-Vreeland law will be used in cases of emergency.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Does not the Senator——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey in the chair). Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Does not the Senator recognize that the operation of the Federal reserve act has not taken place because the directors of the Federal reserve banks have not been appointed as yet? Consequently the fund which is supposed to exist in the Federal reserve banks can not become available until the system is completed, which will be, probably, after a number of months have passed.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I said it was not in operation. It could have been in operation. The board could have been appointed months ago.

Mr. SHAFROTH. But the Senator must remember that there were delays. There was a delay in the Senate of months in respect to the confirmation of two of the members.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. NELSON. Those 12 Federal reserve districts were established as early as the 2d of April last, and yet the banks have not been put in operation.

Mr. TOWNSEND. There is not any question about it. It is the same old apology for delay that we had in the tariff law. They are not ready for it yet, and not ready for it because it is unequal to the emergency which exists. The Aldrich-Vreeland law must meet the situation, and that is clearly in evidence. The new currency law could have been put in operation if there had been a desire to do so.

After the currency bill became a law business did not pick up, as the proponents of the measure claimed it would, and the third article of the "New Freedom" was proposed, a commission which will cost the Government hundreds of thousands of dollars, to say nothing of the cost it will impose upon industry, was created by law. This commission is vested with the legislative, judicial, and executive functions of declaring what is unfair competition, of interpreting their own declarations, and then of enforcing the law they thus make. It was intended by the President to encourage and give confidence to business, and to that end a horde of political spies are to prey upon business men. Like the rain and the dew, they will fall upon the just and the unjust. They may say to this one, "Go on," and he may continue, and to this one, "Stop," and he must desist. Its ipse dixit will have the full force and effect of law.

Mr. President, if we had not been engaged in party discussions when the Trade Commission bill came up, I do not believe there is a Senator in this body who would agree that to grant such a power either to an individual or to a commission is wise under a republican form of government.

There were two parts to this third article; indeed, originally, there were three, but the third and only worthy one of the number apparently has died "a bornin'." The second part is known as the Clayton bill. As the conferees have shaped it, it is a sop to labor and the people and largely innocuous to trusts and combinations. Indeed, I believe it is welcomed by the trusts. The change of spirit toward banks and big business by the administration is reflected in the conference report on this Clayton bill. The modesty of the trusts would scarcely have allowed them to write a more favorable measure if they had been permitted to do so. The false hope of labor leaders that they have received substantial class benefits will end in disappointment. Legitimate business will receive no benefit, and illegal trusts and combinations will have the satisfaction of knowing that the antitrust law has been so complicated with new uncertainties that years will again be required for the courts to resolve the doubts.

The third article has just been written, and the Congress has the satisfaction of knowing that the orders of the President up to date have been obeyed. The constitution of the "New Freedom" has been adopted, even though no one knows what it means or what its results will be. All do know, however, that it will be expensive and that one of its results is this proposed tax burden upon the people.

Mr. President, this inexcusable tax levy does not represent all nor the greater part of the financial burdens which have been placed by this administration upon the people.

The loss in business throughout the country during the last year has shown its disastrous effects upon the railroads. On July 12, 1914, the New York Times printed a table showing the number of idle cars during the first six months of 1913 and for the same period in 1914. This table shows that on July 1, 1913, or three months before the Underwood tariff became a law, there were 155,841 fewer idle railroad cars than there were on July 1, 1914, eight months after it became operative and one month before war in Europe was mentioned. The "empties" on July 1, 1914, would form a solid train reaching one-seventh of the distance around the world.

Now, a railroad makes its money hauling freight and passengers. If all of its equipment is constantly employed its earnings are greater than when part is idle, and the greater the number of unemployed cars the less the earning power, the less the ability of the company to pay wages and to keep abreast of needed improvements and technical development. It is claimed, and I think truly, that unless the railroads are prosperous no one is prosperous, but the reverse of that is equally true, viz, unless the people are prosperous the railroads can not and should not be prosperous. Since the present administration took charge of the Government the railroads have run up the flag of distress. They have pointed to their idle cars, their "dead" engines, and their debit balances, and have asked the President to intercede with the Interstate Commerce Commission to the end that their freight rates may be increased, and they have been successful in their efforts. Rates have been increased 2 per cent, with a fair prospect that another 3 per cent raise will be granted. Who is to pay this additional charge? The people, the consumers, the same folks who are to foot this $105,000,000 tax. Is anything to be done to increase the people's business, to restore the losses which they have sustained? Not a thing, except it be to cotton planters. I have not computed the amount of this extra tax on freight, but it will mount up into many millions. And this is not all. The Interstate Commerce Commission has said that conditions warrant the increase by common carriers of passenger rates, and in the East the increase has been made. More millions of taxes upon the public, and all because, I assert, of the extravagance and unwise legislation of this administration. How much better it would be to facilitate business than to increase freight and passenger rates. How much better to employ American capital and American labor in developing American resources than to levy a tax to support railroad equipment in idleness. Have we reached the point where by taxation we must make railroad business profitable regardless of the profits of those who support that business?

Surely, Mr. President, the senior Senator from Mississippi was right when he declared on this floor that the poor old Democratic Party was incapable of running this Government. Its humiliating work during the last 18 months has furnished an incontrovertible demonstration of the truth of the Senator's admission. It is difficult, if not impossible, to discuss intelligently the pending bill in detail. The secret work of the Democratic caucus has just been presented to the Senate. I have had no opportunity to read it as yet. I am informed, however, that it is somewhat different from the House bill. When it is read for amendments, I shall, if I think it is advisable, discuss the items proposed for taxation. At this time I shall be content with these general observations upon the unwisdom, injustice, and want of necessity of placing any additional tax burden upon the people of the United States.

I conclude as I began, that this measure represents the result of 19 months of Democratic administration. It will stand as a monument to the incapacity of the party in power. In the Cleveland administration bonds were issued to meet the current expenses of the Government in a time of peace. After one year and a half of the Wilson administration a special tax levy of $105.000,000 is to be made, and this is but a part of the total extra tax represented by increased freight rates and other burdens that are to be imposed upon the people to meet the extravagant and unwise expenditures of this administration at a time when we are at peace with all the world. This is a record of which no party can be proud. It marks reaction instead of progress, and neither the European war nor any other extraneous matter should obscure the record. Partisan efforts will be made to justify that record with the people by placing false issues to the fore.

In the coming campaign the fact that war was actually declared upon Mexico when our Atlantic Fleet was ordered to Vera Cruz to avenge an alleged insult to our flag and when the militia in many States was ordered to be ready for war will not be mentioned by the defenders of this administration. They will claim that the President kept us out of war with Mexico. It is not true, as unbiased history shows. The Democratic campaign book will not quote from the eloquent speeches of Democratic Senators made on this floor the night that Vera Cruz was fired on and 19 brave American boys were killed and scores of Mexico's guiltless sons were shot down, for those speeches lauded the deed as a justifiable act of war. It will not state that it is no credit to this administration that more of our troops are not now in the Republic of Mexico, for war was practically declared by the President, and it would be raging to-day if three South American Republics had not used their good offices to avert it, or if Huerta had been strong enough to resist. It will not state that our ally, Villa, is still conducting a war in Mexico with arms obtained in the United States, and with its consent.

The fact that we are not involved in the European war will be the basis of Democratic arguments for political favor in the pending election contest, and the other equally evident facts, that there is no war party or sentiment in this country anywhere to-day and that any responsible official who willfully or recklessly involved us in that conflict would receive the righteous and just condemnation of the people, will not be mentioned. I do not know whether the coming campaign will be determined upon these false war issues or upon the real record, but some day, when the war clouds shall have lifted from the Old World, which, God grant, may be soon, the people of the United States will take an account of stock, and credit will be given where it is due and condemnation will be visited upon those who have checked American progress and prosperity. Time will make clear the cause and effect of existing conditions.

Mr. ASHURST obtained the floor.

Mr. SIMMONS and Mr. SMOOT addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arizona yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. ASHURST. I yield to the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent, on behalf of the Committee on Finance, to report back favorably, with amendments, the bill (H. R. 18891) to increase the internal revenue, and for other purposes, and I submit a report (No. 813) thereon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be placed on the calendar.

Mr. SIMMONS. I ask unanimous consent to submit an amendment, which I had intended to do in the committee, relating to the tax on the manufacture of cigarettes, but which by inadvertence was omitted. I ask unanimous consent to submit it at this time, in order to avoid a reprint of the bill. I ask that the amendment be printed, and I shall offer it at the proper time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be received, printed, and lie on the table.

Mr. SIMMONS. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr. ASHURST. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. I take it for granted that the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] makes the request for immediate consideration of the bill with a view to having it made the unfinished business?

Mr. SIMMONS. That is my only purpose.

Mr. SMOOT. And not for the consideration of the measure to-day?

Mr. SIMMONS. No; if my request be granted, I shall immediately ask that the Senate lay the bill aside temporarily.

Mr. SMOOT. One other question. I wish to ask the Senator from North Carolina if he has made the majority report on the bill to-day?

Mr. SIMMONS. I have made the report for the committee.

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to ask the Senator if he will not have printed as a Senate document the estimated revenues to be derived from the bill as reported to the Senate? I suppose the committee have the figures in their charge. I think it would be a very great convenience to the Senate if those figures were printed in pamphlet form.

Mr. SIMMONS. I will state to the Senator from Utah that I have no objection to having printed the matter to which he refers. What I have just now is rather in a rough form, it having been hurriedly prepared, but I have an expert working on the matter in order that we may correct the figures where his estimates are not satisfactory. As soon as he has finished them—and I think he can finish them by to-morrow—I shall ask that the figures be printed.

Mr. SMOOT. The reason I asked the Senator from North Carolina the question was that if he had such information prepared I would not ask to have printed similar information which has been prepared for me.

Mr. SIMMONS. I will say to the Senator from Utah that I have the information prepared; that it was handed to me last evening.

Mr. SMOOT. And the Senator will ask to have it printed to-morrow?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes; as soon as it is ready I shall ask to have it printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that the proposition of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] is agreed to.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I have had no opportunity to object. I understood that unanimous consent was asked, and I have not had an opportunity to object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understood that the Senator acquiesced.

Mr. MYERS. I desire to be heard.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair heard no objection at the time the request was made.

Mr. MYERS. I desire to ask whether the Senator from North Carolina made a request, or was it a motion, that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the revenue bill?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It was a request for unanimous consent.

Mr. SIMMONS. I asked unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill. I wish to say, however, to the Senator from Montana that it is not my purpose, if the request is granted and the bill for which I ask consideration is made the unfinished business, to have it proceeded with this afternoon. I shall immediately ask to have it laid aside.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. MYERS. I feel that I ought to object to the request. I feel that the conference report on the Alaskan coal-leasing bill ought to be made the unfinished business of the Senate. That conference report was made yesterday, and consequently comes in ahead of the revenue bill.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator from North Carolina if we can not have an understanding with him that he will not ask the consideration of the unfinished business until we conclude the consideration of the Alaskan conference report? I think that that report ought to be disposed of very soon.

Mr. SIMMONS. I have no purpose in the world to interfere with the consideration of the report on the Alaskan coal bill, and I made the statement to the Senator from Montana a moment ago that, if my request shall be granted, I shall ask unanimous consent to have the revenue bill temporarily laid aside so that we may go on with the conference report on the Alaskan coal-leasing bill.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I had intended to move this afternoon that the conference report on the Alaskan coal-leasing bill be made the unfinished business, with the intention of then asking that it be laid aside temporarily until to-morrow. As I understand, the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] and others wish until that time to look into the matter, and so I had not intended to press the conference report this afternoon. I had, however, felt that it ought to be made the unfinished business. In view of the request of those Senators, I do not feel like pressing the consideration of the report this afternoon, but I will say that I should like to have it taken up and considered to-morrow immediately after the conclusion of the morning business.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator from Montana, and also to the Senator from North Carolina, that I do not think there is any real necessity for any alarm over either of these measures. There will be no disposition whatever to defeat the consideration of them. So far as I am concerned, I am quite sure that the Senator from Montana will secure the consent of the Senate to take up and consider the conference report at some time to-morrow, and I am sure that it will not take very long to dispose of it. I am also just as positive that when that bill is out of the way the Senate will readily consent to consider the revenue measure and proceed with it in due order.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I said, and I repeat, that I do not desire to interfere with the conference report on the Alaskan coal-leasing bill, but I do desire that the revenue measure shall be made the unfinished business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator make that motion?

Mr. MYERS. It is not necessary for the Senator from North Carolina to make the motion, so far as I am concerned. I merely wish to utter a sentence. I do not intend to ask for the consideration of the conference report on the Alaskan coal-leasing bill this afternoon because, as I have said, the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], who is greatly interested in the measure, has asked that it go over until to-morrow, in order that he may look into it. He is not present, and I do not want to take any advantage of his absence. For that reason I will not ask that the conference report be taken up this afternoon, but I shall call it up and ask that it be proceeded with to-morrow after the close of the morning business. In view of the general statement of the Senator from North Carolina that he will then give way to it, I make no objection to his request.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from North Carolina to proceed to the consideration of House bill 18891? The Chair hears none.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

Mr. ASHURST. I think I have the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arizona has the floor.

Mr. NORRIS. I desire to submit a request for unanimous consent.

Mr. ASHURST. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. BRYAN. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. Is it not necessary for the Chair to lay the revenue bill before the Senate? That has not been done.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The point of the Senator from Florida is well taken. The Chair lays before the Senate House bill 18891.

Mr. WEEKS. On behalf of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN] I ask unanimous consent to submit an amendment to the pending bill. I ask that the amendment be printed and lie on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be received, printed, and lie on the table.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 18891) to increase the internal revenue, and for other purposes.

Mr. SIMMONS. I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, that order will be made.

COAL LANDS IN ALASKA (S. DOC. NO. 590).

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

Mr. ASHURST. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. I ask unanimous consent that the Alaskan coal bill may be printed in bill form in parallel columns, showing the bill as it passed the House, the bill as it passed the Senate, and as it has been reported by the conferees.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Nebraska? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

SOME ACCOMPLISHMENTS OF DEMOCRATIC ADMINISTRATION.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I have no disposition whatever to proceed now with my remarks if any Senator wishes to discuss the bill reported by the Committee on Finance a moment ago or if any Senator wishes to discuss the conference report on the Alaskan coal-leasing bill—I pause for a moment to ascertain—because I think the consideration of those measures is far more important than my speech. I do feel at this time, however, that it is incumbent upon some Senator on this side to make some reply to the jeremiad which has just been chanted by my distinguished friend the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND].

I take the Standard Dictionary of the English language, which I find on a near-by desk, and turn to the word "bias." I find that it indicates something—

> Running diagonally across the texture; cut slantingly, as a strip or band; said of cloth; in colloquial language used sometimes adverbially, as cut bias.

I also find this definition:

> Bias: A line, cut, or seam obliquely across the breadth of a fabric, * * * 2. A mental bent, inclination, or tendency; a prejudice or predilection, as in giving testimony; as a bias in his favor.

I can say, without injustice to my learned friend from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND], he is modest and that upon his unembarrassed brow nature has written "gentleman," but that he is a biased witness in favor of the Republican Party, and in view of the evident bias which he has made manifest in his speech just delivered, I deem it opportune at this hour to submit a few observations.

The Sixty-third Congress performed more laborious tasks than any other Congress that has ever convened. It was called upon to deal with more important domestic questions than any other Congress in the history of our country. In addition thereto, our Nation faced a grave crisis, as the European war is a calamity greater than has ever befallen humanity or civilization so far as history records, and our mind recoils from trying to picture the sacrifices of life which those responsible for this war have brought about.

President Wilson bravely faced this crisis of his administration and his feet trod the paths with marvelous circumspection at a time when a single misstep might have plunged our country into the maelstrom of war. It is interesting to reflect that many persons who complained loudly over President Wilson's policy of "watchful waiting" which prevented our being drawn into a bloody conflict in Mexico, now, much to their credit, approve his "watchful waiting." When a war breaks out some people say, "Well, it will not last long," but the truth is it lasts for all eternity for many men.

The President and the Congress have, above all things, remembered that it is our national duty to observe a strict neutrality among the belligerents, with all of whom we are at peace. We have observed an honest and rigid neutrality. Some persons have been inclined to criticize, deride, and ridicule our American diplomacy and to call it "the shirt-sleeve variety," because it is open, direct, and refuses to engage in intrigue.

Mr. GORE. And has not a dollar mark before it.

Mr. ASHURST. As the distinguished Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE], who is a master maker of epigrams, says, it "has not a dollar mark before it"; but the bloody fields, the ruined towns, crowded hospitals, desolate homes, war taxes, the thousands of valuable lives lost, and the weeping and wailing of the widows and orphans in Europe speak eloquently in behalf of American diplomacy, rather than in favor of the secret, royal diplomacy of Europe. The truth is there are some diplomats who believe that diplomacy consists solely of negotiations in which there is an evasion in every phrase and a hidden snare in every proposition.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WEST in the chair). Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. ASHURST. I yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. THOMAS. The statement of the Senator from Arizona reminds me very forcefully of a statement which I saw the other day. It was an extract from one of the London papers commendatory of the so-called American shirt-sleeve diplomacy. It declared that from now henceforth open, candid American diplomacy should be the only policy of all the nations; that the great conflagration now raging all over Europe, resulting in the destruction of so much property and so many lives, was largely the direct consequence of secret diplomacy, the making of private agreements in conflict with open and apparently complete negotiations.

I think that no higher tribute can be paid to American diplomacy than the fact that in this great crisis in Europe the nation which is one of the foremost in intelligence recognizes and acknowledges that that which it once ridiculed and reviled is to-day the only sort of diplomacy that commands its confidence and support.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, it is needless to say that I thank the able Senator from Colorado for this valuable contribution to my speech.

What a pity that Bryan's brand of diplomacy could not have been used in some of the chancelleries of Europe. Millions of people in Europe who are now arrayed against each other in battle have no knowledge as to why the war began or why it is being carried on. The United States is to-day practically the only first-rate power where the flame of civilization burns brightly and steadily.

When the famous dark day occurred in New England on May 19, 1780, it was the common belief that the end of the world had come. The Connecticut Legislature was in session and the house adjourned because of darkness and fear. Col. Abraham Davenport was asked whether the senate ought to adjourn also. He replied:

> I am against an adjournment. The day of judgment is either approaching or it is not. If it is not, there is no cause for an adjournment. If it is, I choose to be found doing my duty. I wish therefore that candles may be brought.

Another fine illustration of the right attitude was found in the recent action of the United States Senate. Early in last August millions of soldiers in Europe were fighting or preparing to fight, and the United States Senate was negotiating peace treaties. To the shortsighted man the debate of the Senate on the Bryan peace treaties seemed utterly absurd. The shortsighted man said, "Why talk of peace when millions of men are fighting?" Midnight darkness for the peace of the world and the Senate ratifying peace treaties seemed ridiculous. To the man of vision and foresight, however, it showed that the Senate did not believe that the end of the peace movement was at hand, and in any case believed it was its duty to go on with the work it was doing. Therefore the peace treaties were ratified with Italy and with 17 of the smaller nations of the earth.

In September similar treaties between this country and Great Britain, France, Spain, and China were formally signed. Germany, Russia, Japan, Turkey, and Greece have indicated their approval of the principle involved in these instruments and are expected soon to become parties to them. Thus within a period which will forever be memorable for its bloodshed the President and Secretary Bryan brought practically the whole world into an agreement that there shall be no hasty war so far as this country is concerned. By these treaties it is provided that all international disputes shall be referred to a permanent commission for investigation, and that in no case shall hostilities begin before the expiration of a year.

Somebody, I believe it was the New York World, has called these covenants "breathing-spell treaties," and that is precisely what they are. If there had been a "breathing spell" in Europe how differently history would have been written.

Mr. President, there exists every reason why we all may adopt a cheerful view of the future and find relief, as did the lover in Tennyson's grand poem, "Locksley Hall," who, when the fair one proved faithless, after a tumult of conflicting emotions—indignation, grief, and despair—found relief in glowing visions of the future enterprise and progress of the world:

> For I dipt into the future, far as human eye could see,
> Saw the vision of the world and all the wonder that would be;
> Saw the heavens fill with commerce, argosies of magic sails,
> Pilots of the purple twilight, dropping down with costly bales;
> * * * * * * * *
> Till the war drum throbbed no longer, and the battle flags were furled,
> In the parliament of man, the federation of the world.
> There the common sense of most shall hold a fretful realm in awe,
> And the kindly earth shall slumber, lapt in universal law.

A complete list of the achievements of the present Congress under the leadership of President Wilson is so long that it would be tedious to try to recount them, and I must content myself by referring hurriedly to the following:

By public appearance at the Capitol the President has emphasized the ending of government by secret conferences and private arrangement.

Modified self-government conferred on the Filipinos.

Divorcement of the Government from alliances with New York financial interests in international affairs.

Parcel Post System developed and extended, and express rates reduced in consequence.

Extension of pure-food and meat-inspection acts, with resulting benefits to consumers.

Armor Plate Trust forced to reduce its bids, at a saving to the Government of more than $2,000,000. Is that extravagance?

Post Office Department made self-sustaining. That is some more extravagance, I presume.

Extension of the special delivery system to the parcel post.

Home life of the farmer made a subject of special study by the Department of Agriculture.

Farm-extension measure, carrying to the farmers the benefits of the scientific study of experts.

Emphasis given by the President to the presidential preference primary plan.

Better protection for passengers and property at sea has been looked into, taken cognizance of, and will be enacted into law.

Enactment of the Alaskan railway bill, opening up Alaska, as promised.

Academic, vocational, and technical instruction for enlisted men in the Navy provided by Secretary of the Navy.

Dissolution of the Southern Pacific merger and surrender of stock held by Pennsylvania Railroad in its competitor, the Baltimore & Ohio, accomplished along lines agreeable to the administration.

Prosecutions begun against several large trusts which have not agreed to a settlement along peaceful lines.

A firm foreign policy—one of "watchful waiting"—which prevented war with Mexico, avoided the untold loss of lives, the demoralization of business, and a staggering debt, which always follows war.

A revision of the rules of business, without the usual and heretofore inevitable panic. As a result of the efforts of this administration the laws have been made the same for everybody, big and little, not by wholesale denunciation, but by peaceful and judicious means.

We have refuted and fully answered the oft-repeated taunts that the Democratic Party has not the capacity for solving questions requiring constructive statesmanship, and we call as witnesses the currency, the tariff, the income tax, the trust bills, and other wise legislation, measures that not only received the votes of Democrats, but the votes of Republicans and Progressives as well in both the Senate and the House.

Witness a tariff that compels the trusts to sell as cheaply to you as to the people of foreign lands, framed without concessions to special interests.

A currency law under which when you deposit your money in the bank you get it when you need it—one that prevents panics.

An income tax that places upon the rich some proportion of the $1,000,000,000 a year which is now the cost of maintaining the Federal Government.

Witness the Federal Trade Commission bill. One of the great issues in the last presidential campaign was whether the solution of the trust problem was to be found in the regulation of monopoly or in the regulation of competition. The Democratic Party declared itself for the abolition of monopoly and the regulation of competition. Regulation of competition means the prevention of competition that destroys for the purpose of gaining monopoly, and so is harmful to the public—the prevention, in short, for unfair competition. The Sherman Act is adequate for the abolition of monopoly; it is, however, but imperfectly adequate for the regulation of competition. The Sixty-third Congress enacted a law creating a trade commission which will properly regulate competition, and thus supplement the Sherman law and supply its deficiency.

Witness an arbitration act, providing for conciliation and arbitration in controversies between capital and labor, which has already been successfully employed.

An enlargement of the scope of the parcel post, which has reduced the cost of transportation and become a lasting and convenient instrument of benefit to the consumer and producer.

Under the recent antitrust bill, the conference report which was agreed to just the other day, the trusts are required to obey court decrees; abandon unfair, cut-throat competition; cease discriminating between purchasers of their goods; disgorge control of competitors acquired under "holding-company" system; surrender the enormous power wielded through interlocking directorates

The following are the teeth of the Clayton-Culberson antitrust law:

Labor, agricultural, and horticultural organizations not conducted for profit are exempted from provisions of the Clayton bill relating to monopoly.

Officers of corporations violating the trust laws can be fined and imprisoned.

Holding companies are prohibited where their effect is to lessen competition or create monopoly.

Interlocking directorates in competing corporations, any one of which has a capital of more than $1,000,000, are made illegal two years after the passage of the bill.

Interlocking of railroad directors are forbidden with corporations dealing in securities, railroad supplies, or contracts in excess of $50,000 a year, except where the transactions are shown to be by public competitive bidding or with the consent of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

In the Clayton-Culberson antitrust law just passed there is a laborers' bill of rights, for this law rejects the brutal doctrines that labor is a commodity such as coal, copper, wheat, and lumber. This bill declares "that the labor of a human being is not a commodity or an article of commerce."

Under this law judges are prohibited—

First. From issuing injunctions against persons on account of their ceasing to perform any work or labor.

Second. From issuing injunctions to prevent laborers from recommending, advising, or persuading others by peaceful means to cease work.

Third. From issuing injunctions enjoining laboring men from attending near a house or place where any person resides or works or carries on business or happens to be for the purpose of peacefully obtaining or communicating information or peacefully persuading any person to work or to abstain from work.

Fourth. From issuing injunctions enjoining laboring men from ceasing to patronize any party to a labor dispute.

Fifth. From issuing injunctions enjoining laboring men from recommending, advising, or persuading others by peaceful means so to do.

Sixth. From issuing injunctions enjoining laboring men from paying or giving to or withholding from any person engaged in any labor dispute any strike benefits or other moneys or other things of value.

Seventh. From issuing injunctions enjoining laboring men from peacefully assemblying at any proper place in a lawful manner and for lawful purposes.

Eighth. From issuing injunctions enjoining laboring men from doing any act or thing which might lawfully be done in the absence of such labor dispute by any party thereto.

Under this law laborers are allowed to do peaceful picketing and jury trials shall be had in cases where persons are charged with indirect contempt of court. These wise and just provisions have been placed into the law in order that labor may have an effective way in which to enforce its just demands.

It is very gratifying to state that upon the following additional important measures of interest to the working people of the United States the Sixty-third Congress, or the third session of the Sixty-second Congress, took complete and final action. It is additionally satisfying to say that this record is the best any Congress ever made in behalf of the organized labor forces of the country.

A national Department of Labor was created, the Secretary of same to be a member of the President's Cabinet. The first Secretary to occupy this honorable and responsible position was formerly the national secretary of the United Mine Workers of America and for six years a Member of the House of Representatives; during the last term of two years he was chairman of the House of Representatives Committee on Labor.

All contractors and subcontractors doing work for the National Government, as well as on naval contracts and fortification contracts, must hereafter observe the eight-hour day.

Eight hours per day will be the maximum hereafter for all post-office clerks, letter carriers, and employees in the railway post offices.

Workmen employed on levees and water fronts and dredge operators have had the eight-hour-day law extended to such employments.

The Bureau of Mines act was amended and strengthened, thereby tending to conserve the health and safety of coal and metalliferous mine workers.

The national law granting compensation for injuries to Government employees was extended to employees in the Bureau of Mines and to lighthouse employees.

The manufacture of white phosphorus matches has been prohibited.

A physical valuation law for steam railroads and express companies was passed.

Increased appropriations were obtained to develop rescue work in the Bureau of Mines.

The three-watch or eight-hour system in the merchant marine, applicable to masters, mates, and pilots, was established.

Wages were increased for all employees in the Naval Gun Factory and for the pressmen in the Government Printing Office.

Public construction in Government navy yards of naval vessels, transports, and colliers has been extended, in opposition to such construction in private shipyards.

A law was enacted by which a Children's Bureau was established which will be effective in conserving the best interests of the children by practicable and scientific methods.

Former Presidents Roosevelt and Taft were directly rebuked by Congress because of their arbitrary Executive order depriving Government employees of the right of petition, the right of organization, and the right of hearing in the case of a discharged employee of the Government. The full rights of citizenship have been restored thereby to all employees of the National Government.

One of the best reforms, however, that has been accomplished is that the more or less famous "twilight zone" in our laws has been removed; that is to say, there is now no middle ground where "special interests" and predatory "big business" can take refuge from the laws of both State and Nation and plunder the people.

Another of the most valuable reforms is that the present administration has applied publicity to everything. The radium of publicity will cure corroding cancers in the body politic.

I have referred to the Democratic campaign book. I will now refer to it again in propounding some questions which I wish the distinguished Senator from Michigan would answer. Before you have a right to criticize the Democratic Party we want first to know what you are going to do if you are returned to power, and we want to ask you these questions:

What is your program if you are returned to power?

What Democratic laws would you repeal?

Would you repeal the income tax?

Would you take a backward step on the parcel post?

Would you again put your O. K. on Schedule K of the Payne-Aldrich tariff?

Would you restore the panic-breeding currency laws that made possible the great industrial and financial disaster of 1907?

Would you repeal the agriculture extension bill?

Would you restore the tax of $120,000,000 a year on the sugar consumed by the people?

Would you again work the wireless between the "special interests" and the seat of government that was worked during previous administrations?

Would you establish the old partnership between rotten politics and rotten business?

Are you for the express companies or the parcel post?

Are you for a tax on sugar or a tax on wealth? The Republican Party levied a tax on sugar; the Democratic Party levied it upon the incomes of the rich.

You Republicans wish to keep your political past a profound secret. We Democrats seek by all means to publish ours to the whole world.

To the voters of the United States the Democratic Party says "Read our record."

To the voters the Republican Party says "Let us forget."

The Democratic record is one of faithful service. The recent Republican record is an inventory of past mistakes.

You say that we have stretched the Federal Constitution, but our reply is that the "reactionaries" stretched it to cover every dollar in the Nation and that we have utilized it to cover and protect every person in the Nation.

We simply ask the voters to read the record and then choose which of the parties he would have for a servant.

In bringing about these reforms, the Democratic Party, naturally enough, has not met with the approbation of all persons. I pause right here to say that in bringing about these reforms the votes of Republicans and Progressives in both Houses of Congress have been cast for the measures. As somebody well said not long ago, it is up to the other side either to quit voting for our measures or to quit abusing them. It is idle and vain, Mr. President, to expect unanimous approval, as that is not even within the domain of imagination. It is very difficult, if not impossible, for a considerable number of persons, howsoever sincere, to agree on any one large subject as to all its details. Many worthy citizens conscientiously differ from us and fail to see any real reforms accomplished by the present administration.

Moreover, any person can point out defects and abuses, but it requires true statesmanship to point out remedies. While in the minority, as it was for 16 years, the most important function of the Democratic Party was—as it is always the function of the minority—to criticize. The position of a Member of Congress in the minority under our American system differs from the duties of a Member in the majority. The minority must criticize and object, the majority must construct and create; in other words, it must steer the ship.

Any person can destroy, while but few can create. A boy with a hammer in five minutes may destroy a statue which cost years of labor to create, and yet that boy may not be able to build up a snow man. Venus de Milos and Venus de Medici can not be purchased with money, yet a boy with a hammer could in two minutes reduce them to fragments of marble worth not above $2.

A person with a brush and a pot of tar could mutilate, splash, and ruin the grandest painting ever placed upon a canvas, and yet such person might not be able to draw a caricature.

A hostile force could within a few hours wreck and destroy Westminster Abbey in London, the Prado Museum in Madrid, the Dresden Galleries, the Louvre, the Congressional Library and National Museum at Washington, all containing monuments and treasures that are the masterpieces of ages, held for posterity, and yet the all-destroying vandals might not be able to build a barracks for their own quartering.

In most all departments of life's work it is useless to point out an abuse or evil unless at the same time we are prepared to propose a remedy.

He would be a very strange lawyer who could not summon sufficient legal capacity to point out defects in the antitrust laws, yet he would be a rare and profound lawyer who could suggest a remedy that would dispense exact justice to every person in our Nation.

He would be a dullard of a banker who could not point out some defects in the currency law, but the banker who can suggest a remedy that would render exact justice to all persons would achieve honor and imperishable renown.

We are all very slow to learn that at best the fruits of good government to us seem dim, abstract, far off, hazy, and nebulous. The fruits of good government and fair laws are justice, equity, civil, political, and religious liberty, peace, and equality of opportunity.

There are in the world tangible values—values that you can see, measure, weigh, analyze, mortgage, or sell; for instance, lumber, iron, paint, leather, copper, wool, horses, and cattle are tangible values. In other words, these things within certain limitations are susceptible of physical valuation. In the fever and hurry of the practical workaday world we are liable to forget that there are many things just as useful to mankind whose values are intangible and are not susceptible of physical valuation. Courts, assessors, and appraisers are unable to make any computations as to the amount of money value to be placed upon something which has an intangible value. Therefore at times some of the choicest and most precious fruits of just and beneficent laws have no tangible value; that is, no value that is measurable by money.

Justice, sentiments, character, credibility, peace, patience, prudence, moderation, magnanimity, courage, and ideals are all intangible values. You can not mortgage or sell these things, but their enjoyment may be curtailed or warped by unwholesome and unfair laws; just so, their enjoyment may be promoted by wise laws. Quite naturally enough there are, of course, in every nation, every government, and every political party those who see nothing but the tangible values and who are therefore seeking fruits of organization, special favors, pork-barrel legislation, and spoils. Moreover, many earnest people believe that the United States Treasury is a sort of national grab bag, and that it is a Senator's duty to grab all he can out of the bag for his own State; and those people who look upon the Treasury as a grab bag always seem to forget that the Treasury is replenished only by taxes levied upon the people. Many worthy people pay no attention to some of the intangible values and are utterly unable to appreciate them or are oblivious to them. Many, if not most, camp followers and reactionaries are prone to view these intangible values as mere floating phantoms or "the stuff that dreams are made on"; are prone to view peace, patience, prudence, moderation, equity, equality of opportunity, ideals, and sentiments as tolerable, indeed, but as a trifle too unreal, vague, unsubstantial, and illusory, for they can not be sold, delivered, hypothecated, nor made the subject of movements on the stock exchange. So whenever a government, a political party, a man, or a woman commences a movement for a larger liberty and a truer happiness for all the people such movement will sometimes be ridiculed and derided as of no particular value, because those who criticize or object are unable to comprehend anything except tangible values.

Intangible values make a nation great even more truly than does material wealth.

Let me ask, What is a nation? Is a man made or measured by his office, his contracts, his gold, his lands, or by the character that is his and the courage of his soul? Is a nation land and water, law books, and a treasury? Do government buildings, courts and congresses, armies and navies make a nation? These things, my friends, are but the garments, the decorations, the weapons of nationality. These trappings do not touch the essence of nationhood, which, like the essence of manhood and womanhood, is a purely spiritual thing. A nation is the composite soul of a people struggling to make itself immortal in the common good of all.

Soul and not goods is the test of the nationhood of a people. But what is the true measure of greatness? Is it a matter of acres? Was Greece small in the days of Pericles? Were the 13 American Colonies small in the days of Washington, Jefferson, Ben Franklin, and Patrick Henry? Can you weigh a nation in terms of transportation or by tonnage tables? Were the Egyptians building the Pyramids as strong as the Israelites carrying the Mosaic law across the desert? Does a nation's power consist of battleships and soldiery? Was the sword of Cæsar more powerful than the words of St. Paul? Is the accumulation of capital a security beyond the hour? Will John D. Rockefeller be remembered in history as long as John the Baptist? Was the rich pharisee as truly justified as the poor publican?

Sir William Jones, whose unremitting literary labors and whose vast knowledge of laws and language made posterity his debtor, still further increased civilization's debt to himself when he wrote that splendid poem, entitled "What Constitutes a State."

What constitutes a State?
Not high-raised battlement or laboured mound,
Thick wall or moated gate;
Not cities proud with spires and turrets crowned;
Not bays and broad-armed ports,
Where, laughing at the storm, rich navies ride;
Not starred and spangled courts.
* * * * *
No; men, high-minded men,
* * * * *
Men who their duties know,
But know their rights, and knowing, dare maintain,
Prevent the long-aimed blow,
And crush the tyrant while they rend the chain;
These constitute a State.

Hence it is that the beneficent effects of some of the wisest reforms accomplished by the present administration will not make themselves manifest immediately, but in the long years to come as time ticks on the people will gratefully remember this President and this Congress, for they have worked untiringly for the best interest of the American people, they have worked without a vacation, and with a sincerity and morality entirely new to our political life, and have valiantly striven toward national tranquillity, constitutional freedom, and all the noble sentiments and generous ambitions that adorn and elevate human nature.

IMPROVEMENT OF EAST RIVER AND HELL GATE, N. Y.

Mr. O'GORMAN. On behalf of the senior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS], who has been temporarily called out of the Chamber on official business, I desire to make a favorable report from the Committee on Commerce on Senate joint resolution 194, and I submit a report (No. 814) thereon. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the joint resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SHEPPARD in the chair). Is there objection?

Mr. SMOOT. Let it be stated, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the title of the joint resolution.

The SECRETARY. A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 194) authorizing the Secretary of War to use any allotment made under the provisions of an act approved October 2, 1914, entitled "An act making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes," for the improvement of East River and Hell Gate, N. Y.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I certainly want some information about this joint resolution before giving my consent to its immediate consideration.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I desire simply to make this statement: In the East River close to New York Bay there is a very dangerous reef known as Coenties Reef. It is a menace to navigation. In the recent rivers and harbors bill an ample appropriation was made for it. It went out, however, with so many others. There is an emergent need of some attention being given to the matter at this time, and the Commerce Committee of the Senate has favorably considered this joint resolution, which simply authorizes the War Department to avail itself of certain allotments made in a previous act. The joint resolution has the approval and, I think, the recommendation of the War Department.

Mr. SMOOT. I will ask the Senator if the report is unanimous?

Mr. O'GORMAN. Owing to its emergent character the committee has been polled. I think every Republican member of the committee has signed and every Democratic member who was available has signed, including the acting chairman, the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS]. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON], who is thoroughly familiar with the improvement, took up the matter, and it was he who secured the polling of the committee.

Mr. SMOOT. In view of the statement made by the Senator from New York, I shall not object to the present consideration of the joint resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution, which was read, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of War is authorized and empowered to use any allotment made under the provisions of an act approved October 2, 1914, entitled "An act making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes," for the improvement of East River and Hell Gate, N. Y., together with any funds heretofore appropriated for the said improvement and now available, for the removal of Coenties Reef to a depth of 35 feet below mean low water.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LEON GREENBAUM.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I trespass upon the indulgence of the Senate for another moment to ask their consent for the passage of the bill (H. R. 10168) for the relief of Leon Greenbaum, reported from the Committee on Claims.

The beneficiary, while an employee of the Brooklyn Navy Yard and in the course of his duties, sustained an injury which involved the loss of a leg. The Committee on Claims has made an award of $2,500, and I ask that it be taken up for consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be read.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Claims with an amendment, on page 1, line 4, to strike out "$1,750" and insert "$2,500," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That there be paid, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $2,500 to Leon Greenbaum, of New York City, N. Y., to compensate him in full for all claims he may have against the United States arising out of injuries received by him while in the Government employ in the Brooklyn Navy Yard, Brooklyn, N. Y., in April, 1911.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

ARTHUR J. FLOYD.

Mr. NORRIS. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill (S. 5497) authorizing the issuance of patent to Arthur J. Floyd for section 31, township 22 north, range 22 west of the sixth principal meridian, in the State of Nebraska.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized to issue patent to Arthur J. Floyd for section 31, in township 22 north, range 22 west of the sixth principal meridian, in the State of Nebraska.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ROCKY MOUNTAIN NATIONAL PARK.

Mr. THOMAS. I ask unanimous consent to take up the bill (S. 6309) to establish the Rocky Mountain National Park in the State of Colorado, and for other purposes.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Public Lands with amendments.

The first amendment was, in section 1, page 1, after the words "to wit," in line 5, to strike out down to and including the words "State of Colorado," page 9, line 10, and to insert:

So as to read:

That the tract of land in the State of Colorado particularly described by and included within metes and bounds as follows, to wit: Beginning at the southeast corner of section 34, township 3 north, range 73 west of the sixth principal meridian, Colorado, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 3, page 13, line 13, after the word "such," to strike out the words "private claims or," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 3. That no lands located within the park boundaries now held in private, municipal, or State ownership shall be affected by or subject to the provisions of this act; but the State or any person, individual, or entity holding such title may surrender the same to the United States, the same thereby becoming a part of the park; and, upon the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, be granted, in lieu thereof, without regard to quantity or acreage, but on a basis of equal value, lands from the public domain of the United States situated elsewhere and not contained in any national forest or other reservation; or, with the added approval of the Secretary of Agriculture, may receive in exchange lands included within a national forest; or, upon proper conditions, dead, decadent, or mature timber from the national forests; or, when in the judgment of the Secretary of the Interior advantageous to the park, may receive the right to remove dead or decadent timber from the park area.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

THOMAS HAYCOCK.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 2696) for the relief of Thomas Haycock.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be read.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It proposes to pay to Thomas Haycock the sum of $500, to reimburse him for the sum paid by him to the Government in excess of the amount of the surety bond signed by him in behalf of the late postmaster at Tropic, Utah.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CHARLES S. WELLS.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 2287) to correct the military record of Charles S. Wells.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with an amendment on page 1, line 10, after the words "eighteen hundred and sixty-one," to insert the following proviso:

Provided, That no back pay, bounty, pension, or other emolument shall accrue by reason of the passage of this act.

So as to make the bill read:

Wells shall be held and considered to have been honorably discharged from the military service of the United States as a member of Company F, Twelfth Regiment New York Volunteer Infantry, on the 26th day of December, 1861: Provided, That no back pay, bounty, pension, or other emolument shall accrue by reason of the passage of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill for the relief of Charles S. Wells."

Mr. KERN. I move that the Senate take a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I have a little bill which I should like to have passed.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. And I have one also.

Mr. KERN. I will withhold the motion for the present.

GEORGIA RAILROAD & BANKING CO.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I ask unanimous consent to call up the bill (S. 926) for the relief of the Georgia Railroad & Banking Co.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $4,888.68 to the Georgia Railroad & Banking Co., formerly called the Georgia Railroad Co., for the balance due it for the transportation of the United States mails under contract prior to May 31, 1861, on routes Nos. 6136, 6143, and 6144, Georgia, said balance having been found due by the Auditor for the Post Office Department and reported to Congress by the Secretary of the Treasury in Document No. 297, first session Fifty-ninth Congress.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

RECLAMATION SERVICE.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 172) excepting the Reclamation Service from the operation of section 5 of the act of Congress approved July 16, 1914.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution, which was read, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the provisions of section 5 of an act of Congress approved July 16, 1914, making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915, and for other purposes, shall not apply to the purchase, maintenance, repair, or operation of any motor-propelled or horse-drawn passenger-carrying vehicles used or required by the Reclamation Service in connection with the construction, operation, or maintenance of any reclamation projects or works authorized or constructed under the act of Congress approved June 17, 1902, or acts supplemental thereto or amendatory thereof.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ASSAY OFFICE IN NEW YORK CITY.

Mr. SWANSON. There is a measure that I desire to have passed, which is very important. Congress made an appropriation of $607,000 to remodel the assay office and other offices of the United States Government in Wall Street, New York.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. What is the calendar number?

Mr. SWANSON. It is not on the calendar. I report back favorably without amendment from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds the bill (H. R. 13296) for the enlargement of the Wall Street front of the assay office. It was thought that the building could be remodeled, but the Secretary of the Treasury and the Supervising Architect, after examining into the matter, reached the conclusion that for the same amount of money it would be cheaper to demolish the building and erect a new one rather than remodel the old one.

A bill was introduced in the House and in the Senate authorizing the change from remodeling to a reconstruction. The bill passed the Senate and it is over in the House. The House passed an identical bill and it came to the Senate, and it is the House bill which I report favorably from the committee.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I should like to ask the Senator from Virginia when is the money to be spent?

Mr. SWANSON. The money has already been appropriated. Under the acts of March 4, 1911, and August 22, 1912, an expenditure of $607,408 was authorized for remodeling the assay office in New York.

Mr. VARDAMAN. How much has been spent?

Mr. SWANSON. Not any of it.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Why not postpone the expenditure until the times get a little better?

Mr. SWANSON. The money has already been appropriated, and it will never be used for any other purpose.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I think we ought to cut down our expenditures in such matters until after the European war.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. VARDAMAN. Yes; I object.

Mr. SWANSON. I will say to the junior Senator from Mississippi that the Secretary of the Treasury about a month ago wrote a letter to me urging the necessity of getting the bill through. He said that the quarters are crowded and that it is impossible to conduct the Government business properly there. If the Senator will permit me, I will state that the same amount of money will be spent to remodel the old building. The money has been appropriated to remodel it, and the only question is whether Congress shall authorize the construction of a new building instead of remodeling the old one. If Congress does not give authority, they will go on and remodel the old one.

Mr. VARDAMAN. With the suggestion of the department that there ought to be a new building erected they would hardly go ahead and remodel the old one.

Mr. SWANSON. They are directed by Congress to do so, and they will be disposed to do it unless authority is given to change the plan.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, I am opposed to appropriating any more money or levying any more taxes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Mississippi objects to the consideration of the bill, and it goes to the calendar.

BENJAMIN A. SANDERS.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 12198) for the relief of Benjamin A. Sanders.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Benjamin A. Sanders, the sum of $1,000, in full compensation for injuries received by him on December 26, 1912, while in the performance of his duties as an employee of the United States Government, being principal of the Uintah Indian boarding school, Whiterocks, Utah, by a flying piece of a broken emery wheel used as a part of the equipment of said school.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

RECESS.

Mr. KERN. I move that the Senate take a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow forenoon.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m. Thursday, October 8, 1914) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Friday, October 9, 1914, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the correction will be made in the RECORD and Journal.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, the Journal has just been approved by a vote of the House.

The SPEAKER. It can be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. MANN. Can it be without reconsidering the vote by which it was approved?

The SPEAKER. You can do anything by unanimous consent.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, in order that the gentleman may have an opportunity to have this correction made, I move to reconsider the vote by which the Journal was approved.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky moves to reconsider the vote by which the Journal was approved.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Washington? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for five minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, the gentleman knows a large number of the Members of the House desire to address the House on various subjects. There is no opportunity to do that, and I am not willing that one gentleman shall have that privilege to the exclusion of others, and I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects, and that is the end of it.

ANTITRUST LEGISLATION.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. FLOYD] is recognized for 40 minutes.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Mr. Speaker, as one of the conferees on the part of the House, I desire to explain this conference report, the changes made therein, and the reasons leading up to those changes, and incidentally to answer some of the criticisms that have been spread broadcast over the country with regard to the action of the conferees and in regard to the report. I desire to read one of those criticisms, which was published in the Washington Post the morning after the conference report was approved by the Senate—a news item in that paper—and I read it because it is but a reflection of criticisms that have been sent broadcast all over the country. It is as follows:

REWRITE ITS DEFINITIONS.

As the bill passed the Senate it fairly bristled with penalties. The conference report, with rare exceptions, changed provisions for fines and jail sentences to declarations that the acts described "shall be unlawful." Besides taking the "teeth" from the measure in this direct manner, the conferees rewrote most of the definitions of illegal acts, broadening them and adding exceptions to such extent that the former precise and definitive sections have become diffuse and susceptible of interpretation only by a court.

Now, in view of that criticism of the action of the conferees, in justice to the conferees I think it but fair to state the facts as to the condition of the bill as it came from the Senate and reached the conferees. In conference only one criminal penalty was eliminated, and that was in section 2, which was inserted by the Senate. The section went out in conference and the penalty with it. That section related to patented articles only. It corresponded and was substituted for section 4 in the House bill after that section had been stricken out by the Senate. We insisted upon the restoration of section 4 of the House bill, which applied not only to patented but unpatented articles, and that section finally was restored as section 3 in the conference report, but without a penalty. The bill as it passed the House contained six sections that provided criminal penalties, namely, sections 2, 3, 4, 8, 9, and 12, the last section being commonly referred to as the personal-guilt clause of our bill. Sections 2, 3, and 4 of the House bill were stricken out entirely in the Senate, and by reference to section 9 of the House bill it will be seen that the paragraph relating to interlocking directorates of banks was stricken out by the Senate. In that condition the bill went to conference. The work of the conferees was therefore not a work of elimination, but a work of restoration. As conferees on the part of the House we insisted upon the restoration of those provisions which were contained in the bill when it passed the House, and finally, after more than two weeks in conference, it was agreed that sections 2, 4, and 9 of our bill should each be restored and the acts therein condemned should be declared unlawful, omitting the criminal penalties. Section 12 of the House bill, the personal-guilt provision of the bill, has not been disturbed. The penal provisions in new sections added by the Senate have not been disturbed, except in the one instance mentioned.

The bill as it comes to you to-day for consideration contains the substantive provisions of every section of the bill as it passed the House, with the exception of section 3, which was stricken out entirely; and it contains every substantive provision that was added by the Senate, with the exception of sections 25 and 26, which were stricken out in conference, and section 2, already referred to, which was also stricken out. So the bill as reported by the conferees embodies the comprehensive work of both the House and the Senate almost in its entirety. Yet certain gentlemen and certain interests in this country that for a year have been loudly protesting against the provisions in the bill as too drastic when certain criminal penalties have been stricken from it now seek to defeat the legislation by the clamor that the teeth have all been taken out of the bill.

Now, let us see whether they have or not. The bill is before you. Is it a small thing to say that an act or contract is unlawful, that an act or contract relating to business transactions is unlawful? Is that a small thing to say? The great body of laws which govern business affairs in this country are civil and not criminal laws. The rights of individuals in their most sacred relations in society and their property rights are protected and maintained by civil statutes. Is there no virtue in civil remedies in this Republic? Keep in mind that we have not disturbed the text of the Sherman law. We have not disturbed the penal provisions in the existing antitrust laws, including the Sherman law. We have, on the contrary, supplemented the penal provisions of the Sherman law and of other existing antitrust laws. Section 12 of the House bill, now section 14 of this bill, makes guilt personal—and it was retained by the Senate, retained by the conferees, and is in the bill reported by the conferees in the exact wording in which it passed the House.

Mr. BATHRICK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. I decline to yield just at this time. I will be glad to yield later.

Mr. BATHRICK. Just a short question.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Ask it.

Mr. BATHRICK. Section 14 is the personal-guilt section?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. I will state to the gentleman I expect to discuss that section when I reach that point of my argument.

Mr. BATHRICK. Does that provide a penalty for section 2, the tying-contract section?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Not within itself; but I will explain that later.

So we did not disturb the Sherman law in its efficacy as a criminal statute; we did not disturb the penalties prescribed in the Sherman law. There are certain other criminal penalties in this bill that were not disturbed by the conferees.

And since the gentleman has asked me that question, I desire to take up now briefly that part of the report covering sections 2, 3, and 7. The first relates to discriminatory contracts, the second relates to tying or exclusive contracts, and the third to holding companies. It will be observed that these sections deal with contractual relations in commercial dealings. After the penalties were stricken out, the provisions of sections 2 and 3 were modified, because as criminal sections they were drafted with all the particularity of criminal statutes, the intent and purpose being included. But that is not the rule applicable to contracts. So when we decided that the acts forbidden, instead of being made penal and criminal, should be simply condemned as unlawful, a modification was made in harmony with principles governing the construction and interpretation of contracts.

We have been criticized for injecting or inserting certain words into sections 2 and 3 in conference. Where did those mysterious words "substantially lessen competition or tend to create a monopoly" originate? They were incorporated in section 8, the holding-company provision of the bill, as it passed this House. They passed muster in the Senate of the United States and were retained in the holding-company provision as it passed the Senate and were retained in conference. In modifying and changing sections 2 and 3, so as to make the acts prohibited therein unlawful, without making them penal, it became necessary to change the wording of each, in other respects. We took the language that had been already approved by both the House and the Senate in another section, the one relating to holding companies, and applied it to sections 2 and 3, the latter corresponding to our section 4, so that the three sections, namely, sections 2, 3, and 7 of the conference report, are in harmony now, all dealing with the question of contracts, the same principle being applied to each one of them.

The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD] criticizes this language and criticizes these provisions, claiming that we are in some way interfering with the operations of the Sherman antitrust law; at least he fears we are. Not at all. That language did not originate with our committee. That language originated from a discussion in the opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of the Addyston Pipe & Steel Co. against United States. The court, in discussing this very question of contracts, uses this language. I quote:

> But it has never been, and in our opinion ought not to be, held that the word included the right of an individual to enter into private contracts upon all subjects, no matter what their nature and wholly irrespective, among other things, of the fact that they would, if performed, result in the regulation of interstate commerce and in the violation of an act of Congress upon that subject. The provision in the Constitution does not, as we believe, exclude Congress from legislating with regard to contracts of the above nature while in the exercise of its constitutional right to regulate commerce among the States. On the contrary, we think the provision regarding the liberty of the citizen is, to some extent, limited by the commerce clause of the Constitution, and that the power of Congress to regulate interstate commerce comprises the right to enact a law prohibiting the citizen from entering into these private contracts which directly and substantially, and not merely indirectly, remotely, incidentally, and collaterally, regulate to a greater or less degree commerce among the States.

Here is the origin of the application of that word "substantially" in the several sections referred to. And yet some criticisms have been published in the press to the effect that some sinister influence was brought to bear upon the conferees after the bill was sent to conference in order to induce the conferees to write those words into those sections after the penalties originally provided had been stricken out. Why the necessity of restoring these sections without penalties? In justice to the Senate of the United States let it be said that after section 5 of the Trade Commission bill had passed that body and had been approved by the House, condemning as unlawful all unfair methods of competition, the theory of the Senators was that these unfair methods would be included and cared for under the provisions of the Trade Commission bill. But that was not the view of your managers on the part of the House. Your conferees believed that in dealing with these contractual relations, the Supreme Court having held that Congress has the power to declare null and void any contract that substantially interfered with interstate commerce, but that the courts have no such power in the absence of an act of Congress condemning them, such contracts would be upheld in the future, not only by the commission but by the courts, until the legislative power of this Government declared them to be unlawful. We insisted that those three provisions be placed back in the bill, and finally they were placed back in the bill without the penalties. In answer to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BATHRICK] I will say for the things condemned in these sections, namely, the making of discriminatory contracts, the making of tying or exclusive contracts, and the making of contracts for unlawful acquisition of stock under section 7 no criminal penalty attaches, because those are not penal provisions of the antitrust laws; but they are still provisions of the antitrust laws, and every civil remedy that is applicable to any antitrust law may be invoked for their enforcement.

Now, I desire to consider each of those provisions in detail. Is there no power, no injury, no force in declaring a contract unlawful? Let us see what condition the trusts will find themselves in if this provision is enacted into law. A combination makes a contract in violation of any of these provisions. The effect of the contract is to substantially lessen competition or tends to create a monopoly. What is it worth? The maker of that contract can not enforce it in any court of law or equity. Is not that a strong and efficient remedy when the injured party is seeking his rights against the offending corporation? Is it not a stronger reason why one should refuse to enter into such a contract than a mere criminal penalty? In my State we have a statute against gambling. As an officer of the State I have prosecuted many persons for acts of gambling. But we have another statute that declares that all gambling contracts are unlawful, and the man can not be found in Arkansas who is fool enough to make a gambling contract. Why? Because he gains no right under it. The contract is worthless. He can assert no rights under it, and he can protect no rights under it.

Is declaring that a contract made under it is unlawful and taking away from the holder any right to enforce it either in law or equity taking the "teeth" out of the provision?

Mr. OGLESBY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. For a brief question, yes. My time is limited.

Mr. OGLESBY. Section 2, as it passed the Senate, prohibited tying clauses?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Yes, sir.

Mr. OGLESBY. The amendment substituted in conference says that such clauses shall be "unlawful where the effect of such lease, contract, or sale, or such condition, agreement, or understanding may be to substantially lessen competition or tend to create a monopoly in any line of commerce." That requires proof that all those conditions exist before there is any case.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Certainly; it requires proof by a preponderance of the evidence; but under the penal provision which was in the bill as originally drawn you would be required to prove each allegation with much more particularity and would be required to establish guilt beyond a reasonable doubt, and when you succeeded in convicting the guilty party the conviction would afford no relief to the injured party.

Mr. OGLESBY. But is not the clause put in by the Senate, which has been stricken out, much stronger and more direct in its operation, even without the penalty?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. We did not so view it, for the reason that it was unfair. It was restricted to patented commodities. As we passed the bill through the House we intended to put the person dealing in patented commodities on the same plane and to treat him in the same way as the person dealing in unpatented commodities. The provision referred to is a copy of part of the English patent law, and it ought to be dealt with by the Committee on Patents, and not in a trust bill. Our duty was to restore, if we could, the provision of the House bill, and we succeeded in restoring it minus the penalty.

Now, that is the first point. The provision makes the contract void. Is that no advantage to the competitor, to the independent operator, to the man who has been oppressed and is being oppressed by these corporations? Why, since this conference report was submitted to the conferees a gentleman appeared in the Judiciary Committee room to protest against this provision, and he laid down a bundle of contracts, all containing this tying clause, this exclusive clause, and he protested against the restoration of the provision. He was asked if he enforced that exclusive or tying clause, and he said yes; that he had maintained in court 42 suits against customers for violating that condition in his contracts. If you pass this bill, he will never maintain another such suit, because such contracts will be void.

The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD] holds that there is no necessity for this legislation, because he contends that all these acts, practices, and contracts herein forbidden are under the purview of the Sherman law now. But I read from One hundred and twenty-fifth Federal Reporter the syllabus of the decision rendered in Whitwell against Continental Tobacco Co. et al., being the utterance of Mr. Justice Sanborn, of the circuit court of appeals:

> Held, The restriction of their own trade by the defendants to those purchasers who declined to deal in the goods of their competitors was not violative of the antitrust act.

Yet the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD] contends that there is no necessity for this legislation because it is already contained in the Sherman law. It has never been held to be in the Sherman law. That kind of a contract is not condemned by the Sherman law unless it amounts to a restraint of trade. It is covered by the Sherman law if it amounts to a restraint of trade; but we seek to go further than that. These acts are made unlawful wherever the effect may be to substantially lessen competition or may tend to create a monopoly in any line of commerce.

If they in fact restrain trade, if they do in fact create monopoly, the contract is under the condemnation of the Sherman law now; but if it simply tends to a restraint of trade, if it merely may restrain trade but has not yet accomplished that result, it is not under the condemnation of the Sherman law at present, and we seek by this provision to make it so, and the same is equally true as to the other provisions referred to.

The penalties went out of these three sections; but, as a conferee of the House, permit me to say that when the bill reached conference the sections themselves were out, with the exception of section 8 of House bill, now section 7 of this bill.

Section 9 of the bill as it passed the House related to interlocking directorates of three classes—railroads, banks, and other industrial corporations. In the Senate our provision relating to interlocking directorates of railroads was stricken out and a substitute added therefor, which is section 10 in the present bill and which we have accepted. Our provision in regard to interlocking directorates of industrial corporations was retained in the bill by the Senate without the penalty. Our provision relating to the interlocking directorates of banks was stricken out, and every line in the bill relating to banks was eliminated by the Senate committee and by the Senate. The House having expended more than $50,000 in the Pujo investigation, looking into this very question, we felt it our duty to stand for the restoration of that provision, believing such prohibition vital to the interests of the American people; and finally, after long controversy, the Senate conferees yielded, and the provision went back into the bill, making it unlawful for interlocking directorates to exist in banks whose deposits, capital, surplus, and undivided profits aggregate more than $5,000,000 and in cities whose population exceeds 200,000, and omitting the criminal penalties. Those are the facts in regard to this bill.

Mr. GOOD. Will the gentleman yield for a question there?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Certainly.

Mr. GOOD. When that clause of the currency bill was before the House, as I recall the facts, we were told that no provision would be placed in the bill with regard to interlocking directorates, because that would be taken care of, as far as the banks were concerned, in another bill. It seems to me that was the understanding on behalf of all the Members of the House.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. In answer to the gentleman, not to take too much time on that question, I will say that was my understanding, and I think that was the understanding of the Members of the House. In a resolution adopted in our caucus the whole subject of interlocking directorates was referred to the Judiciary Committee, and we prepared those provisions in reference to interlocking directorates. We did not apply them to all banks, but to banks of a certain class, and the exceptions as to classes were made after a full hearing.

Now, first we condemn the act of the man who acts in this dual capacity as unlawful. Do you suppose any banker or high financier would serve as a director upon two boards when his service as such would be unlawful and would render him personally responsible for every act that he committed? Not at all.

Now let us consider the further remedy. There is nothing in these sections in favor of the corporation whose contracts are declared void, nothing in favor of any corporation violating the provisions of sections 2, 3, and 7 of this act, when you declare that every contract made involving the things herein prohibited is unlawful. When you do that you strip them of the greatest power that men ever enjoyed in a free country—the right and the privilege of going into the courts of their country and having the strong arm of the law enforce their contracts and their obligations. Is there no penalty in a statute that takes away such right? Which is the most severe, to forfeit a man's contract or to fine him when you can convict him? I did not object to these criminal penalties. They went out over my protest. But I have no sympathy with the idea that because the criminal penalties are omitted there is no virtue in the statute.

Under section 4 of the bill reported by the conferees any person injured in his business or property by anything declared to be unlawful in any antitrust law or by this act is entitled to go into any district court without regard to the amount in controversy and recover threefold damages. Is there any leniency in that? That is a reenactment of section 7 of the Sherman antitrust law. He is entitled to go into court and recover threefold damages. The contract by which he has been damaged is unlawful and the defendant can not protect himself under it. That is certainly an efficient remedy to the injured party.

That is not all. Under section 5 of the bill any private litigant injured by the unlawful acts of any corporation where the Government of the United States has proceeded against such corporation and obtained a judgment, either in a court of law or equity, is allowed the use of that judgment or decree to show the unlawful acts of the combination to the full extent that it would be an estoppel between the Government and the original offender. That is a new remedy never given to litigants before. The only difference between this and the House provision is that in this the judgment is made prima facie evidence while the House provision made it conclusive. The House provision applied only to suits hereafter brought, and the Senate provision makes it applicable to judgments, both criminal and civil, and gives it application to suits now pending in the courts in certain cases. The House conferees accepted the provision. That is a new remedy and a most efficient remedy. The Government of the United States, acting in behalf of all of its citizens, prosecutes a trust, convicts it either in a criminal court or a civil court, and the private litigant, injured by the unlawful acts of such trust, has nothing to do in order to recover the threefold damages except to prove the amount of damages and that the injury was done by this trust or corporation. It shifts the burden of proof and gives the litigant a great advantage.

But that is not all. In section 16, on page 20, is a provision that gives the litigant injured in his business an entirely new remedy, one that he never enjoyed before. Heretofore there has been only one power that might enjoin an unlawful trust or monopoly in restraint of trade, and that was the Government of the United States, under the direction of the Attorney General.

This provision in section 16 gives any individual, company, or corporation, damaged in its property or business by the unlawful operation or actions of any corporation or combination the right to go into court and enjoin the doing of these unlawful acts, instead of having to wait until the act is done and the business destroyed and then sue for damages. That clause in the provision of this bill makes it specifically applicable to sections 2, 3, 4, 7, and 8 of the bill; so that if a man is injured by a discriminatory contract, by a tying contract, by the unlawful acquisition of stock of competing corporations, or by reason of some one acting unlawfully as a director in two banks or other corporations, he can go into any court and enjoin and restrain the party from committing such unlawful acts or sue for his damages, without regard to the amount in controversy, and recover threefold damages. Teeth all taken out of the bill! We have taken, by these provisions, the business public into our confidence as allies of the Government in enforcing the antitrust laws, and given to the business men of the country who are being imposed upon by unlawful combinations remedies by which they can recover their own damages [applause] without waiting upon the slow and tortuous course of prosecution on the part of the Government.

But that is not all. There are several other remedies provided in this bill. Under section 11 the violation of sections 2, 3, 7, and 8 may be enforced, respectively, by the Trade Commission, by the Interstate Commerce Commission, or by the Federal Reserve Board. The manner in which the enforcement may be made by any party complaining or by the commission or board taking the initiative is fully detailed in the bill. The party injured can make his complaint to the proper tribunal, and the proper administrative board or commission provided for by Congress can investigate and make an order for the party to desist, and if he refuses to obey the order, the party complaining can go into court and have the Federal court issue an order for him to desist, and for the violation of that order the offender may be punished for contempt.

This remedy is not exclusive; it is cumulative. It is supplementary to other remedies granted, and it does not exclude the remedies that exist under the Sherman law, because under the provisions of the bill that is carefully guarded. It is an additional remedy; it is not an exclusive remedy, and it takes no remedy away from any person.

Mr. COOPER. Will the gentleman permit an interruption? He has reached one of the most important points in this discussion, and I would like to ask him a question.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. I will yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. COOPER. The title of this act is "An act to supplement existing laws against unlawful restraint and monopolies, and for other purposes." If I understand the gentleman, it is his contention, in supporting this conference report, that the criminal clauses of the Sherman law are still in force and that this act simply supplements them?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Certainly; that is correct.

Mr. COOPER. And that those criminal clauses are not repealed?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. They are not repealed in any sense, and I thank the gentleman for asking the question.

In section 11, as agreed to by the conferees, on page 18 of the comparative print, the following language is found:

> No order of the commission or board or the judgment of the court to enforce the same shall in any wise relieve or absolve any person from any liability under the antitrust acts.

And the "antitrust acts" include the Sherman antitrust law, and include the other acts specified in the first section of this bill, and include everything in this act. Who can contend in the face of that declaration, as the distinguished gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD] did last night, that these provisions amend or affect adversely in some way the Sherman law? This saving clause completely settles that controversy as to any and all of the antitrust acts. These sections 2, 3, 7, and 8 are parts of this act, and this act and every section in it are declared to be parts of the antitrust acts.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. BORLAND). The time of the gentleman from Arkansas has expired.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I yield the gentleman 10 minutes more.

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Mr. Speaker, I hope the gentleman from Oklahoma will withdraw his point of order for the present. I have only 10 minutes remaining.

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. Very well; I withdraw the point of order for the present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Arkansas is recognized for 10 minutes more.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Mr. Speaker, that is not all. It is contended, in effect, by the critics of this bill that as it finally comes from the conferees all of the criminal penalties were eliminated. That is not true. The Senate added a very important provision to cover a defect in the law developed in a celebrated investigation recently had of one of the great railroad corporations, where the officers and directors had misapplied certain funds. The Senate incorporated a provision making it unlawful for interstate railroad officers or agents to misapply or embezzle funds of the corporation, and a heavy penalty was imposed—not less than $500 and confinement in the penitentiary for not less than 1 year and not more than 10 years. That is in the bill.

It was not disturbed by your conferees. The House conferees accepted the provision without amendment.

Section 14 is a new section substituted by the Senate in lieu of our section relating to interlocking directorates of railroad companies. It contains certain provisions which your conferees believe in some respects were more effective than the House provision, and so we accepted the Senate provision, which deals with the prohibitions against railroads that have interlocking directorates, and a penal clause was attached thereto, undisturbed by the conferees, and is now in the bill. Let us see what that is. For the corporation itself a fine not exceeding $25,000 is imposed, and a fine of $5,000 and imprisonment for not exceeding one year, or both, is imposed against the individual officer or agent of the corporation that violates that provision of the law. Yet they say the teeth were all taken out of the bill by the conferees. But that it not all. The original personal-guilt clause of the House bill was embodied in section 12. It was adopted and was restored in committee, and it is now found in section 14 of the bill. It is in the exact words in which the provision passed this House. It will be remembered there was considerable controversy and debate over it, and I believe the final draft of the amendment adopted was made by the distinguished gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT]. The House adopted it, after a debate of several hours, with apparent satisfaction. The Senate amended it. The conferees insisted upon its restoration to the form in which it passed the House, and the Senate conferees yielded, and the personal-guilt clause of the original bill is in this bill and applies to all of the penal sections of the antitrust laws.

The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD] says that it may repeal the Sherman law. It is the exact penalty provided for in the Sherman law, but it goes further than the courts have ever gone in convicting officers, directors, or agents for violation of the Sherman law. It provides that whenever a corporation shall be guilty of violating the penal provisions of the antitrust laws, the offense shall be deemed also the offense of the individual directors, officers, or agents of the corporation who have directed, ordered, or done, in whole or in part, any of the things that constitute a part of that violation. Is not that broader than the original law? In other words, under the Sherman law as it is now written you can convict an officer for violation of its provisions, but his acts must constitute the whole offense, or he must be a conspirator, and come within the rules of law governing conspiracies, but under this provision if he does any of the acts which constitute in whole or in part that violation, then he may be convicted as an individual.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Yes; for a brief question.

Mr. RUCKER. The fine of $25,000 may be assessed against the corporation defendant, and then the personal fine may be assessed against and also the imprisonment imposed upon the individual acting for the corporation?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Yes.

Mr. RUCKER. By a separate prosecution?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Yes.

Mr. RUCKER. Does the statute make conviction of the corporation prima facie evidence of guilt of the officer?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. I do not think it would in a criminal proceeding, and I do not think it should. I would not be in favor of having it do so. I think that any man charged with a crime, especially if the guilt of another is imputed to him, ought to have the right to go into court and have a trial of his own.

That is not all. There is great opposition to this legislation, but the remaining sections of this bill that I desire to mention and that I have not yet mentioned are the labor sections of the bill. I desire to communicate to the House of Representatives what I conceive to be the true situation in regard to the bill. The enemies of this bill, those who are fighting it, are not fighting it on account of what has been left out of the bill, but they are fighting it on account of what has been left in the bill, notably the labor sections of the bill. [Applause.] It is charged that the Democrats of the House, the conferees, and all connected with this legislation, are violating the pledges of the Democratic platform. The men who make that charge forget that labor and great labor organizations of this country have been knocking at the doors of Congress for 25 years, appealing for just legislation in behalf of labor. Here we have it satisfactory to labor, but the enemies and the opponents of the proposed legislation rarely say anything about that.

My distinguished friend from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD] criticized an amendment inserted by the Senate to the effect that the labor of a human being should not be considered a commodity or article of commerce. The Senate put that provision in, and the friends of labor in the House had no disposition to take it out, and it is there. But is labor a commodity or an article of commerce? Is the labor of a human being a commodity or an article of commerce? Has it been a commodity or an article of commerce since more than 50 years ago, when the greatest struggle that ever took place in this country shook the foundations of our country by a cruel four years' war? The shackles were then struck from 4,000,000 slaves in the South. And when since then has labor ever been a commodity or an article of commerce, except as the great corporations, North, South, East, and West, have sought by court proceedings and injunctions to put upon the laboring class of this country a species of constructive slavery almost as galling as was the chattel slavery of the South? [Applause.]

In view of this analysis of the provisions of this bill, the contention that the bill has been emasculated or that the teeth have been taken out of it is wholly unwarranted and utterly untenable. Here are the teeth that remain in the bill, and a full set of them:

First. Contracts discriminating in price between customers, where the effect of such discrimination may be to substantially lessen competition or tends to create a monopoly, are declared unlawful and are therefore null and void.

Second. Tying or exclusive contracts, where the effect of such contracts or any conditions therein may be to substantially lessen competition or tends to create a monopoly, are declared to be unlawful and are therefore null and void.

Third. Contracts for the acquisition of stocks of competing corporations engaged in commerce, where the effect of the acquisition of such stocks or the voting thereof may be to substantially lessen competition or to restrain trade or tends to create a monopoly, are declared unlawful and are therefore null and void.

Fourth. Section 4 provides that any person injured in his business or property by the unlawful acts of any combination or corporation may sue in any United States court without regard to the amount in controversy, and recover threefold damages for any loss or damage sustained.

Fifth. Section 5 provides that the final judgment or decree rendered in any criminal prosecution or suit in equity may be offered in evidence by any private litigant in suit against a corporation, and that the same shall be prima facia evidence against such defendant as to all matters respecting which such judgment or decree would be an estoppel as between the original parties thereto.

Sixth. The same section provides that whenever any suit or proceeding in equity or criminal prosecution is instituted by the United States to prevent or punish a violation of any of the antitrust laws, the running of the statute of limitations in respect of each and every private right of action under said laws shall be suspended during the pendency thereof.

Seventh. Section 16 provides that any person, firm, corporation, or association shall be entitled to sue for and have injunctive relief in any court of the United States having jurisdiction over the parties against threatened loss or damage by violation of the antitrust laws, including sections 2, 3, 7, and 8 of this act. This is a new remedy given to private litigants in this bill which they are not entitled to under the Sherman Act or other existing antitrust laws.

Eighth. Under section 11 of the bill any person injured in his business or property by any unlawful act forbidden in sections 2 and 3 of this act may complain to the Trade Commission for an order requiring the person violating any of the provisions of the preceding sections to desist therefrom; and upon refusal to so desist the order of the Trade Commission may be enforced in any district court of the United States having jurisdiction over the parties.

Ninth. Under the same section any person injured in his business or property by any unlawful act forbidden in section 7 of this act may complain to the Interstate Commerce Commission for an order requiring the person violating any of the provisions of that section to desist therefrom; and upon refusal to so desist the order of the Interstate Commerce Commission may be enforced in any district court of the United States having jurisdiction over the parties.

Tenth. Under this section any person injured in his business or property by any unlawful act forbidden in section 8 of this act may complain to the Federal Reserve Board for an order requiring the person violating any of the provisions of that section to desist therefrom; and upon refusal to so desist the order of the board may be enforced in any district court of the United States having jurisdiction over the parties.

Eleventh. Under section 15 of the act any person injured in his business or property by the violation of any of the provisions of this act may apply to the Attorney General of the United States, and the Attorney General or any district attorney, under the authority of the Attorney General, may institute proceedings in equity to prevent and restrain such violations.

Twelfth. Section 10 of this act forbids common carriers which have common directorates from having dealings, except as therein specified, in securities, supplies, or other articles of commerce, nor shall they make or have any contracts for construction or maintenance of any kind except by competitive bidding. Any common carrier violating the provisions of this section is subject to a fine not exceeding $25,000.

Thirteenth. The same section provides that any director, agent, manager, or officer of such corporation who shall violate any of the provisions of said section shall be subject to a fine not exceeding $5,000, or confined in jail for one year, or both, in the discretion of the court.

Fourteenth. Section 14 of this bill is intended to make guilt personal, and provides that whenever a corporation shall violate any of the penal provisions of the antitrust laws such violation shall be deemed to be also that of the individual directors, officers, or agents of such corporation who shall have authorized, ordered, or done any of the acts constituting in whole or in part such violation, and such violation shall be deemed a misdemeanor, and upon conviction therefor of any such director, officer, or agent he shall be punished by a fine of not exceeding $5,000, or imprisonment for not exceeding one year, or by both, in the discretion of the court.

Fifteenth. Section 9 makes it a felony for a president, director, officer, or manager of any firm, corporation, or association engaged in commerce as a common carrier, to embezzle, steal, abstract, or willfully misapply or willfully permit to be misapplied, any of the money, funds, credits, securities, property, or assets of such firm, association, or corporation, arising or accruing from, or used in such commerce, in whole or in part, or who willfully and knowingly converts the same to his own use or the use of another. The penalty for the violation of this section is a fine of not less than $500 and confinement in the penitentiary for not less than 1 year nor more than 10 years, or by both, in the discretion of the court.

Sixteenth. Section 12 provides that any suit, action, or proceeding under the antitrust laws against a corporation may be brought not only in the judicial district whereof it is an inhabitant, but also in any judicial district wherein it may be found and transacts business; and that all process in such cases may be served in the district of which it is an inhabitant, or wherever it may be found.

The provisions of the bill relating to labor greatly restrict the power heretofore exercised by big corporations and combinations over laboring men and labor organizations, often resulting in oppression to the membership of such organizations by the improper use of injunctions, and here are some of the teeth in the labor sections of the bill:

Seventeenth. The bill prohibits a corporation from obtaining and the court from issuing injunctions to prohibit any person from terminating any relation of employment.

Eighteenth. Or from ceasing to perform work or labor.

Nineteenth. Or from recommending, advising, or persuading others by peaceful means so to do.

Twentieth. Or from attending any place where any such person or persons may lawfully be for the purpose of peacefully obtaining or communicating information or from peacefully persuading any person to work or to abstain from work.

Twenty-first. Or from ceasing to patronize or to employ anybody who is a party to such dispute, or from recommending, advising, or persuading others by peaceful means so to do.

Twenty-second. Or from paying or giving to or withholding from any person engaged in such dispute any strike benefits or other moneys or things of value.

Twenty-third. Or from peacefully assembling in a lawful manner and for lawful purposes.

Twenty-fourth. Or from doing any act or thing which might lawfully be done in the absence of such dispute by any party thereto.

Twenty-fifth. Nor shall any acts specified in this paragraph be considered or held to be violations of any laws of the United States.

Twenty-sixth. Section 22 provides in cases of contempt in Federal courts that if the offense with which the accused is charged constitutes a criminal offense under the laws of the United States or under the laws of any State in which the act was committed the party accused shall be entitled to a trial by jury.

I must now conclude. I thank you.

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. To make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Oklahoma makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and twenty-two gentlemen are present—not a quorum.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, may I ask for tellers on that count?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will ask for a rising vote on tellers. Tellers are demanded by the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask what tellers are called on?

The SPEAKER pro tempore (after counting). Evidently a sufficient number. The question is whether the count of the Chair shall be verified by tellers. The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMPSON] and the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] will take their places as tellers.

The question was taken, and the tellers reported 154 Members present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. One hundred and fifty-four Members are present—not a quorum.

NORWEGIAN SHIP "INGRID" (H. DOC. NO. 1172).

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith a report from the Secretary of State in relation to a claim presented by the Government of Norway against this Government on account of the action of the authorities of Hudson County, N. J., in holding for their appearance as witnesses in a criminal case in that county, in violation of treaty provisions between the United States and Norway, as the Norwegian Government alleges, three members of the crew of a Norwegian ship called the Ingrid, and I recommend that as an act of grace, and without reference to the question of the liability of the United States, an appropriation be made to effect a settlement of this claim in accordance with the recommendation of the Secretary of State.

WOODROW WILSON.

THE WHITE HOUSE, October 7, 1914.

The SPEAKER. The message and accompanying documents are ordered printed and referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

ANTITRUST LEGISLATION.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. NELSON].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. NELSON] is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. Speaker, the genial gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB], the distinguished chairman of our committee, tried to have some fun at our expense as he closed his speech—an excellent one, by the way, from his point of view. To illustrate our opposition to this bill, he told his Nancy candle story. As he was speaking it occurred to me there was another story that better illustrated the position of this side of the House. I was thinking of the college yarn with which he is familiar—the trick the boys tried to play upon the professor of entomology. They gathered together various specimens of bugs and bees, took the legs of one and the wings of another, likewise the eyes and various other parts of different species, and put these together so as to form an artificial but somewhat artistic specimen. Then they took it to the professor, who, by the way, was nearsighted, and asked him to tell them what bug that was. He put it under the microscope, examined it with great care, and then he said, "Boys, that is a humbug." [Applause on the Republican side.] Just so on this side of the House; we have examined this bill from many points of view. Some oppose it as an unjustifiable interference with business freedom, fearing its bad effect upon little business, medium business, and large business against which there is no just cause for complaint; and then there are those among us who oppose it because, looking to the final solution of the trust problem, we find that as an antitrust measure this bill is a makeshift, a sham, and a fake, and we agreed on the main proposition—that this bill is a humbug. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. WEBB. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. NELSON. I will.

Mr. WEBB. The gentleman understands, I suppose, that the chief difference between the bill as presented by the conferees and the bill as it passed the House is on striking out the four criminal penalties, sections 2 and 4 and the interlocking-directorate sections. The bill as it passed the House—my recollection is that a majority on the Republican side voted for it. Now I understand my friend is complaining that we have stricken out the criminal penalties in four sections, and because we have done that we have made it a humbug, notwithstanding the fact that we have filled the bill with civil remedies and thrown the doors of the courts wide open to the individual complainant who may be injured by any act denounced in sections 2 and 3 of this bill.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. Speaker, there are many things to say to that, but I do not wish to be diverted from my main line of talk. However, I will say that many Members of this House did not understand the bill. They had not time to look into it. It was a legal question; they assumed it was antitrust, and because of some features of the bill they voted for it. So did Senators. But did you notice on the roll call in the Senate that every Republican voted against it and six of your Democratic Senators registered their protest by voting against a caucus measure of this kind? The conference not only left out the penalties, but vitiated the legislation, in my judgment, in every detail.

Mr. WEBB. I think only three Democratic Senators voted against it.

Mr. NELSON. Six Senators voted against it on the motion to recommit, and four voted against it on roll call. I shall ask the courtesy of not being interrupted unless there is some personal question.

Mr. WEBB. I will not interrupt my friend again.

Mr. NELSON. I would be very glad to have my friend interrupt me if I had the time.

Now, seriously speaking, from my point of view, with reference to this Clayton bill as it emerges from conference in final form, expressing as it does the attitude of the party in power and the position of the President of the United States, for whom I have had a great deal of admiration and in the progressivism of whom I have also had a great deal of confidence, this measure is to me, and I believe will be to the country at large, a distinct and profound disappointment.

My point of view and my feeling in the matter may be understood if I may be pardoned a bit of autobiography. Twenty years ago, filled with the zeal, the enthusiasm, and the love of country common to American youth, I became the editor and part owner of a small newspaper published in my home city. About that time the late J. Pierpont Morgan had begun his extraordinary and successful efforts to form huge combinations throughout the country. I clipped news items from the great Chicago dailies, noting that he had formed now this trust and now that trust, and, using those items as texts, I proceeded as vigorously as I could to denounce Morgan's activities and to earnestly warn the people of this menacing trust evil. Somehow Morgan paid no attention to my youthful fulminations, nor did the people particularly sit up and take notice; but subsequently I was one of a half dozen young men in my home city that came together in the law office of a former Member of Congress, there formulated a platform, and pledged ourselves to begin a fight in State and Nation until every plank in that platform had been redeemed. If you wish to read the story of that struggle in detail, you will find it in Senator ROBERT M. LA FOLLETTE'S Autobiography. Suffice it to say that I fought with the others in Wisconsin for 10 or 12 years. Nine years I have served in this House, and I ask the confirmation of Republicans and Democrats who have served with me of this statement, that I have pursued the straight course. I have been a fairly good bloodhound on the trail of the monopoly "octopus." [Applause.] I became the secretary of so-called Republican Insurgents. Insurgency led me into many difficulties; it endangered my political life, it brought about dissensions in my own party. We had to cut through the underbrush, the arbitrary rules of the House, and we had to level what we thought was the autocracy of the Speaker in order to get at what this bill purports to be—legislation against special interest and monopoly.

Now, after 20 years—and I have studied this question all along—I happen to find myself on a committee of the House, the Judiciary, charged with the duty and invested with the power finally to fix up the antitrust law so that private monopoly shall be destroyed in this country. I tell you it was with anticipations of great pleasure that I looked forward to real work on this great committee. I conferred with my other colleagues in the early part of the session, and they were imbued with the same thought. They said, "We are going to take the Sherman law and put teeth in it; we are going to adjust and strengthen its machinery; we are going to make direct and personal its penalties; we are going to do something effective to put an end to private monopoly in this country." The Democrats had had not only a patriotic but also a political reason for doing something effective on the trust question. Their platform specifically pledged them to destroy monopoly in this country. It said:

> A private monopoly is indefensible and intolerable. We therefore favor the vigorous enforcement of the criminal as well as the civil law against trusts and trust officials, and demand the enactment of such additional legislation as may be necessary to make it impossible for a private monopoly to exist in the United States.

But what happened, my friends? Why, about the Christmas holidays I was astonished and shocked to read in the newspapers interviews that proceeded from the White House, from Vice President Marshall, from Chairman Clayton of our committee, and from other leaders, all to the same effect, "Do not be alarmed, big business; we are not going to do anything radical."

What followed? When we first met in the Judiciary Committee room the chairman, Mr. Clayton, announced that "in this committee room partisanship has never been permitted to enter, and would not." But after those interviews the attitude of the chairman and certain gentlemen on the committee surprised me. We have three subcommittees in the Committee on the Judiciary. Bills are referred to those automatically; but, mind you, on this great question, in which we are all so much interested, they went outside of the regular subcommittee and selected a partisan subcommittee, consisting of the chairman, the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. CARLIN], and the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. LLOYD]—a legislative monopoly, a political trust. And I could feel at once—and we have all felt it here—that partisan barrier that shuts us out when it comes to legislation of this kind. And they usually make all-important legislation partisan legislation. Now, then, what had happened? No doubt the candidate, Prof. Wilson, academically intended to live up to the platform at Baltimore; no doubt Democratic leaders intended to destroy monopoly. It was a surgical operation that they had promised to perform upon Uncle Sam—cut out the roots of the trust evil, eradicate private monopoly entirely; but Democratic Party leaders blundered as usual. The first thing they did when they got in here was to administer to Uncle Sam a dose of tariff for revenue only, which upset his nervous system. It made him sick. It always has done so. He quit business. What else did they do? They passed a banking and currency act, which radically rearranged and changed his whole circulating system. In time Uncle Sam may get himself adjusted to the change, but immediately it put him flat on his back.

I tell you if there was not a panic in the country there was among the Democratic leaders in the House. They had their little conference somewhere, perhaps in the White House, where they agreed upon a program, namely, that inasmuch as Uncle Sam was too sick now to permit the performance of a surgical operation upon him they arranged to prepare some poultices and some mustard plasters for mild external treatment, and this is the poultice-and-mustard-plaster bill. [Applause on the Republican side.]

At that time, being much interested in the question, I was writing a series of articles on the trust problem. I have been some 25 years in active public life, and I knew what was going on; and just as soon as I noticed this I wrote the following article, which was published in many newspapers. I read it as it appeared in La Follette's Magazine of January 17, 1914:

THE REAL TEST IS COMING.

[By Representative JOHN M. NELSON.]

The question uppermost in my mind just now is, What will be the program of President Wilson for the solution of the trust problem? Everything depends upon his courage, patriotism, and determination. Congress is at his command. His party, feeding at his hands, will do his bidding. In the words of the sporting world, "It is up to the President."

At the opening of the session he told us that the subject of importance would be the trust question. His promised special message on this subject is expected after the holiday recess.

In the meantime the Judiciary Committee met and decided to begin hearings at once; but then the ranking Democrats were called into a conference with the President. Since that party consultation we have merely marked time. Only two persons have been heard—one for only 20 minutes. Evidently there has been a change of program or in tactics.

The explanation may be found in three words—fear of panic. In the lobbies we hear it; in the newspapers we read it. Assurances have been given out by Vice President Marshall and others that business interests need not be alarmed. Congress is in a panic, if the country is not. There is much talk of going slow. It is proposed to pass a few bills, such as making the penalties of the Sherman law personal and abolishing interlocking directorates, so as to make a showing of reform but not seriously disturb Wall Street. These gentlemen are not so much looking to the ultimate welfare of the American people as they are interested in maintaining the present political equilibrium.

I have faith that the President will not change his program for the sake of political expediency. Though he may deem it necessary to change tactics, I have every hope that he will not compromise with the enemy.

The 800 or more trusts that now dominate the industries of the country have great power, which they will not hesitate to use to embarrass the President and Congress. By merely letting out a few hundred thousand workmen the trusts can bring about critical conditions. It is true that in this situation the easiest road is that of compromise—to pass some halfway measures, and then try to make the people believe that the country has been relieved from the thralldom of the trusts; but let us hope that this will not be the policy of the President. May Woodrow Wilson face his duty with the spirit of Abraham Lincoln!

The situation is now critical. The President is face to face with his Goliath. The real test of the administration is coming upon the trust issue. For self-preservation and to maintain the monopoly privilege of exacting tribute the trusts will put up a fight that will try men's souls. Everything depends, therefore, upon what the President will say after the holiday recess upon the big problem of our day and generation—the monopolized money power of America.

Now I want to call your attention to what the Literary Digest said about that time. I could cite multiplied instances of the same character of statements. The Literary Digest is an independent and nonpartisan paper. This is from its issue of January 31, 1914:

PRESIDENT WILSON'S TRUST PROGRAM.

The surprise of President Wilson's trust message was its cordial reception by the organs and spokesmen of "big business." Here was the stage set for the beginning of a great conflict, and the whole Nation breathless with expectation. In the trust issue the administration was about to meet its most searching test, the President was face to face with his Goliath, and the public very generally shared the belief of Representative JOHN M. NELSON that "the 800 or more trusts that now dominate the industries of the country * * * will put up a fight that will try men's souls." Yet when the message is delivered we find bankers, railroad presidents, captains of industry, and even the New York Sun joining in the chorus of approval that greets its program for the further correction and prevention of corporation abuses—a program, it has been pointed out, which goes even farther than the antitrust promises of the Democratic platform. And while big business praised stock values sprang to higher levels.

What is the meaning of this strange development? the editors are asking. Has the President surrendered to the trusts or have the trusts surrendered to the President?

We had a perfunctory public hearing. This political trust, composed of excellent lawyers, but intense partisans, prepared five or six so-called tentative bills. They were submitted to us. We had, as I say, a perfunctory hearing; small retail and wholesale men came here to complain against certain provisions. It was unfair and unjustifiable interference, they said, with business practices against which there was no cause of complaint; and one by one these provisions were dropped out until there was not much left; and then, on account of the agitation of labor, they saw an opportunity to pass this program, to put a sop into it, and they pretended to give labor something by inserting a fake exemption of labor from the operation of antitrust laws and providing for some uniformity of court procedure in contempt cases. But this was done only at the last moment, and because some of us kept at them all the time and threatened to make it a party issue if labor was not taken care of. I resent the imputation that we are opposed to this bill because we are opposed to labor. We are friendly to labor, but we are opposed to being baited to swallow a thing of this kind as an antitrust measure. It is highly significant, let me add, that during all of our protracted hearings, and afterwards, I saw not the least sign of opposition to the passage of this alleged antitrust program by any trust or monopoly in the country. Not one octopus so much as grunted at it. Why should they? They had the assurance from the Democratic leaders higher up.

Now, I want to discuss this bill. I do not approve of its purpose. It is entitled "A Federal antitrust bill." It is presented as a Federal antitrust bill. It will be used in the campaign as if its framers had settled the trust question. It is a misnomer. They have not gone after the trusts. The sponsors of this bill do not claim they have gone after the trusts. They have not scratched the back of a trust, and they have not twisted a single trust's tail. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. GORDON. Will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. MCGILLICUDDY). Does the gentleman from Wisconsin yield to the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. NELSON. I regret I can not yield now.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. NELSON. They have not gone after the trusts. They have done what a leading Democrat said in another body—I wish I could name him, but under the rules I am forbidden to mention him by name—"have gone after minnows when the sea is full of sharks." They have dodged the trust question, and have assumed to go after little business practices outside of the sweep of the prohibitions of the Sherman antitrust law. This Democrat, too, said that the title of the bill ought to be changed so as to conform to its real purpose. Instead of its being entitled "An act to supplement existing laws against unlawful restraints and monopolies, and for other purposes," he suggested "An act to apologize to existing restraints and monopolies." The title adds the words "and for other purposes." Now, what is its chief purpose? Not the destruction of trusts, but to bring about "the atmosphere," to use the President's frank and felicitous language, "of mutual accommodation and understanding" between his party and certain powerful special interests. The chief captain of industry, the son, heir, and successor of my ancient friend, the late John Pierpont Morgan, has been recently invited to the White House, and other captains of industry have been invited there. To confer about what? About this legislation? The proposed increase of freight rates of 5 per cent? The sidetracking of the railroad securities bill, or generally how to protect the dear people from the exactions of monopolies in Wall Street? [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, you have been a wronged man by your party. It was said of you when you were candidate for President—and I remember it well—that you were too genial; not firm enough; you might compromise on measures of this kind; and you might have certain affiliations with captains of industry and Wall Street; we would need some one with a jaw indicating uncompromising courage. Oh, they did not know you as we know you. I remember distinctly when the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] and myself were constituted a committee to go from the insurgents to see you—the minority leader of the House—to find out how you felt about a change in the rules. It was suggested that you might not want to give up prospective power. We told you frankly what we came for and what we feared. You said, "Gentlemen, I will sacrifice anything of the prospective power of the Speaker to give freedom to the House of Representatives." [Applause.] And CHAMP CLARK has said on this trust question. "If I had my way, I would fill the penitentiaries and jails of the United States so full of trust magnates that their arms and legs would stick out of the windows," and he would have kept his pledge. [Applause.] At least he would not in a short time have inspired and approved this sort of a bill as a solution of the trust problem. He would not have been conferring with J. Pierpont Morgan and these other captains of industry in the White House in two years on pending legislation.

Mr. Speaker, this bill is a confession. It is a public confession, in my judgment, first, that the purposes of the Democratic Party, solemnly declared in their platform pledges, are always subject to the exigencies of political expediency. It is proof that Democratic statesmanship does not rise to the needs of our day and generation. And, lastly, it is a public confession of lack of courage; I do not wish to say of party cowardice, but I shall quote language which I shall adopt, the expressive language spoken by a great Democrat in debate on this conference report in another body:

Oh, this is a great antitrust Congress! Compared with the Congress that put upon the statute books the Sherman Act, we appear as would a lot of wet nurses in comparison with soldiers on the field of battle, arms in hand. If we had the original Sherman Act before this Congress the "trust busters" of the present day and generation would shy like the country horse of 15 years ago did at the sight of an automobile.

[Applause on the Republican side.]

Again, speaking of the great Sherman law, he said:

Well, old John Sherman and the Republicans of that day did pass that law. Their "little fingers were bigger than our loins." Theirs was the spirit of the eagle, ours that of the barnyard fowl.

[Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. Speaker, as a conferee on the part of the minority, I can not agree to the conference report, and for the sole reason that I am heartily in favor of real antitrust legislation that shall make it impossible for private monopoly to exist in this country.

Having analyzed the many glaring defects of the Clayton bill as an antitrust measure, first in the minority views I filed from the Committee on the Judiciary and a speech I made upon the floor of this House, I do not now intend to discuss the conference report in detail, knowing that its adoption has been decreed by the powers that be as a part of a caucus program.

But, however futile it may be, when I think of the magnitude of the monopoly evil—800 trusts now before our very eyes exacting tribute from the American people in the form of high prices; when I think of the leaven of this evil in our industrial and political life, with who knows what disastrous effects; when I think of the solemn duty of the party in power, under its unequivocal platform pledges; when I think of its unequaled opportunity, its control of the Presidency and of Congress, to do something great and patriotic that will stand out as a monument to its membership in this Congress; and then when I think of this miserable makeshift, pretense, and sham, this so-called antitrust bill, my gorge rises and I can not resist the impulse to express my earnest, my indignant, even though it be a hopeless, protest.

Mr. Speaker, this is an impartial and well-balanced bill. Why, in this great issue of the people against the trusts the Democratic Party and its President have declared neutrality. They are impartial; they are on the fence. The bill is well balanced between the moral necessity, under a solemn party pledge, to do something to destroy monopoly in this country and the assumed political exigency that now exists of doing nothing or next to nothing. In every provision of the bill we find this balance structure. The people seem to get something in the first part of the section, and it is taken away from them in the latter part of the same section.

It was said of Agassiz, the great scientist, that he could take a single scale of a fish and at once tell you the name of the fish, because the whole was seen in its parts; others finding a tooth in some mountain cave can tell at once the name of the mammal in whose jaw the tooth had once been embedded. Now, I do not wish to trespass upon the time of others, and I have just time to take one tooth and analyze it to show you what it contains for the people and what for the trusts. There are only two of the original teeth remaining in this bill. One of them denounces discriminations in price. I will read it to you. It is fierce:

It shall be unlawful for any person engaged in commerce either directly or indirectly to discriminate in price between different purchasers of commodities.

That looks savage, does it not? But now listen. If it has any virtue at all so far as monoplies are concerned, it is in the Sherman law, and the logic that caused them to pull out these other teeth would also exclude this. It is already within the sweep of the Sherman law. The Senate saw that, and so cut it out as worthless. But if it is not in the Sherman law it is in section 5 of the Trade Commission bill. It is an unfair method of competition.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin 15 minutes more.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wisconsin is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. NELSON. It is an unfair method of competition. You can not get away from those propositions, and therefore it is under the jurisdiction of the Trade Commission. Therefore I say the people are not getting anything in this section not already in existing law.

Now let us see what the trusts are getting. They get all the rest. Anyone who has drafted legislation knows that an evil should be clearly defined and there should not be any exceptions. The Sherman law is an illustration of that, as is also the fifth section of the Trade Commission law. The prohibition of the law should sweep the field. When we make a lot of exceptions we acknowledge that we have not clearly defined the evil. Now listen to these 10 exceptions to that provision. You will find that the Democrats legalize here a practice which they have condemned on the part of Republicans every time a tariff bill has been discussed. The gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] knows how they have denounced the practice of selling products abroad cheaper than at home, and how wrong it was to discriminate against Americans; but here they legalize that practice. Every trust can sell its products cheaper abroad, and it is legalized in this bill. Oh, it was not in the beginning. They had no such exception at first, but pressure was brought, and they modified this provision, so that discrimination is only forbidden in this country, but trusts can sell abroad cheaper than they do to American citizens.

Now comes a provision that has been discussed in both Houses, a provision of far-reaching consequence. Price discrimination is forbidden—

Where "the effect may be to substantially lessen competition."

Now, try in your own mind to figure out the meaning of those words.

The word "substantially" is dangerous. We thought the word "unreasonable" was dangerous, but Chief Justice White, in the Tobacco case, went over that and showed that it was not intended to relieve trusts from the prohibition of the Sherman law, but simply to make the law workable, and we have no cause of complaint any more. But now they are injecting into all these provisions the word "substantially," and that is mighty dangerous, because these laws will be construed together. Now, the next phrase is:

Or tend to create a monopoly in any line of commerce.

Not in any locality, not in any State; but unless they can show that there is a tendency to monopoly throughout the whole Nation or throughout the world, nothing can be done. See the difficulty of proving your case under this provision. Try to distinguish between that and the language of the Sherman law. My distinguished friend from Arkansas [Mr. FLOYD], in reading the case to which he referred, cited language that the Supreme Court had used in defining the Sherman law, and this language is tantamount to a restraint of trade. If it is not, I should like to have some able lawyer distinguish it. It is beyond my ability.

Again, as if these loopholes were not sufficient, they can discriminate as to "grade, quality, or quantity" of the commodity sold. What is possible under these loopholes? Again, they may allow for difference in "the cost of selling or transportation" or discriminate in price in the same or different communities "in good faith to meet competition." I have received a pamphlet—and perhaps you have all seen copies of that pamphlet—signed by the Independent Petroleum Marketers' Association, W. C. Platt, secretary, and the National Petroleum Association, C. D. Chamberlain, secretary and general counsel. These complainants are the independents who have to contend with the Standard Oil Co. Now, take these innocent-looking loopholes. I shall print the whole of this pamphlet, and I now ask permission, Mr. Speaker, to extend my remarks by including this and other things.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

STANDARD OIL AND THE CONFERENCE REPORT ON THE CLAYTON BILL.

CLEVELAND, OHIO, October 5, 1914.

To the Congress:

If you want to legalize probably 75 per cent of the acts for which the Standard Oil Co. has been found guilty in many courts, then by all means vote for the conference report on H. R. 15657, better known as the Clayton antitrust bill.

If you want trusts and others to continue price discriminations without let or hindrance; if you want the Standard Oil Co. in the future to be invited by law to kill all its competitors by the simple expedient of cutting prices in their respective territories, then register a loud "aye" when your name is called on this conference report.

If you don't believe the foregoing, read the bill as reported by the conference committee, and read it with sane, honest, intelligent thought.

Here's what you will find:

Instead of forbidding that price cutting which is for the purpose of destroying a competitor, the conference committee permits a court to guess as it may see fit as to what will "substantially" lessen competition and "tend to create a monopoly." Why change from the wording that has been commended by many courts? Why open the door for a multiplicity of lawsuits, with every court permitted to differ from every other court?

Again:

Why introduce an element that varies with every company's business, to wit, the "selling" cost along with "transportation," as another aid to price discrimination? The oil men have been trying to tell you for nearly 10 months now that the Standard Oil Co. is whipping the devil around the stump on that word "transportation." The Standard says it includes cartage cost, but they make the cartage cost vary according to whether there is or is not competition; points of extreme competition find the cartage "cost" exceedingly low, despite high hills and winter snows. We, the independent oil interests of the country, want you to change that to "common-carrier transportation"; then we will have the variations in prices nailed fast. And yet, not satisfied with letting the Standard make its "cartage cost" farce, the conference committee adopted the Senate Judiciary Committee's proviso of "selling" cost. Do you appreciate that $5 a month more or less to station managers, so it might be alleged, would permit the Standard to vary its prices? Not a whole lot, but some, to which can be added a thousand and one little things which, if any Congressman ever had any business experience, he would quickly understand.

But come to the grand prize, to wit:

There being also allowed—in the event the Standard did not happen to get by on its cartage cost and selling charges—"discrimination * * * made in good faith to meet competition."

Why doesn't that say "competitor's prices," instead of just "competition"? Some good lawyer might reply that it would make the section redundant. So it would, because in meeting a competitor's prices, they being lower, the Standard, for instance, would be holding its business and not be laying itself liable to a charge of destroying that competitor's business. But here, under the kindly revised section, the Standard is selling 25,000 gallons of burning oil a day in a small town against a little independent's 500 gallons. The independent grows to a thousand gallons. Isn't he competition? Under this new section can't the Standard cut the bottom out of the market and keep it out until that independent has had to quit business? And can't the Standard commit this commercial murder and not only go unscathed by the the law, but have they not really been invited to do it by the Congress, as it were?

What does your "good faith" amount to in this clause? Hasn't the Standard in the above case done exactly what Congress would permit it to do, and there can be no question but what the Standard wants the business in all "good faith," and bad, too, for that matter?

But this applies to boots and shoes and sugar and corsets, coal and diamonds—so it does; but aren't the fundamentals of trade the same? Under the antidiscrimination law, which is on the statute books of a score of States and which has been passed upon by a number of supreme courts, can't a man conduct his business as he sees fit, as his needs may require, providing he doesn't reduce his prices in such a manner as will destroy the business of his competitor, providing, further, that he gives the benefit of any such cuts to all places where he is doing business. Any reason why the Cigar Trust stores should sell you two-for-a-quarter cigars in Washington at a cent each, charge your brother in Philadelphia 20 cents each, and your wife on your birthday in New York 30 cents each, all on the same day, providing some one else wasn't cutting the market at Washington to drive the Cigar Trust out of business?

Isn't all that any average fair business has fought for a chance to do business, free from molestation by highwaymen, on our commercial highways?

But how is any business not of the highwayman type going to get by, no matter how large its armed guard, if Congress enacts this section of the Clayton bill as revised by the conference committee?

Wouldn't Congress be lining the road with these highwaymen?

For nearly the past 10 years public opinion has been enforcing fair competition—measurably so—on the Standard Oil Co. and other trusts, and in that time the independent oil interests have grown from doing only 15 per cent of the business to nearly 40 per cent. There is now competition of some sort in a vast majority of the municipalities and districts of the country, and it is competition of the hardest kind, with the Standard Oil interests crowding the price down slowly but surely. However, it is quite noticeable that in the States having this antidiscrimination law the Standard is not—save in a few exceptions where it has tried on its "cartage-cost" plan—discriminating in prices, but in States that haven't this law it has, even to hemming in a small town with high prices while enforcing low prices there. The Standard may have reduced the cost to itself of petroleum and its products, but the Standard never reduced the cost of it to the public until it had to by this independent competition.

Gentlemen, this independent competition is now at your mercy. What you do with this particular section of this particular bill will go a long way toward continuing competition in the oil business or defeating it.

There is only one conclusion that can be drawn from the way the bill is written, and that is that the Standard Oil interests and trusts and organizations of similar character are the sole and only beneficiaries. It's a cinch the people are not.

A vote for the bill as now drawn is a vote against the small competitor.

For your "watchfully waiting" constituents,

THE INDEPENDENT PETROLEUM MARKETERS' ASSOCIATION,
W. C. PLATT, Secretary.
THE NATIONAL PETROLEUM ASSOCIATION,
C. D. CHAMBERLAIN, Secretary and General Counsel.

Mr. NELSON. So, Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, I invite your attention to this complaint, and it is a bitter complaint, showing what this bill is doing to the independents. Speaking of the last-named exceptions, these people ask:

Why introduce an element that varies with every company's business, to wit, the selling cost along with transportation as another aid to price discrimination? The oil men have been trying to tell you for nearly 10 months now that the Standard Oil Co. is whipping the devil around the stump on that word "transportation." The Standard says it includes cartage cost, but they make the cartage cost vary according to whether there is or is not competition; points of extreme competition find that the cartage cost is exceedingly low despite high hills and winter snows. We—the independent oil interests of the country—want you to change that to "common-carrier transportation." Then we will have the variation in prices nailed fast.

And, then, it says:

But come to the grand prize, to wit:

There being also allowed—in the event the Standard did not happen to get by on its cartage cost and selling charges—"discrimination * * * made in good faith to meet competition."

Again, it says:

Why does not that say "competitor's prices" instead of just "competition"? Some good lawyer might reply that it would make the section redundant. So it would, because in meeting a competitor's prices—they being lower—the Standard, for instance, would be holding its business and not be laying itself liable to a charge of destroying that competitor's business. But here under the kindly revised section the Standard is selling 25,000 gallons of burning oil a day in a small town against a little independent 500 gallons. The independent grows to a thousand gallons. Is not he competition? Under this section can not the Standard cut the bottom out of the market and keep it out until that independent has had to quit business?

Now, there are other exceptions. Trusts may "select their own customers," whatever that means, and it seems to me to be pregnant with possibilities. Finally, the penalty is cut out; they can do all these things, and the Trade Commission can only say, "You must not do it any more." Then there is the long delay in an appeal to the courts; and they go through the courts. And then what? There may be an injunction issued, but they have got away with the loot with impunity. I submit to any candid man the question, Where is the protection to the people of the United States? Where are the teeth in this section of the bill?

The prohibition upon price discrimination is now in the Sherman law, so far as restraint of trade goes or tendency to monopoly, and if there is an unfair method of competition beyond the pale of the Sherman law, it is certainly included in the unfair method of competition of section 5 of the Trade Commission bill, so that this section is not only unnecessary but it hamstrings both court and commission, for these loopholes are suggested and legalized.

I have now shown you the nature of its front tooth. It is hollow. The nerves have been carefully extracted. It is a show tooth, and no more.

The other provisions dealing with holding companies and interlocking directors are similar in substance and structure. "The effect" of violation must be "to substantially lessen competition or tend to monopoly," and the penalties are taken out, so that they may be violated with perfect impunity.

Look at the next provision, dealing with tying contracts. As the House passed the bill there was something to this section. The Senate struck it out and substituted the Walsh amendment. That was effective, but unfair to patented commodities; both had drastic penalties.

But the conference struck out the penalty and restored the House provision, with this language added: "Where the effect may be to substantially lessen competition or tend to create a monopoly in any line of commerce." As pointed out in the preceding provision, this makes the whole thing practically worthless, for it either is identical with restraint of trade under the Sherman law or so nearly the same that only the Supreme Court or the Lord can tell the difference.

Mr. Speaker, I have tried to indicate the nature of this bill by showing you some of its sample teeth. The Senate, I repeat, struck out three teeth of the House bill as perfectly worthless. Two of them were restored, but without the penalties.

I now desire to call your attention to section 25 of the Senate bill. This was rejected by the conferees. I call attention to this section because it so clearly proves my contention that the Democratic Party deliberately dodged the main trust issue. I read:

That whenever a corporation shall acquire or consolidate the ownership or control of the plants, franchises, or property of other corporations, copartnerships, or individuals so that it shall be adjudged to be a monopoly or combination in restraint of trade, the court rendering such judgment shall decree its dissolution and shall to that end appoint receivers to wind up its affairs, and shall cause all of its assets to be sold in such manner and to such persons as will, in the opinion of the court, restore competition as fully and completely as it was before said combination began to be formed. The court shall reserve in its decree jurisdiction over said assets so sold for a sufficient time to satisfy the court that full and free competition is restored and assured.

Now, the trouble with this provision, as the conferees saw it, was that it was too radical; that is, too effective. It was not a tooth; it was a horn—the horn of a wild boar or a rhinoceros. It would do deadly execution when directed against any trust. It might better be compared to a German 16-inch howitzer. It was a real trust buster. So the conferees dropped it out of the bill. What was the argument? Why, "It limited the power of the courts, and it might work injury to the stockholders of the dissolved trust." Think of it! The tender care for the innocent trust stockholder! What of the 90,000,000 of American people? Limit the power of the courts! Why not limit the power of the courts so as to prevent what was done in the Tobacco case or in the Standard Oil case? The court of appeals pursued a circuitous course, sometimes described as "whipping the devil around the stump," instead of carrying out directly the purpose of the Sherman law, dissolving these monopolies, so adjudged by the Supreme Court, and thus restoring in the oil and tobacco business free and full competition.

When it was evident that this Senate provision must go out an amendment was urged upon the conference, so that the section would read:

That whenever a corporation engaged in commerce shall acquire or consolidate the ownership or control of the plants, franchises, or property of other corporations, or of copartnerships or individuals, so that it shall in a suit brought by the United States be adjudged a monopoly or combination in restraint of commerce, the court rendering such decree, if practicable and necessary to the ends of justice, also decree the dissolution of such monopoly or combination, with the view of restoring competition as fully and freely as it existed before such monopoly or combination began to be formed. In the event that such full and free competition as provided herein is not restored within one year from the entry of the decree the court shall, if necessary to the ends of justice, appoint receivers to wind up the affairs of the monopoly or combination and cause all its assets to be sold in such manner and to such persons as will restore full and free competition, reserving jurisdiction over the assets so sold for such time as may be necessary to enable the court to enforce full and free competition as decreed.

The purpose of this proposed amendment was to settle the mooted question of the equity power of the court to partition and sell the assets of an adjudged monopoly. It also made certain the power of the court to give the trust a year's time to adjust its affairs to the requirements of the antitrust laws after it had been found guilty, and reserve the jurisdiction of the court over the assets of the corporation until it had satisfied itself that full and free competition had been restored as decreed.

The necessity for such a provision was urged upon the Judiciary Committee of the House most urgently by the well-known lawyer, Louis D. Brandeis, of Boston. On page 652, volume 1, of the hearings, Mr. Brandeis is recorded as follows:

Mr CARLIN. Mr. Brandeis, which of these supposed powers does the court not already possess?

Mr. BRANDEIS. In my opinion, the court possesses and has possessed all those powers, but the very learned circuit judges of New York who passed on the Tobacco case, in which I happened to be counsel for some of the defendants, were of opinion, apparently, that they did not possess those powers, and the very eminent counsel for the tobacco companies asserted most strongly that the court does not possess some or all of those powers.

As a matter of fact there was much discussion of the actual and almost the revolutionary character of the remedies which it was proposed that this court should exercise in carrying out the decree of the Supreme Court.

Unfortunately we did not have an appeal, as we should have had, from the decision of the circuit court judges. Because we did not have it, and because of the action there, and the fact that the judges were very eminent and were located in what is, perhaps, officially the most important circuit of the United States, it seemed important to make it desirable to set forth clearly the existence of these powers. If the court has the power, then no harm is done. If any judge shall be in doubt now as to whether he has the power or not, that doubt will be removed, and it is one of the great purposes which the President and all of us have been desirous of accomplishing in the removal of uncertainties in the law, and it has seemed to me it would be of great educational value, at least, to set forth these provisions distinctly in the law.

Then again, on page 679, Mr. Brandeis gives his reason:

Mr. BRANDEIS. I mean by machinery perfecting the remedies, and where it is necessary to protect the remedies by statute instead of by rule of court I would amend it by statute, and, if the situation is one of doubt, I would, in the exercise of the power which Congress has, instruct the courts as to what their powers may be, because you must remember that you gentlemen here are studying hard this question of the trust law. You are giving time and attention to this question. The courts have it, and it is one of many questions which come before the courts. You will be specialists in the law so far as it deals with trusts and monopolies and the Sherman law. They are not experts or specialists on this subject, and you ought to do what you can to make the machinery, such as it may be, an example to the country of how efficient legal machinery may be when the mind of man is directed to it.

Again, on page 689, I asked Mr. Brandeis this question:

How would you suggest a law controlling the matter of ownership of stock in competitive companies that would have prevented just what happened with the Standard Oil and Tobacco cases?

Mr. BRANDEIS. I have endeavored, in one of these provisions relating to machinery, to reach that situation by pointing out to the court that that was the kind of thing to do. What we contended for in that case, and what Mr. McReynolds when he was special assistant contended for, and what I contended for in that case, was that the court in dividing up the Tobacco Co. should refuse to allow anybody who held stock in one of those three segments to hold stock in either of the others.

Mr. NELSON. Do you think the court now has that power to prevent it?

To which Mr. Brandeis replied that he thought the court now had the power to prevent that. I then asked him what the court of appeals and the Attorney General held with reference to it. Mr. Brandeis replied:

The Attorney General expressed grave doubt about that power.

He went on to say:

It was contended in that case most strongly, by Mr. Choate and all the counsel for the Tobacco Co., that the Supreme Court held a different view, and quoted passages from the Harriman case and other cases in passing on the Standard Oil case, indicating that was the view of the Supreme Court. It seemed to me the contention was absolutely unfounded, but it satisfied the circuit judges, so they denied us the relief.

No amendment to perfect the provision was favorably considered by the conferees. Why this tender care, this gentle solicitude for the trusts? And this is a so-called Federal antitrust bill.

Mr. Speaker, in conclusion, I wish to call attention to the probable effect of this measure. I fear it will be bad, if not disastrous. It surely introduces uncertainty, confusion, and vexatious delay in the interpretation and the administration of the antitrust laws. It interferes with business, needlessly causing anxiety, uncertainty, and distress. No one can estimate the far-reaching effect of this interference. But the worst feature of it all is that the monopoly evil itself goes on untouched, so that this menace to our industrial and political life will be permitted to work out we know not what disastrous consequences.

The sum total, therefore, of Democratic legislation on the trust question is that another way has been provided, a roundabout way, for unwilling Attorneys General to whip the trust devil around the stump, "a primrose pathway of dalliance" for monopoly.

But this legislation may also prove disastrous for the party responsible for it, the party pledged unequivocably to enact legislation that shall make private monopoly impossible. What has it done? An analysis of this bill discloses that its trust legislation has been a process of bringing about "an atmosphere of mutual accommodation and understanding" between itself and big business.

Speaking now as a one-time secretary of the Insurgents of the House, I call your attention, you Democrats, to the fact that you are in power to-day by reason of your being the temporary beneficiaries of the Insurgent-Progressive movement inaugurated here a few years ago. I speak for myself, but I believe I voice the sentiment of all the Insurgents in Congress and in the country, when I say that after having seen what we have seen, and knowing what we know of Democratic performance of solemn pledges, we shall fight long and patiently within the conferences and conventions of our own party, the party of Lincoln [applause], that struck down slavery and set the black man free, the party of John Sherman, that put upon the statute books an antitrust law that Democratic statesmanship dare not even touch lest they mar its strength and symmetry, believing, as we do, that in the near future dissensions shall cease and the statesmanship of a united and harmonious grand old party will again be commissioned by the American people to guide the ship of state back to the quiet and happy haven of free, full, and fair competition in every field of trade and commerce.

There is no hope in Democracy. What we bolted was caucus rule and partisanship. But Democrats are the partisans of partisans and the slaves of the party caucus. We sought to overthrow a few leaders whom we thought were too loyal to special interests, but the Democratic Party as a whole has surrendered to special privilege. Why, Mr. Speaker, if there is any choice between courageous support of Wall Street and a craven surrender to Wall Street, I prefer the courageous leadership, because there is a chance to convert or change that leadership; but you can do nothing with a party that commits the unpardonable sin—the party that solemnly pledges itself to do the right thing and then deliberately and knowingly does the wrong, a party that will sacrifice the salvation of the American people, its deliverance from the yoke of monopoly, upon the altar of partisanship for the sake of its one supreme god—party success. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman yields back three minutes of his time.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DICKINSON].

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on this measure in the RECORD, the time being so limited that I can not get an opportunity to fully and properly discuss it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. I object.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, there are a number of gentlemen on this side and a number on the other side who would like to extend remarks on this measure, and I ask unanimous consent that all gentlemen may have the privilege of extending remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that all gentlemen who speak upon the bill may be allowed to extend remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. MANN. On the subject of the conference report?

Mr. WEBB. On the subject of the bill. I am not anxious to confine it to that if the gentleman does not want to confine it to that.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I shall object to permission to extend remarks generally in the House until the cotton people have had a chance to debate in the House; but as to those who wish to extend remarks on this conference report, I have no objection.

Mr. WEBB. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DICKINSON] made that request.

Mr. MANN. I objected to the gentleman's request because I do not want to have the time of the House taken up with several gentlemen rising to make requests to extend their remarks in the RECORD, having had half a minute yielded to them.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members who want to extend their remarks upon this bill may do so.

Mr. BORLAND. For five legislative days.

Mr. WEBB. Yes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that all gentlemen be permitted to extend their remarks in the RECORD on this bill.

Mr. MANN. For five legislative days.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. For five legislative days. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I yield 13 minutes to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, the indefensible character of this conference report on the Clayton bill has been so aptly, picturesquely, and vigorously described by distinguished Democrats, Progressives, and Republicans in another legislative body that it is difficult to do it justice in a descriptive way without being charged with plagiarism. Descriptive adjectives of criticism and condemnation have been exhausted by those who, having supported the measure in its earlier legislative stages, have found themselves in duty bound to vote against the report brought in by the Democratic members of the committee of conference. I mention this because it being contrary to the rules to quote these criticisms uttered in the Senate by men who are friendly to the avowed purposes of the legislation, I trust I may be excused if some of my characterizations of the nature of the report are somewhat similar to those which have been made elsewhere.

I voted for the Clayton bill as it passed the House, not because I approved all it contained, not because I believed it contained all the provisions it should, but because I did approve some of its provisions and hoped that its faults would be remedied and its shortcomings supplied. In this conference report hope is conclusively dashed and disappointed. I trusted that the measure would be so improved and perfected as to fully justify my former vote and warrant my further support of the measure. I now find I can not approve what has been done without being false to the opinions I hold as to the necessity for definite and effective legislation to prevent unfair and unjust practices which lead to and perpetuate monopoly.

The theory of this legislation was, as I understood it, to supplement and strengthen the Sherman antitrust law; to definitely prohibit and adequately penalize certain clearly defined acts and practices, evil and oppressive in their nature and harmful to the public interests. These objects were, to a certain extent at least, accomplished in the House bill. The legitimate objects of the legislation were, in some respects, further secured by the action of the Senate. We are now confronted with a conference report which emasculates the House provisions, nullifies some of the Senate amendments, and presents a measure which ought to be, and probably is, perfectly satisfactory to every trade shark and conspirator and every trust magnate in the land. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The conferees, without authority in my opinion, have stricken from the bill the penal clauses of its more important sections under which evildoers could have been heavily fined and sent to jail for persisting in the evil and unfair practices which the bill condemns. This most extraordinary and unusual action on the part of the conferees in robbing the bill of its penalties has been referred to elsewhere as "pulling its teeth." It is more than that; not only have the conferees pulled its teeth, they have trimmed its claws, and for its stern tones of warning and prohibition they have substituted a plaintive pleading which has elsewhere been likened to "the mewing of an anemic tabby cat." [Applause and laughter.]

The flimsy excuse for this unpardonable surrender is that these vicious and harmful practices are to be dealt with by the Federal Trade Commission. We can scarcely believe our astonished ears as we hear gentlemen high in Democratic legislative councils say that these sections were not intended to apply to trusts and monopolies, that "it was the common belief that the practices of actual trusts and monopolies are already amply taken care of by the law." May I inquire why this is called an antitrust bill, if we already have, in the opinion of the Democrats in responsible positions, adequate legislation affecting trusts and monopolies?

If the severe punishments which the House bill provided for the acts and practices it prohibited are to be eliminated because the Federal Trade Commission is expected to exercise jurisdiction over them, why confuse the issues by general prohibition of unfair practices in the Trade Commission bill and provisions in this bill denouncing certain specific acts and practices with no provision for their punishment? The inevitable result will be delay, confusion, litigation, and at the end of it all nothing more menacing to real wrongdoers than a polite notice to desist from their evil practices. This is the legislative "ring around the rosy" which we have presented to us as the final product of all the Democratic volleying and thundering against the trusts. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Section 3 of the House bill, intended to prevent unfair practices, harmful to consumers, on the part of those engaged in the production and sale of coal, oil, or hydroelectric energy, has disappeared from the bill as completely as though it had never been a part of it. Amendments offered to recent water-power and leasing legislation in the House for the protection of users and consumers were voted down by the majority on the theory, and with the statement, that this legislation would provide the needed protection. Yet, lo and behold, these necessary protective provisions are lifted bodily from the bill with no other explanation than that these questions are so involved and complicated that there was not sufficient time to fully consider and wisely legislate with regard to them.

For a year and more the trade and business interests of the country have been in a constant state of alarm and terror as the Cossacks of Democratic radicalism have charged and countercharged with blare of trumpets and waving of banners, with declarations of implacable hostility to trusts and monopoly, and of fixed determination to put an end to all acts and practices in business which their medieval fancy disapproved. Their indiscriminate condemnation and Falstaffian fury inspired terror everywhere, but more particularly among those of energy and enterprise against whom no charge could be laid except that they had been successful. Honest and legitimate enterprise halted as the country awaited the expected blow, uncertain whether real wrongdoers and malefactors or inoffensive citizens and innocent bystanders were to be the most severely punished.

So far as the real offenders against sound public policy and real oppressors of the people are concerned, it is all over. The Democratic conferees have sounded the retreat; the raiders have been called in. Their trumpetings no longer alarm the real enemies of commercial freedom, and we behold these erstwhile terrors of the countryside for what they really are—tin soldiers with toy guns and wooden swords. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.] Behold before you the trophy of their sham battling against the trusts and the trade oppressors—a soiled and trailing flag of truce and a declaration of absolution and immunity.

But how about the innocent bystander—the legitimate business enterprise, the undertaking to which fair practice, faithful and efficient service has brought success? Do they participate in the fruits of compromise and surrender? Not at all. They find themselves, in the words of a newspaper of this city, in "a vast labyrinth of prohibition and restriction, through which every concern above the level of a corner grocery will have to feel its way. The inevitableness of contravention of some clause by almost any business man is evident, until the whole field of affairs is plotted and mapped by means of administrative rulings and court decisions." The conference report presents, therefore, one of those strange anomalies of legislation through whose loopholes the real culprit may pass unscathed, but whose meshes tangle every footstep of the honest and well meaning who have the energy and enterprise to tread the paths of commerce where its snares are laid.

This conference report, if adopted, will not accomplish in advance the abatement of unfair and oppressive practices in trade and enterprise. It is, on the contrary, a backward movement; a confession of incompetency, if nothing worse; a confusion of the issues by the belated confession of its apologists and defenders. It is now not even claimed to be an effective instrument against trusts and monopolies established and intrenched or hereafter formed. Heralded as a battery of heavy trust-busting artillery, it now develops that its instrumentalities, far from having any effectiveness for those purposes, is an aggregation of smooth-bore hot-air guns, its projectiles the dimensions of a shriveled pea and the consistency of a blue-mass pill. As an irritant and an obstruction to the enterprising and law abiding it has, however, all of the efficiency of a barbed wire entanglement reenforced by hidden mines and concealed pitfalls.

Some gentlemen imagine that some will be cajoled or coerced into voting for this apology to the trusts—this fraud and sham, as it has been characterized in another body—because of some provisions I have supported which are desired by some labor organizations. One of the best friends of labor in public life has characterized those provisions as the "cheapest sop that has ever been offered to a laboring man." Another has described them as "taffy." I do not altogether agree with that characterization, but everyone knows that these provisions are not what the representatives of labor sought or asked for; that they have been clipped, trimmed, diluted, and toned down until they are in the main but declarations of present law and practice. Laboring men have infinitely more interest in preventing unfair trade practices and the curbing of monopoly than they have in any mere declaration of an existing fact. They are the last people in the world to ask or expect that any provision of legislation of questionable advantage to them be made the excuse for complete surrender to the trade sharks which infest the waters of commerce, destroying competition, and the monopolies which enhance the cost of living for all. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MORGAN].

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, we are about to take a final vote on H. R. 15657, entitled "An act to supplement existing laws against unlawful restraints and monopolies, and for other purposes." The bill is called the "Clayton antitrust bill." The bill is an administration measure and is supposed to represent the best thought of the Democratic administration now in control of the National Government. When this bill was introduced it was referred to the Judiciary Committee, of which committee I have the honor to be a member. The bill was before the committee for months. Extensive hearings were had. Many persons appeared before the committee and discussed the bill. The bill was reported to the House, and after being under consideration a number of days was passed by the House. The bill went to the Senate. It was there amended. A conference committee was appointed to harmonize the differences between the two Houses. The Senate has already adopted the conference report, and if the House does likewise the bill will become a law if approved by the President. You have listened to two of my Republican colleagues of the Judiciary Committee severely criticize this bill as written in the conference report. They express themselves as being unwilling to vote for the bill.

Mr. Speaker, I regret that I can not entirely agree with my Republican colleagues of the Committee on the Judiciary. I believe it is my duty to vote for this bill, and I intend to do so. It is not my purpose to enter into any general defense of the bill, but rather to present a few of the reasons why I believe I ought to support it. I agree with my Republican colleagues that the bill may justly be severely criticized not only for some things that it does contain but for many things that it does not contain. I do not believe the bill is what we should have had, but with all of its imperfections, defects, and faults I shall vote for it for the good, whatever that may be, there is in it.

In the first place, beginning with 1908, in my first campaign, and in every subsequent campaign since, I have said before my constituents that I was in favor of additional legislation for the regulation and control of the large industrial concerns engaged in interstate business. While all the provisions in this bill do not meet my approval and while, in my judgment, the measure is not at all what it should be, and while I feel the administration in power has not given the country what it should have had, still I do not feel that I would be justified in refusing to vote for the measure.

Secondly, the Republican Party has repeatedly declared for additional antitrust legislation. Our party is clearly committed to such legislation. Over and over again we have declared that laws should be enacted to provide stricter supervision, additional regulation, and greater control over the large business concerns engaged in interstate commerce. However imperfect the bill may be, it is a step in the right direction. And I feel that in giving the bill my support and my vote I am clearly in line with the platform declarations of the Republican Party.

Third. There are some things in the bill especially in harmony with my individual ideas. It is known that I introduced in the House the first bill to create a national commission as an instrument to further regulate our large business concerns, as an arm of the Government to protect the public from monopolistic concerns, and as a means to reenforce and maintain competition. When this bill passed the House there was no provision giving the Federal Trade Commission any power. However, since that time the bill to create a trade commission has become a law. But as the bill comes to us to-day the Federal Trade Commission has been given the power to enforce a number of the most important provisions of this bill. In my judgment, in this respect the bill has been improved. In the hands of the Federal Trade Commission these provisions will be enforced. It is not a question of having laws on the statute book; it is a question of enforcement. Here is where the Sherman law has failed. It has not been enforced. The courts have not had the governmental machinery with which to enforce it. The Sherman law is sweeping and drastic. Under it to monopolize, or attempt to monopolize, is a crime subject to a fine of $5,000; under it every contract in restraint of trade is a crime and subject to punishment; under it the courts may enjoin every contract and agreement in restraint of trade. But with all this power lodged in the courts, with all the penalties attached for a violation of the law, concentration in business went on. All the big corporations of to-day have been formed under the Sherman law. The courts have failed as an enforcing agency in statutes designed to regulate and control the business and industrial concerns of this country. We have tried the courts and they have failed. The Trade Commission, assisted and aided by the courts, will, in my judgment, make a more effective enforcing agency. I therefore especially approve the portion of this bill which gives the Trade Commission authority to enforce certain important provisions.

I have in every way possible aided in the work of preparing this antitrust legislation. As a member of the Judiciary Committee, I have tried to do my part.

On the 9th of December, 1913, I think it was, the Judiciary Committee began holding hearings on antitrust bills, and the hearings continued for months. The proceedings were published and comprise 2,000 printed pages. I have here the two volumes in which these hearings are printed. I had the honor to address my own committee. If you will examine these two volumes of the hearings before the Committee on the Judiciary on antitrust legislation, you will see that I delivered the first address on that legislation, occupying two days. [Applause.] And then if you will turn over to the last volume you will find on the last page my minority report in opposition to this bill.

Mr. NELSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Just for a short question.

Mr. NELSON. In the speech which the gentleman made, was he not in favor of giving power to the Trade Commission to fix prices?

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Well, under my bill the commission had power to control the practice, and, if necessary, the prices of corporations having power to arbitrarily control prices. In that respect I am probably some years in advance of the most of you. In due time the Trade Commission will have the power in certain cases to control the prices of these corporations and large concerns that have become virtual monopolies. I planned my bill not only for now but for the future, and the rest of you will come along with me in due time.

Mr. LEVY. Will my friend yield?

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Yes; for a question.

Mr. LEVY. Did the gentleman state that he is the only one who introduced a Trade Commission bill?

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. No, sir.

Mr. LEVY. I introduced one August 22, 1913.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Yes; but my bill was introduced in January, 1912. You and others have followed my lead. When I went before the committee I know that every Democratic Member on that committee smiled at the idea of creating a Federal trade commission. You had no idea at that time that a commission would be created. The President came down here one day about a month afterwards with a message declaring in favor of a commission, and from that time on it was smooth sailing for the commission idea. I give the President credit for that, because it was not a Democratic idea. It was not a Democratic policy. It had not been in the Democratic platform, but it was in the Republican and Progressive platforms.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Briefly.

Mr. MADDEN. Does the gentleman charge the President with copying ideas?

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. I do not. But I hope that whoever may be President now or in the future will be a man who will be willing to some extent to recognize what public sentiment generally approves. [Applause.]

Mr. CARLIN. I understood the gentleman's position to be that the Republican Party seems to be abandoning its ideas. Is that it?

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Well, not exactly. But I must go on. Another thing, to some extent the changes which have been made in this bill have been exactly according to the line I suggested. I offered an amendment to section 2, in substance the same language you have in section 2 now. Now, I believe this bill, after all, represents progress. Shall I refuse to vote for this bill, shall I refuse to go with my Democratic friends one step forward simply because they refuse to go a mile? I believe not. It has been said time and again here that the teeth have been taken out of this bill. Well, my friends, the teeth in a dead animal do not amount to very much. [Laughter.] To be effective the teeth must be in an animal which is alive and has power. We have created a great national commission which, I believe, will be an effective weapon in the enforcement of all our antitrust laws. Through this commission life and vitality and force will be put into our antitrust laws. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS]. [Applause.]

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to the adoption of this report, because I think it will seriously interfere with the course of trust regulation in this country. I do not care to approach this subject from a partisan standpoint. I seek to discuss it as an American legislator and as one sincerely interested in the successful working out of one of our most complicated and troublesome national problems. We all realize from the discussions throughout the country for some years back that there are two different schools of thought concerning the regulation of trusts. One, and the older one, considers the subject from the standpoint of prohibiting the evils by making evil practices unlawful, to be enforced by the imposition of severe penalties and punishment. Such was the doctrine laid down in the Sherman antitrust law and by most of the States. The more recent method of regulation is that by an administrative body endowed with very large authority, with a high personnel, with large influence and dignity, and the power to regulate, to prescribe, to admonish, to prohibit, and to punish wherever necessary, under fixed rules and standards in advance laid down by Congress. This is the method of regulating the transportation interests through the National and State commissions, and in a way regulating the banking and currency systems through the Federal Reserve Board. These two different methods are somewhat contradictory. One can not go along with the other very far without a conflict of authority and a troublesome mixture of the proper administration of the law.

This bill attempts to straddle these two systems. It attempts to cover both theories, with the result that it impairs and injures both methods and systems of legislation. The method which is covered by the prohibition and penalties as laid down in the Sherman law has already been discussed very ably and exhaustively by my colleague from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD], and he has demonstrated that this measure will seriously cripple the existing laws prohibiting trusts and combinations. I shall discuss for a few moments the situation of the regulation of commerce and industry in the interstate and foreign commerce of this country as it may be regulated by the Trade Commission and as such regulation and powers may be affected by this bill. It seems to me that this legislation concerning the Trade Commission will be very seriously injured by the adoption of this report and by the provisions of this measure if adopted into law.

TRADE COMMISSION.

The essence of the Trade Commission legislation is section 5, making unfair methods of competition illegal and granting to the commission ample authority to enforce that provision. We all know that Congress made no attempt to define what unfair methods of competition were, are, or should be. Congress designedly left to the courts power to define what should be an unfair method of competition according to the generally accepted rules laid down in many hundreds of cases. We believed this would be the most sure way of protecting the people and the business interests of the country. We knew in the framing of that legislation that there were two different schools of construction as to what constituted unfair competition—one the rather narrow construction made by the United States Supreme Court and followed by many Federal and State courts, and the broader construction held by many of the State courts, by nearly all of the text writers, and especially by the writers on political economy. I will read you what the United States Supreme Court states concerning unfair competition; I quote from One hundred and ninety-eighth United States Supreme Court Reports, page 140:

> The essence of the wrong in unfair competition consists in the sale of the goods of one manufacturer or vendor for those of another, and if defendant so conducts its business as not to palm off its goods as those of complainant the action fails.

In an earlier case, reported in One hundred and seventy-ninth United States Supreme Court Reports, at page 674, it was held:

> The essence of the wrong consists in the sale of the goods of one manufacturer or vendor for those of another.

There are several other cases along that same line. The point is this, that the United States Supreme Court, following the old rule, holds that unfair competition consists in misrepresentation and substitution of goods under the old and familiar doctrine of fraud. The broader definition is illustrated by the text-writers as set forth by Nims on Unfair Business Competition, as follows:

> There is an increasing number of decisions by equity courts in which relief has been given against infringement of some personal right. Many of these cases are applications of old principles governing the issuing of the writ of injunction to new needs—new injuries which modern conditions have produced. Many of them are closely analogous to the application of the writ to unfair-competition cases.

That doctrine, I think, is followed by a majority of the State courts, and I know that those who framed the Trade Commission bill expected, should it be adopted, that every grievous wrong against competition and fair dealing and honest business conduct would be prohibited under the term of prohibiting unfair methods of competition. If such a construction be made, then the commission and courts would have the amplest authority to protect honest business and punish the erring.

EFFECT OF THIS BILL.

I hold the very last number of the Political Science Quarterly, published, I think, by Columbia University, the June and September numbers, containing a very able, elaborate thesis on the subject of unfair competition, in which a list of 11 different classes of unfair competition is set forth, as follows:

1. Local price cutting.
2. Operation of bogus "independent" concerns.
3. Maintenance of "fighting ships" and "fighting brands."
4. Lease, sale, purchase, or use of certain articles as a condition of the lease, sale, purchase, or use of other required articles.
5. Exclusive sales and purchase arrangements.
6. Rebates and preferential contracts.
7. Acquisition of exclusive or dominant control of machinery or goods used in the manufacturing process.
8. Manipulation.
9. Blacklists, boycotts, white lists, etc.
10. Espionage and use of detectives.
11. Coercion, threats, and intimidation.

I think that this classification is not complete. There should be added several other classes, such as the fraud of misrepresentation and substitution, and possibly some evil action under interlocking directorates and holding companies, prohibited by sections 7 and 8 of this bill. So I think it is safe to say that so far as classification has gone there are probably 15 or more different classes of acts or transactions which might constitute unfair competition or methods of competition. The United States Supreme Court has defined only two, namely, substitution and misrepresentation in fraud. Your bill only defines four or five, and consequently there are about half of the classes of unfair competition or unfair methods of competition which are not defined either by the decisions of the Supreme Court or by your legislation.

Consider in the light of this situation this and past legislation seeking to define and banish unfair methods of competition. There is on the statute books that prohibition of unfair methods of competition by a general term without specific definition. Following that statute, several weeks later Congress passes another act specifying four or five different classes of acts or transactions which are admittedly defined by many courts and competent authorities to be unfair methods of competition. You realize what is the old and ordinary rule of construction in such a case that the expression of some is the exclusion of those not named. In other words, by prescribing these definitions of unfair competition in this bill you are liable to compel the Supreme Court to hold that these are the only acts or transactions which Congress has defined as unfair competition, while there are three times as many other classes of unfair acts which are not included within these definitions over which the Trade Commission would or ought to have any jurisdiction. But if the Supreme Court should conclude that, in addition to your definitions, there are two or more other classes which it has described and defined as unfair competition in the cases presented to you and which are not included in your bill, yet there would be one-half probably of the different classes of unfair competition which would not be included within the scope of your legislation or the existing decisions of the Supreme Court. The history of this very legislation furnishes a strong argument why this last method of definition might be adopted by the Supreme Court if the ordinary logic of construction be followed.

You may recall that when your bill left the House it contained a prohibition of tying contracts. I think it was section 4 of your bill as it passed the House, but you will correct me if I misdescribe. At first this section was stricken out by the Senate. Then there was called to the attention of the Senate the decision in the Dick case, so called, in which the Supreme Court sustained as legal the tying contracts affixed to sales under a patent. In such case where the Supreme Court had held such contract and such a practice legal, necessarily the Trade Commission would have no authority to declare such a contract and act illegal as an act of unfair competition or an unfair method of competition. Of course it would not. That was realized. To meet such a situation there was adopted an amendment, which I think is section 3 of your bill as it left the Senate, which made such acts and contracts illegal. Following the logic and analogy of that legislative performance, when there shall be presented to the United States Supreme Court questions as to what shall constitute unfair competition or unfair methods of competition, is it not competent to argue that Congress did not define unfair competition or methods of competition in its first statute? It did so define such words in its second statute a few week later; in addition to the prior expression of the Supreme Court—that when it found that a particular transaction like that of tying contracts had been declared legal by the Supreme Court, in order to overcome that situation and render such subject to the jurisdiction of the commission, Congress found it necessary to specifically legislate on that subject.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman five minutes more.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Now, Mr. Speaker, following the logical deduction from this situation, the Supreme Court has laid down in these cases which I referred to what it believes to be unfair competition, acts of substitution, and misrepresentation in fraud as to goods of the complainant. Congress, believing that that is not broad enough and did not cover or include enough classes or subjects, has legislated as to four or five other classes to bring them under the jurisdiction of the commission, just as it did concerning the tying contracts. It can be safely assumed that Congress recognized the decision of the court as to what constituted unfair competition exactly as it did as to the validity of a tying contract. Under the decision of the Supreme Court, unfair method of competition would only cover substitution and misrepresentation of goods. That is the old doctrine, well sustained by the decisions. Congress assumed such doctrine in the first statute as a basis for the entire jurisdiction of the Trade Commission. It so intended that such should be the scope of its powers. But subsequently, a few weeks later, in another act, Congress concluded that it was not good public policy to rely exclusively on the decision of the courts in the Dick case and in the other cases as to what constitutes unfair competition. So it meets all of these decisions by specific legislative action in the Dick case, declaring to be illegal that which the court had sustained as legal, and as to the other cases declaring other acts and transactions to be unfair competition in addition to what the court has previously defined. Congress decided that sections 2, 3, 7, and 8, I think, should define other classes of unfair competition, just exactly as it met the court's action as to the tying contract.

Under those circumstances and with this legislative history such would be a logical and proper deduction from the action of Congress and from the action of the Supreme Court. It could be followed without doing violence to any legal rule or argument. If that method of construction be adopted, then more than half of the different classes of unfair-methods competition would not be under the jurisdiction of the Trade Commission at all and would be omitted from its powers, and that is what I am afraid you possibly have done. There is this chance, that you have taken from the jurisdiction of the Trade Commission one-half of the practices which ought to be under its jurisdiction, and if this report be adopted and this bill become a law these unfair practices can hereafter only be placed under its jurisdiction by an affirmative act of Congress. It could not well be implied to be within the scope of the authority of the commission. That situation should have been corrected in your report. It was not so done. I fear that that omission will be extremely injurious to the work of the Trade Commission and to the work of regulating the trusts. I have outlined a real situation, which will be early met and plague the authorities, and will require expensive litigation for several years before it can be finally determined even favorably by the broad authority of the commission as to how far it has actually the power we hoped for it.

Now, another part of your conference report that I fear will be injurious as to the regulation of evil practices of business concerns. You recall that the jurisdiction of the Trade Commission to act in cases of unfair competition was limited to that class where its action against an unfair method of competition was in the interest of the public. That was the standard for the definition and a limit to its jurisdiction and action. That was the sole basis upon which the Trade Commission was authorized to act in any case where an unfair method of competition was brought before it.

You have changed that basis in your section and greatly narrowed and weakened it by practically providing that the "unfair method of competition described in this section shall be under the jurisdiction of the commission where the effect of such discrimination may be to substantially lessen competition or tend to create a monopoly in any line of commerce." In other words, these other practices of unfair competition, whatever they may be, can be prohibited if they injure public interest. You narrow and greatly restrict that basis. You make it apply only where the act substantially lessens competition, irrespective as to whether it may or may not be for the public interest. I can conceive where it might be for the public interest to substantially lessen competition in commerce. In some cases it might be necessary for the public interest that it be done. You deprive the commission of the power to consider it.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Certainly.

Mr. WEBB. I have tried to follow the gentleman on the legal definition. It seems to me, from what the gentleman has read from the Supreme Court Reports as to what unfair competition is, that the things denounced in sections 3 and 4 do not come within that class.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Oh, it is conceded by the writers and in the debates that they do. It is conceded all through the debates. If the gentleman will read the Senate debates he will see that that is so; and it is also conceded outside of Congress, in the courts of the States, and by the text-writers and economists.

Mr. WEBB. I was referring to the excerpts from the opinions of the Supreme Court.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Oh, the gentleman will realize that the basis of the decisions in nearly every case in the United States courts and in the State courts is the doctrine of fraud, and especially fraud as to substitution and discrimination of that nature, and this is only one of the classes of unfair competition. This method of discrimination in prices is a transaction that has been regarded by many courts as one of the most culpable acts of unfair competition. The United States Supreme Court has not so held it, so far as I know. That is the very point I make—that the United States Supreme Court has not so held—so that under its decision and definition that this particular section 2 would not be unfair competition, and because it has not so held Congress found it necessary to define it and make it an unfair method of competition in order that the Trade Commission should have any jurisdiction over it. And if Congress defines such a transaction in this case in order to overcome a decision of the court, it must also define in all other cases where it is desired that other classes of transactions should be within the scope of the commission; and if that doctrine prevails, then one-half of the methods of unfair competition will not be covered by your legislation and will not be covered by the Trade Commission act, now on the statute books. And whenever it is found that evil practices do amount to unfair methods of competition, if this construction is adopted it will be necessary to enact suitable statutes defining them. We realize how difficult and almost impossible this will be. Because of such a possibility of misfortune for the trust legislation in which we are all so much interested, the committee should have met the situation by apt terms covering the scope of what was designed in the Trade Commission act and prevented this possibility of long and expensive litigation.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD, and there I will try to make clearer what I have sought in these few moments to explain. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. NEELY].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from West Virginia is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. NEELY of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, before I begin I will ask unanimous consent that I may be permitted to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD within five legislative days.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. NEELY] asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks in the RECORD within five legislative days. On this bill?

Mr. NEELY of West Virginia. No, sir.

Mr. LEVY. The gentleman has that privilege now.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Not on this bill. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Do I understand that it is on this bill, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is not on this bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. NEELY of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, patriotic Americans will ever remember November 5, 1912, as a grand and glorious day. It is the date on which the independent voters of the land, as a protest against two decades of unredeemed pledges, broken promises, and repudiated principles, retired the Republican Party from power, scourged its recreant officials from the seats of the mighty, and delivered complete control of the Federal Government into Democratic hands.

For the notorious apostasy of its officials the Republican Party was banished. For its traditional fidelity to principle the Democratic Party was restored. On election day two years ago the voters not only remembered what the Republicans had failed to do but they were also mindful of what Democracy had done. At the ballot box the people remembered the remarkable record made by the Democratic House of the Sixty-second Congress. They remembered that that House passed a bill providing for the publication of campaign expenses, both before and after the election; that it proposed an amendment to the Constitution providing for the popular election of United States Senators; that it provided for the admission of New Mexico and Arizona to statehood; that it passed a bill to prevent the abuse of the writ of injunction; that it passed a bill establishing an eight-hour day for workmen on all national public works; that it passed a contempt bill, which in certain cases provides for a trial by jury; that it passed a bill providing for the better protection of human life at sea; that it passed a bill prohibiting the deadly work of manufacturing white phosphorus matches; that it passed a bill to protect American trade and shipping from foreign monopolies; that it passed a bill creating the Department of Labor and making its head a member of the President's Cabinet; that it passed the Alaskan civil government bill, creating a legislature for the people of Alaska, and conferring authority upon them to make laws for themselves; that it made an honest effort to effect a multitude of other needed reforms.

By way of expressing their approval of our past achievements and their confidence in our future performances, the people put every department of the Federal Government under Democratic control two years ago.

The Baltimore platform, upon which Democracy was returned to power, pledged the party to a trinity of capital reforms, consisting of an immediate downward revision of the tariff, the passage of a currency law, and the enactment of such antitrust legislation as would make it impossible for a private monopoly to exist. Certainly this was a program sufficiently ambitious to test the courage and excite the best endeavors of the ablest and bravest of men.

During the rapid flight of the first 18 months of the Wilson administration we have placed upon the statute books a real revenue tariff law, an incomparable currency law, and within another day we shall have added the second of our effective antitrust laws. With an additional record of extraordinary accomplishments to the credit of the administration, the Members on this side of the House can return to their constituents and declare that in deed and in truth they have unqualifiedly kept the faith.

On its restoration to power the Democratic Party found the consuming masses staggering under an intolerable burden of taxation imposed upon them by that infamous measure commonly known as the Payne-Aldrich tariff law, but which in scriptural language might well be designated as the abomination of desolation spoken of by Daniel the Prophet. Under this law every average family in the United States paid a tariff tax of $115 per year. The ingenuity of the measure so nearly approached the injustice of its operation that only $16 out of every $115 collected from the people ever reached the Treasury, while the remaining $99 invariably went into the coffers of the avaricious trusts.

The first work of the administration was to expunge this burdensome law from the statute book and write in its place an honest, equitable revenue law that would be just to all and afford special privileges to none. And most eagerly and enthusiastically did we set about our task. After months of earnest, arduous labor, on October 3, 1913, the Underwood tariff bill finally became a law. By virtue of its beneficent provisions a sweeping reduction in the tariff was made, averaging almost 30 per cent, while many of the necessaries of food and clothing that are largely consumed by the poor and articles coming into competition with trust-controlled products were put upon the free list. We have now had more than 12 months of the Underwood tariff law, and its operations have met with the hearty approval of a vast majority of the people. Until checked by the results of war in Europe, the constant tendency of this law was toward a lowering of the high cost of living. A notable proof of this assertion is found in the fact that sugar was cheaper in May of this year than it had been for 20 years before; while John Wanamaker, greatest of merchants and a lifelong Republican, advertises a reduction in the price of a score of household articles as a direct result of Democratic tariff legislation. It is almost universally believed that with the European war ended and normal conditions again prevailing the Underwood tariff law will in a short time effect a substantial reduction in the excessive cost of the necessaries of life. To-day there is not a Republican candidate for Congress in the whole United States who would dare to go before the voters of his district and assert that if elected he would vote to repeal the Democratic tariff law. Such an assertion would be murder for the candidate's ambition and suicide for the candidate himself. What provision of the Underwood law would the Republicans dare wipe out? What provision of the Payne-Aldrich law would they dare restore? Would they repeal that part of the Underwood law which provides an annual reduction of 25 per cent in the tariff on sugar until it is finally free? Would they restore the tax on sugar that annually cost the consumers $120,000,000 and that compelled every average American family to pay a tribute of more than $7 per year to the Sugar Trust? Would the stand-pat party restore the tariff of 93 per cent on cotton manufactures, provided by the Payne-Aldrich law for the sole benefit of the heartless mill owners like those of Lawrence, Mass., who paid a wage so low that it kept their laborers, including women and children, on the very verge of starvation every day in the year? The Democratic tariff law puts all meats, fish, dairy products, flour, and potatoes on the free list. If returned to power, would the Republicans again put a duty on these prime necessities of the dinner table? Would they again lay a tariff on coal, to be paid by the shivering poor? Regardless of the answers Republican politicians may make to these questions, the people themselves will answer them—one and all—in favor of the Democratic Party on election day; by their votes they will express their approbation of the Democratic tariff law, that says to the tariff baron, "Thou shalt not steal."

The party having fully redeemed its promise of an immediate downward revision of the tariff, without pausing for a moment to admire the results of its handiwork, promptly proceeded to the enactment of a currency law—a colossal task, considering the mighty influences that were arrayed in opposition to this reform.

The old Republican currency system which the country had endured for more than half a century was a make-shift, war-time measure. It was as inadequate as a fiscal law as the Payne-Aldrich Act was intolerable as a revenue law. Under the old system a dozen men either owned outright or, through a system of interlocking directorates, controlled practically the entire money supply of the United States. The banks were largely engaged in directing the Government business, while the Government ineffectually tried to regulate the banking business. Indeed, the Money Trust had become more powerful than the Federal Government itself. Even in a time of profound peace and unprecedented prosperity a handful of men could create a business depresssion overnight and spread an artificial panic from Maine to California between the rising and the setting of the sun. New York City was the seat of financial government, and from Wall Street, as from a throne, the monarchs of money wielded their despotic power without remorse and ruled the land without mercy.

Responding to a general demand for a scientific currency law, the Democratic administration has given to the country the Owen-Glass Act, the best currency law that has ever been enacted by a legislative body. This law affords the people a large measure of local self-government in their financial affairs. It annihilates the Money Trust; it stabilizes commercial conditions and encourages industrial enterprises throughout the United States; it makes it forever impossible for the manipulators of high finance to corner the Nation's supply of money; it provides for the concentration of the reserves of 25,000 banks into the strongest banking association ever formed; it provides for the establishment of foreign branch banks to take care of our foreign commerce; it provides for the issuance of elastic currency on the security of commercial paper of early maturity; it provides a Federal Reserve Board empowered to fix interest rates; it inaugurates a system under which we begin banking business with $53,000,000 of capital and with Uncle Sam as general overseer. This law makes it forever impossible for us to have an artificial money panic; it ushers in an era of new freedom rich in promise of permanent prosperity to every legitimate business and to every honest enterprise beneath the flag.

ANTITRUST LEGISLATION.

While perfecting and passing the tariff and currency laws, Democracy developed such a genius for patriotic service and became so sincerely solicitous of promoting the welfare of the people that it found it impossible either to slumber or sleep until it had carried out its program of antitrust legislation. Accordingly, early this year, the appropriate committees of the House prepared two separate antitrust bills, one of which the administration has already had enacted into law and the second of which it will have placed upon the statute book before the close of another day. These measures, taken together, protect certain rights and provide ample and adequate remedies for certain trust ills which could not be reached under any of the provisions of the old law.

The first of these antitrust measures provides for the appointment of a Federal Trade Commission of five members, not more than three of whom shall be members of the same political party. This commission is empowered to investigate the organization, the business, financial condition, conduct, and management of any corporation engaged in interstate commerce for the purpose of discovering violators of the antitrust laws and bringing them to justice. This commission is expressly authorized and fully empowered to prevent persons, partnerships, and corporations engaged in interstate commerce from practicing such unfair competition as is frequently resorted to by big business for the purpose of destroying its weaker rivals, to the end that the public may later be plundered at will.

The second of the administration's antitrust statutes prohibits what are technically known as tying contracts, which restrict the independence of purchasers; it makes holding companies outlaws in all cases where their effect is to lessen legitimate competition or create monopoly at the expense of the public; it makes it illegal, two years after the passage of the law, for competing corporations engaged in interstate commerce to have interlocking directorates in all cases in which any one of the participating corporations has a capital of more than $1,000,000; it provides for criminal prosecution and imprisonment of violators of the antitrust law; it provides additional protection for those who are prosecuted in injunction cases and contempt proceedings. By enacting the tariff law, the currency law, and the antitrust laws this administration earned the everlasting gratitude and continued support of an emancipated people and won for itself imperishable fame.

Each of these measures should be proof against the condemnation of the opposition, for the reason that a number of members of the minority parties, putting principle above politics and patriotism above party, voted in favor of this Democratic legislation.

Three Republicans, three Progressives, and one Independent in the House, and one Republican and one Progressive in the Senate voted for the Underwood tariff law.

Thirty-five Republicans and 14 Progressives in the House and 3 Republicans and 1 Progressive in the Senate voted for the Democratic currency law.

All the members of the opposition parties joined the Democrats in passing the first of our antitrust laws by acclamation.

Forty-one Republicans and 15 Progressives in the House and 6 Republicans and 1 Progressive in the Senate voted for the Clayton bill—the second of our antitrust measures, the conference report on which we shall adopt within an hour.

Democracy, with its high ideals and righteous devotion to duty, was not content with its superior record, based solely on the great constructive measures just mentioned, and for which so many Republicans and Progressives voted, but to satisfy itself and promote the welfare of the people, with patient toil and unflagging energy, it effected many other reforms sweeping in nature and salutary in results.

INCOME TAX.

In connection with the Underwood Tariff Act this administration passed and put into effect an income-tax law. Under the operation of this statute the wealthy and well to do pay into the Treasury every year a hundred million dollars in taxes on their enormous incomes, which formerly went scot free. Under Republican rule this gigantic sum was raised by means of a tariff on food and clothing, which were largely consumed by the plain people. Under Democratic law this hundred-million-dollar burden has been shifted from the poor man's bending back to the broad shoulders of those whose net incomes are in excess of $3,000 per year. What law could be more popular than this? What measure could be more just? What statute could more effectually lighten the load of those who struggle for their daily bread? If the people approve of this reform, let them go to the polls on November 3 and, by voting the Democratic ticket, say that this income-tax law shall never be repealed.

PENSIONS.

For years and years the Republican Party loudly professed its friendship for the old soldiers and for more than a quarter of a century profusely promised to enact laws that would provide reasonable compensation for the veterans of the Civil War; but immediately after each recurring election this boasted friendship lost its ardor, the promise was repudiated, and the veteran forgotten. Notwithstanding the fact that the Republican Party has had control of the Federal Government for more than 40 of the 50 years that have elapsed since the War between the States, it remained for the Democratic House in 1912 to pass the Sherwood bill, the most liberal pension law that was ever enacted, and under which thousands of veterans have obtained just and generous increases in their pensions. The Democratic House of the Sixty-second Congress passed the Sulloway dollar-a-day bill, but the Republican Senate proved unwilling to give the soldier the relief he deserved and killed the bill.

As a further indication of the Democratic Party's sincere concern for the welfare of those who defend their country's honor in time of war, attention is called to the Key bill, which has already been passed by the Democratic House, and which is now pending in the Senate. This bill provides pensions for the widows and orphans of veterans of the Spanish-American War.

PARCEL POST.

To the Democratic Party should be given practically all the credit for the enactment of the parcel-post law. The vital section of the bill providing this reform was prepared with infinite labor by the distinguished Democratic gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LEWIS]. It was the Democratic House of 1912 that passed this bill and gave it such strong support and created so much sentiment in its favor that the Republican Senate found it expedient to join the progressive Democratic Party in giving the people this legislative boon. It was the present administration, Democratic in all its branches, that developed the parcel post into such an active and effective competitor of the great express companies of the country that they have been compelled to make sweeping reductions in their former exorbitant rates and to do business on a competitive basis. Thus the express monopoly joins the ever-increasing and rapidly moving procession of economic evils that is disappearing from the face of the earth.

On August 15, 1913, the Post Office Department increased the weight limit of parcel-post packages from 11 to 20 pounds and reduced the then prevailing rates; on January 1, 1914, the weight limit was increased from 20 to 50 pounds and another substantial reduction in the rates was made. By virtue of the parcel-post law one can ship a pound package 150 miles for 5 cents, and 10 pounds the same distance for 14 cents. It was largely on account of the revenue-producing power of this law that the efficient Democratic Postmaster General was enabled so to operate the Post Office Department that it earned and paid into the Federal Treasury last fiscal year a surplus of $3,800,000. It is now estimated that this year's surplus will exceed $15,000,000. Let the critics who charge us with inability to conduct the Government successfully remember that every year since 1883, with the exception of last year, the Post Office Department showed a deficit, and that it was a Democratic administration that transformed the deficit into a surplus and firmly established this department of the Federal Government on a paying basis.

ELECTION OF UNITED STATES SENATORS BY DIRECT VOTE.

Democracy points with profound pride and supreme satisfaction to the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution providing for the election of United States Senators by direct vote of the people. As early as the year 1900 the Democratic Party in national convention assembled declared in favor of this reform, and in each succeeding national convention it in substance reaffirmed the declaration, while the Republican Party in national convention as late as the year 1908 rejected a declaration in favor of this amendment by a vote of almost 7 to 1. Through the efforts of the Democratic Party it is at last a part of the fundamental law of the land that no one can be a United States Senator until after the voters of his State have by ballot declared in his favor.

With the election of its members in the hands of the people the United States Senate ceases to be a sepulcher for the burial of reform legislation; in the future that body will be responsive to the popular will; it will represent our business as well as big business; it will work as industriously for mankind as it formerly worked for monopolies.

LOBBY INVESTIGATION.

Since a time that antedates the memory of this generation the people have suspected that powerful interests were maintaining paid agents at Washington to obtain class legislation and prevent the enactment of reformatory laws. While the Underwood tariff bill was pending in Congress the President publicly announced that an insidious lobby was infesting the Capital and endeavoring by foul means to shape the course of tariff legislation. Following this announcement special committees appointed by the Senate and House for the purpose made a sweeping investigation which proved conclusively that the alleged lobby actually existed; that it had existed from time immemorial; that its activities were nefarious and its purposes pernicious. It was further proved that this lobby not only exerted a powerful and evil influence against the enactment of progressive measures but that the protected interests that maintained this lobby were actively engaged in politics for the purpose of defeating candidates who were unfriendly to class legislation. By virtue of its thorough investigation the Democratic administration consigned the lobbyist to perpetual banishment. The place that knew him once knows him no more, and Congress now frames laws in the interest of all the people, free from the blighting influences of the iniquitous third house. Thus the usurping, intangible, and invisible influences over our Federal Government have perished and the visible processes of legislation have been fully restored.

PEACE TREATIES.

Our Secretary of State, the greatest living apostle of peace, has been diligently negotiating treaties with all the important countries of the world, embodying the administration's plans and principles of diplomatic postponement as an integral feature of international law. The sole object of these treaties is to divest international difficulties of their inflammable and warlike characteristics. So far 26 of these treaties have been ratified and put into operation; 10 other countries, including the leading powers of the Old World, have announced their acceptance of the principles of these treaties and their willingness to conclude and ratify these pacific agreements with this Government as soon as certain matters of detail have been agreed upon. A difficulty between this and any other nation with which we have effected one of these treaties is assured of a full year's calm and dispassionate consideration before either of the nations to the controversy can declare war against the other. There is practically no great war of the past that would not have been prevented by a year's deliberation. By affording abundant time for the inflamed passions of the people to subside and for reason to resume its sway, these treaties will hasten the dawn of an era of "peace on earth, good will toward men."

DOLLAR DIPLOMACY.

Under the old Republican régime, when the Money Trust made a loan to a foreign power or its subjects it was tacitly understood that in the event of the debtor's default this Government would enforce payment of the loan by warlike means and at public expense. By way of abolishing a peculiar species of indefensible special privilege this administration has abandoned the Republican policy of having the Government act as high sheriff for the benefit and protection of our international lenders of money. Democracy believes that while it is discharging its first duty of protecting the taxpayers of the Nation the Money Trust is amply able to protect itself. The Democratic Party is friendly to every legitimate business, whether great or small; but it can not befriend or favor any particular business at the expense of all the people. The Democratic Party becomes hostile to big business when, and only when, by unfair practices and unlawful means it attempts to destroy its competitors in order to establish a monopoly upon their ruins.

ECONOMY IN NAVAL CONSTRUCTION.

The Democratic Secretary of the Navy, as a new departure, forced the armor-plate manufacturers to submit competitive bids for the contract to furnish the armor plate, iron, and steel used in the construction of what is known as battleship No. 39 at a saving to the Government of more than $2,000,000. This is the administration's latest application of the proverbial wisdom, "A dollar saved is a dollar gained."

FARMERS AND LABORERS.

Realizing that the farmers and laborers of a country are the producers of its wealth and the mainstays of its prosperity, and further realizing that they have heretofore failed to receive the governmental assistance and legislative protection they have always deserved, the present administration has recently made full reparation for 16 years of Republican neglect of these two great classes of citizens by giving them prompt and adequate relief.

For the benefit of labor we have passed a law establishing an eight-hour day for all female employees in the District of Columbia.

For the benefit of labor and to remedy a defect in preexisting law we have passed the dredge workers' bill, which establishes an eight-hour day for those doing dredging work in the improvement of our rivers and harbors.

For the benefit of labor we have inserted in the fortifications bill a provision which establishes an eight-hour day for civilians engaged in the manufacture of powder and ordnance to be used by the Government.

For the benefit of labor we provided in the Post Office appropriation bill for an eight-hour day for post-office clerks and letter carriers.

For the benefit of labor we provided in the naval appropriation bill that all coal purchased for the use of our Navy shall have been mined by those working an eight-hour day.

For the benefit of labor we have enacted the Children's Bureau law to promote and safeguard the interest of little children.

For the benefit of labor, as well as for the employer of labor, we have enacted the Industrial Commission law, which provides for an investigation of the entire subject of industrial relations, to the end that the best methods of dealing with and settling industrial disputes may be ascertained and adopted.

For the benefit of labor, as well as for the employer of labor and the public at large, we have enacted a law amending the Erdman Act, which provides for mediation, conciliation, and arbitration in controversies between employer and employees. This amended law afforded the means by which the President succeeded in preventing the threatened eastern railway strike in 1913, which involved 54 railroads and more than 80,000 of their laborers, by effecting an adjustment acceptable to the railroads and satisfactory to their employees. By virtue of this same law the President this year prevented an industrial strike involving the western railroads and their employees. The great benefits resulting from this new method of adjusting and settling controversies between capital and labor are second only to the advantages arising from the settlement of international disputes by arbitration instead of by war.

Into the second of the administration's antitrust laws we have written a new bill of rights for labor and agricultural organizations not conducted for profit, the effect of which is to declare to the world that the members of labor organizations and farmers' associations are not chattels or commodities or even unlawful conspirators, as some Federal courts, under the authority of Republican Federal laws, have declared them to be; but, on the contrary, that they are, under Democratic legislation, free American citizens, entitled to every right and privilege and immunity that was ever conceived by the mind of man for his own protection and preservation.

For the benefit of the farmer we inserted a provision in the new Federal reserve act authorizing national banks to lend money on the security of farm land and to rediscount farmers' notes that are based on staple agricultural products. Under the provisions of this act the sum of $500,000,000 is made available for the promotion and development of agriculture.

For the benefit of the farmer various bills have been introduced in the House, providing for the establishment of a nation-wide rural-credit system to be controlled by the Federal Government. It is now practically assured that the most desirable of these bills will be selected and enacted into law by the Sixty-third Congress before final adjournment next March.

For the benefit of the farmer we have provided $500,000 for the eradication of hog cholera, a disease for which the Government has discovered a preventive as well as a cure. This disease in 1913 caused the death of more than 6,000,000 hogs, valued at $65,000,000, and these hogs, if saved, would have added 35 pounds per family to the Nation's meat supply.

For the benefit of the farmer we have created the Office of Markets in the Department of Agriculture, which, in the future, by providing the means of distributing farm products directly to the consumer, will save the farmer much that formerly went into the middleman's pocket.

For the benefit of the farmer the House has passed the Shackleford good roads bill, which makes an initial appropriation of $25,000,000 to be expended in cooperation with the various State governments in building and maintaining good roads. It is confidently predicted that this bill will be passed by the Senate and become a law before the adjournmert of the next session of Congress.

For the benefit of the farmer the Democratic Secretary of the Treasury a year ago deposited $50,000,000 of the Government's money in the banks of the South and West to be used in moving the Nation's grain and food supply to eastern markets. The same action was taken again this year, and it will be taken again in the future as often as circumstances may render it necessary, provided the Democratic Party continues to control the Government. Under Republican rule when money was needed for the movement of crops in the agricultural sections of the country the Government met the demand by placing Treasury funds in the hands of the New York bankers, who in turn lent them to the farmers of the South and West at ruinous rates of interest. Under Republican manipulation the Government received no interest on this money, while the New York banker collected a heavy tribute from the farmer for the use of the funds that belonged to the people. The new Democratic way is to lend the money directly to the bankers of those sections which are in need of aid at a low rate of interest, which is paid into the Federal Treasury for the benefit of all, thus eliminating the speculative features of the transaction which formerly inured to the benefit of the New York money broker and left the farmer at his mercy.

For the benefit of the farmer we have passed the Lever agricultural extension law, which will literally bring the agricultural college, the experiment station, and the Federal Department of Agriculture to the door of every farmer in the land. This law makes it possible for farmers' wives and daughters to learn the fundamentals of domestic science and home economics under their own roof. It provides the means for making rural life so comfortable and attractive that the next great shifting of our population will be from the overcrowded cities "back to the farm." If the farmers and laborers are prospering under the laws we have enacted for their protection; if they are thriving under the measures we have adopted for their relief; if they are enjoying the fruits of their toil by reason of the administration's maintenance of the nation's peace, they are solicited to show their appreciation on election day by voting to continue the Democratic Party in power.

THE PANIC BOGY.

Ever since the passage of the Underwood tariff bill big business, stand-pat newspapers, and Republicans politicians have made a desperate concerted effort to plunge the country into a panic for the purpose of discrediting the Democratic Party. The gentlemen on the other side of the House have preached the gospel of political pessimism with the industry of beavers and the zeal of fanatics. They have told us much that was false about the low prices of the farmers' products and much that was fallacious about the ruinous effects of foreign competition. When a factory has closed, even for repairs, Republicans have rejoiced; when business has prospered they have mourned; when a new industry has been established they have wept.

The Member from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY] in particular has for several months past been in a state of chronic oratorical eruption; he has torn innumerable passions to infinite tatters; he has afflicted the House with what Samuel Johnson called "that querulous eloquence that sees every city laid with a siege like that of Jerusalem; that makes famine attend on every flight of locusts and suspends pestilence on the wings of every blast that issues from the south." He has become so anxious to discredit the Democratic administration and so eager to bring about the election of a Republican Congress that in order to accomplish his purposes he would assassinate the prosperity of his country.

With his wheat selling for $1.25 a bushel we are informed that the farmer is embarrassed; with an insatiable demand at unprecedented prices for everything he has for sale we are told that he is distressed; with Providence lavishly blessing him with bountiful crops and abundant harvests, with prosperity smiling upon him everywhere, we are told by these political croakers and calamity howlers that the farmer is on the brink of disaster and the verge of desolation. Fortunately specific facts are at hand with which to dispel Republican fiction.

With wool on the free list, the farmers have received from 4 to 8 cents more per pound for their wool this year than they received a year ago under the highest Republican tariff law that was ever enacted.

A comparison of the prices of a few of the leading farm products as of the first week in March, 1913 and 1914, from a compilation made by the United States Department of Labor and the Chicago Inter Ocean, shows the following in favor of this year's prices over those of a year ago:

Corn advanced 14½ cents per bushel.
Oats advanced 5½ cents per bushel.
Potatoes advanced 22½ cents per bushel.
Hogs advanced 20 cents and cattle 75 cents on the 100 pounds.

Under such eminently satisfactory conditions as those now existing the farmer will not run the risk of making a change of Government officials, but on the contrary they will wisely provide for a continuation of their prosperity by voting the Democratic ticket on election day.

We have been warned that those who live by toil are idle, and that a large proportion of the laborers of the land are begging their bread. A little while ago we were threatened with a second invasion of the unemployed, under command of Gen. Coxey. It was predicted that on the general's second march to Washington he would bring with him a hundred thousand idle men. The event proved to be a mournful commentary upon the prediction, and a deserved rebuke to the Republican prophets of evil, for when that vast army reached the east steps of the Capitol we were amazed to find that its total strength consisted of Gen. Coxey, his wife, his son, and seven men and a jackass.

If the extent to which laborers are unemployed may be measured by the Coxey demonstration, we are justified in assuming that the workmen of the country are enjoying prosperity in unlimited proportions.

We would remind our Republican friends that they have had the same exclusive monopoly on panics and depressions that they have had on capitalistic combinations. There have been three disastrous panics since the Republican Party was born. The first was the panic of 1873, which came almost in the middle of a period of 25 years, during which the Republicans were in absolute control of every department of the Federal Government. There had been no Democratic administration for 13 years before that panic, and there was none for 11 years after it, so that panic was the legitimate child of the Republican Party.

The next in order was the panic of 1893, which came a few months after the inauguration of a Democratic President, but while the McKinley high-tariff law was still in effect, before a single Republican law had been repealed and before a single Democratic law had been enacted, and it came, on the admission of eminent Republican authority, from natural causes that were world-wide and in operation long before the election of a Democratic President. So panic No. 2 is not chargeable to the Democratic Party.

The next panic, and the most crushing one that has ever been recorded in the history of any country, was that of 1907 and 1908, when every department of the Government had been in the hands of the Republicans for full 10 years, and 5 years before a Democratic administration began. So panic No. 3 was a Republican panic exclusively, for which the party of high protection and special privilege must bear the total blame.

Recently our Republican friends have prayed for a panic; they have wished for famine; they have longed for depression; they have even hoped for war.

But with the new currency law in operation there will be no panic. There is no famine, there is no depression, and while Woodrow Wilson is in the White House and William Bryan is in the Cabinet we shall have no war.

Mr. MADDEN. Then why a war tax? [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. NEELY of West Virginia. If the gentleman will get me additional time, I shall be glad to enlighten that side of the House as to the war tax. Until checked by the irresistible effect of the European struggle, this country was rapidly moving toward an era of prosperity unparalleled in our national history.

Our business has been deeply depressed and the cost of living has been greatly increased as a result of the terrible conflict that is raging beyond the sea; but we shall soon adjust ourselves to the new conditions abroad; we shall direct our energies into new channels, win for ourselves new laurels, and enter upon a period of prosperity more resplendent than any of the golden ages of the past.

MEXICO—WAR AND PEACE.

The adoption of a simple policy of peace by the President and his great Secretary of State stands out conspicuously as the crowning achievement of this administration. It is an achievement more salutary than any statute, more beneficial than any law.

On assuming control of the Federal Government the Democratic administration inherited from its Republican predecessor the responsibility of terminating a reign of terror and bringing order out of chaos in our sister Republic south of the Rio Grande. Mexico was a veritable inferno of insurrection. Warfare was raging all over that distracted country with the fierceness and fury of barbarism. It was a war of extermination, in which brother was arrayed against brother, son against father, and father against son.

The Mexicans became so regardless of the rights of our citizens and so insolent in their conduct toward this Nation that a great clamor was raised by unthinking people for this Government to declare war against the wretched, bleeding people of Mexico. Indeed, in April of this year popular feeling ran so high that it became apparent that a declaration of war by the Congress against Mexico would meet with almost unanimous approval. In the hour of excitement even women and children were voicing the popular sentiment and repeating the battle cry of 1847, "On to Mexico!" Temporarily the Nation lost its reason, and our excited imaginations painted pictures of "camps and sieges and battles" and the triumphs and glories of military pageantry in all the vivid and alluring colors of the rainbow's hues. We seemed to hear the boisterous drumbeat and the martial notes of the wild, weird music of war. The inspiring strains of the silver-tongued bugle called us forth to the field of muster; we saw the red and the white and the blue of the Stars and Stripes enshrined in a halo of glory. The flag seemed to plead with us to carry it again to the heights of Chapultepec, where Gen. Scott's victorious army had hoisted it six and a half decades before. We felt some superhuman agency within urging us to go forth to slay our fellow men upon the field of battle.

If we had had an impulsive man or an ambitious military genius for President at that critical time, we would now be at war with Mexico and would have an invading army upon Mexican soil and a fleet of bombarding battleships in every Mexican port. At this moment thousands of our bravest and best would be sleeping in unmarked graves and worms would be feeding on their remains; thousands of others would be languishing in hospitals with their bodies mangled and bleeding, their limbs torn away by merciless shot and shell. Every home from which a loved and loving husband, father, brother, or son had gone, never to return, would have been filled with sorrow and gloom. Thousands of homes would be desolate; thousands of homes would have their "vacant chair."

At the end of such a war the Treasury would have been empty, the national debt would have been multiplied manyfold, the land would have been filled with widows and orphans who would have watered the soil with their tears, cripples on crutches would have been hobbling everywhere, business would have been prostrated, industry destroyed, and the jeweled hand upon the golden dial of progress would have been turned back a hundred years. Thrice and four times happy should we be that in this crisis the United States had Woodrow Wilson for its President—a friend to right, a foe to wrong, a lover of peace, a hater of war. Calmly, confidently, and courageously he held his head above the waves, until at last, by patience and persistence, through "watchful waiting," that is admittedly better than world-wide war, the usurping dictator, Victoriani Huerta, has been forced to flee from Mexico; his barbarous rule has ended, his blood-stained power has vanished, his reign of terror is over; the day is breaking and the sun of promise is once more rising with healing in his wings to guide the class-ridden and oppressed Mexican people toward prosperity, plenty, and peace.

A little while ago Republican politicians were clamoring for a vigorous Mexican policy and criticizing the Democratic administration for its moderation. But recent developments abroad have not only demonstrated the wisdom of the President's Mexican policy, but they have also proved that the international equilibrium was so delicately balanced that the assassination of an archduke and his consort was sufficient to drive half the world insane and put 10,000,000 soldiers at each other's throats. Meditate for a moment on the indescribable horrors of the war in Europe; think of the millions that are being crushed under the iron heel of militarism; think of civilization's remorseless return to medieval barbarism; reflect on all these things and then point out the man who does not devoutly thank his God for an administration that saved this country from the horrors and the woes of war.

If some ruthless political vandal could wipe out the Democratic tariff law, expunge the Democratic anti-trust laws, and disentitle us to all credit for the relief we have afforded the country through wise legislation, and yet leave to the people the Democratic administration's priceless policy of peace, for that heritage alone they would manifest their gratitude and provide for their future safety by electing a Democratic Congress to do their bidding for two more years.

WAR MEASURE.

The expenses of operating the Government are paid by revenue largely derived from duties on imported goods. The greater part of our imports come from those European countries which are now engaged in a disastrous war. As a result of this war our importations have declined to such an extent that during the next year we shall fail to collect more than a hundred million dollars in import duties that would certainly have been paid into the Treasury had normal conditions prevailed abroad. In these circumstances the administration was compelled to provide means for raising by internal taxation a sum equal to that we are about to lose by reason of the falling off of our custom receipts. We were confronted by an unfortunate situation, for which we were in nowise responsible, but which left us no choice as to our action.

The House promptly performed its patriotic duty by passing a "war measure," which will soon be acted upon by the Senate and become a law, and under the operation of which we shall raise about a hundred million dollars of additional revenue and fully protect the Treasury against the deficit in customs receipts. This measure is similar to the Spanish-American War measure, prepared and passed by the Republicans 15 years ago.

In their vain and desperate search for a campaign issue the Republican leaders are charging that the shortage in revenue is a result of the Underwood tariff law, and that there would have been no deficit if the Payne-Aldrich law had continued in force.

Indisputable facts are available to disarm Republican criticism and disprove Republican charges. From the time the Underwood tariff law went into effect until the end of the fiscal year 1914 it produced an aggregate of customs and income-tax receipts averaging $26,900,000 per month, as compared with an average of $26,600,000 per month that was raised under the Payne-Aldrich tariff law during the last year of its operation, or an average increase in favor of the Democratic law of $300,000 per month. In the face of these facts no one will honestly contend that the $100,000,000 we are seeking to raise by the so-called "war tax" is the result of any imperfections in the operation of the Underwood tariff law. It should be remembered that the Underwood tariff law made a reduction in the Republican tariff averaging almost $6 per capita. This new war measure simply has the effect of relevying one-sixth of the per capita tax the Democratic Party formerly abolished; thus the average consumer of the country will pay $5 less tariff per year with the new war measure in effect than he paid under the Republican Payne-Aldrich law. All reasonable men will commend the Democratic Party for the action it has taken to preserve the Nation's credit and protect the United States Treasury against a loss occasioned by the European war.

Instead of bemoaning the fact that a hundred million dollars additional revenue has to be raised because of the ravages of a war 3,000 miles away, our pessimistic Republican friends should be returning thanks to Almighty God for the wisdom and statesmanship of Woodrow Wilson and the Democratic Party, which have saved this Nation from a war at home and spared us the expenditure of untold millions of dollars and the loss of innumerable lives.

PARTY RECORD.

We submit to all fair and impartial people the record of this administration's achievements and make bold to assert that it has no model, no parallel, and no approach in the entire history of civilization. The Democratic Party has in 18 months restored the Government to the people's hands. The value of this service can not be estimated by any known process of mathematical calculation, and can not be expressed in human terms.

By virtue of Democratic legislation the people are now in charge of the currency system; through Democratic Representatives the people have made for their own use and protection a tariff law; through Democratic Representatives and for their own benefit they have made innumerable other laws.

The Democratic Party found the legislative power in servitude to the trusts; it has emancipated the servant and made the master amenable to law; it found the Government in captivity to the special interests; it has set the captive free, and it is now for the voters to say whether the Government shall continue to enjoy its freedom or be again enslaved. In a little while the people will exercise the high privilege and discharge the patriotic duty of choosing from one of the two old parties their Representatives for the next two years. The choice is of vast importance, for its result will determine whether this Government shall be by and in the interest of a few or by and for the benefit of all. There is the old stand-pat Republican Party, so antiquated that millions of progressive men have deserted it and no new recruit can be induced to join it. The masses of the Republican Party are patriotic, honest, and sincere, but through the self-aggrandizement, the inefficiency, the ambition, and the greed of its leaders it has lost its power to do good.

Through its partnership with the tariff barons and the trusts it has become antagonistic to the best interests of the common people who once supported it and made it invincible. Now its only advocate is a subsidized press; its votaries are the special interests and its flatterers the trusts for whose sole benefit it has run counter to public opinion, repudiated every holy tradition, and sacrificed every fundamental of popular government. It is the party of Aldrich and Cannon and Penrose and Barnes. Top-heavy with bosses, infested by factions, and torn with strife, the Republican Party trembles on the brink of the grave.

Speaking of graves and kindred subjects, a few days ago the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN]—and he is "distinguished," and in brains a head and shoulders above any other man in his party, but unfortunately he is a reactionary—referred to the proceedings in this House as the funeral services of the Democratic Party. I remind my friend that the Democratic Party is the oldest undertaker on this continent. [Laughter.] It began to bury political parties a hundred years ago, and it is still doing business at the same old stand. [Applause on the Democratic side.] In the words of George R. Wendling, a great man, the Democratic Party buried the Whig Party, the Democratic Party buried the Free Soil Party, the Democratic Party buried the Greenback Party, and on the 3d day of November the old Republican Party will die, unrepenting, unforgiven, and unredeemed; and on account of the peculiar condition of the corpse we will perform the funeral ceremony without delay. This will be a funeral without music, without mourners, without flowers, and with no resurrection of the body. [Laughter on the Republican side.] We will carve on the rude slab that marks your resting place these words, "The wicked run well for a season, but they shall be cut off, and that without remedy."

On the other hand, the voters are invited to let their weary eyes repose on the old Democratic Party—the oldest party in existence; the party "that never sold the truth to serve the hour"; the party that has remained true to its traditions and its ideals, whether in the morning of victory or in the midnight of disaster and defeat. Since the day of its birth it has guarded the rights of the common people as the shepherd guards his sheep. The Democratic Party is the party of patriotism and principle, the party of Jefferson and Jackson, the party of Underwood and Clark, the party of Wilson and Bryan. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The Republican Party has stood for a protective tariff tax to be paid by the consuming many for the benefit of the favored few; Democracy says take the protection off and let the consumer purchase an article for what it is worth and without paying tribute to any trust. The Republican Party has permitted the monopolies to run the Government and the predatory interests to rule the land. Democracy demands that the people shall run their own Government and rule themselves. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Democracy demands that the people from whom this Government derives its every just power, that the people who pay the Government's taxes and bear its burdens in time of peace, that the people who meet the bayonet charge and shed their blood for their country in time of war—Democracy demands that these shall rule; that they shall enjoy their rights perpetually, and that their liberties shall never end. Between now and election day let the voters of the land rekindle every patriotic fire, and with their faces radiant in the light of the holy flame, with their minds filled with sacred memories and their hearts filled with sublime emotions, let them march in solid phalanx to the ballot box and say by their votes that this administration's principles and policies shall not perish from the earth. Let them say that for the next two years Woodrow Wilson shall be supported by a Democratic Congress that will hold up his hands and make possible the completion of all his reforms.

In this awful time of world-wide trouble, when thrones are tottering, when kingdoms are trembling, and when monarchies are being swept away, let the people say by their votes that they will stand by the President valiantly and faithfully while he makes this Republic the light of the world and brings this Government more nearly into harmony with all the precepts of the Prince of Peace. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from West Virginia has expired.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. IGOE].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. IGOE] is recognized.

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD upon this bill and other legislation.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. IGOE] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD upon this bill and other legislation. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, I shall not object to this one request, but I give notice that I shall object to more requests to insert remarks in the RECORD and political speeches until that right is given in some way to everybody, or until gentlemen have the opportunity for really talking on the floor. I really want to hear the cotton debate.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

Mr. WEBB. I yield one-half minute to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BOOHER].

Mr. BOOHER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Because of the notice I just gave, I object.

Mr. BOOHER. I am very sorry the gentleman objects.

Mr. BORLAND. I understand that unanimous consent has been given to gentlemen to extend their remarks on this bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman so understands it.

Mr. BOOHER. My remarks are not intended to be on this bill, or I should have so stated.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. MANN. For the reason stated I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois objects.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BUCHANAN].

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, when this bill shall have become a law the wage earners of our country will have reason to rejoice. [Applause on the Democratic side.] It will be equivalent to a renewal of the Declaration of Independence in part, especially so far as it affects the freedom of speech, the freedom of the press, and freedom of assembly.

Some gentlemen who are opposing this bill seem to fear that this does not give the laborers of the country what they desire and what they have asked for so many years. I believe those who know the president of the American Federation of Labor and its executive council believe that they have some intelligence, and I believe that Samuel Gompers, the president of the American Federation of Labor, is one of the most intellectually brilliant men of my acquaintance, a man who is loyal to principle and whose fidelity to the cause of labor can not be questioned.

The president of the American Federation of Labor, in an editorial in the Federationist, after quoting in large type that part of the amendment that was put on to section 7 in the Senate—claims that this was a most momentous victory when on September 2 the Senate passed the Clayton antitrust bill. He adds, further, that the opening statement of this section of the bill gives it strength and virility; and after summing up the amendments to what was old section 18, and which I believe is now section 20, he speaks approvingly of them. I believe he has not only the intelligence but the experience which entitles him to pass judgment upon these provisions, because as a result of the usurpation of judicial power in the issuance of injunctions and in the trial of alleged contempts he has faced imprisonment. And not only does he speak from his own experience, but he and his associates have had the benefit of the ablest counsel whom they could secure, and those able attorneys have also had experience in defending them against injunction and contempt proceedings. Therefore it seems to me that they are in a position to know whether or not this gives American workingmen the protection they have sought for so many years.

In 1906, Mr. Speaker, the labor unions of the country presented what was known at that time as "the bill of grievances," addressed to the President of the United States, the President of the Senate, and the Speaker of the House, as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., March 21, 1906.

Hon. THEODORE ROOSEVELT,
President of the United States;
Hon. WM. P. FRYE,
President pro tempore, United States Senate;
Hon. JOSEPH G. CANNON,
Speaker House of Representatives, United States.

GENTLEMEN: The undersigned executive council of the American Federation of Labor, and those accompanying us in the presentation of this document, submit to you the subject matters of the grievances which the workmen of our country feel by reason of the indifferent position which the Congress of the United States has manifested toward the just, reasonable, and necessary measures which have been before it these past several years, and which particularly affect the interests of the working people, as well as by reason of the administrative acts of the executive branches of this Government and the legislation of the Congress relating to these interests. For convenience the matters of which we complain are briefly stated, and are as follows:

The law commonly known as the "eight-hour law" has been found ineffective and insufficient to accomplish the purpose of its designers and framers. Labor has, since 1894, urged the passage of a law so as to remedy the defects, and for its extension to all work done for or on behalf of the Government. Our efforts have been in vain.

Without hearing of any kind granted to those who are the advocates of the eight-hour law and principle, Congress passed and the President signed an appropriation bill containing a rider nullifying the eight-hour law and principle in its application to the greatest public work ever undertaken by our Government, the construction of the Panama Canal.

The eight-hour law in terms provides that those intrusted with the supervision of Government work shall neither require nor permit any violations thereof. The law has been grievously and frequently violated. The violations have been reported to the heads of several departments, who have refused to take the necessary steps for its enforcement.

While recognizing the necessity for the employment of inmates of our penal institutions so that they may be self-supporting, labor has urged in vain the enactment of a law that shall safeguard it from the competition of the labor of convicts.

In the interest of all of our people and in consonance with their almost general demand, we have urged Congress for some tangible relief from the constantly growing evil of induced and undesirable immigration, but without result.

Recognizing the danger of Chinese immigration, and responsive to the demands of the people, Congress years ago enacted an effective Chinese-exclusion law, yet despite the experience of the people of our own country, as well as those of other countries, the present law is flagrantly violated, and now, by act of Congress, it is seriously proposed to invalidate that law and reverse the policy.

The partial relief secured by the laws of 1895 and 1898, providing that seamen shall not be compelled to endure involuntary servitude, has been seriously threatened at each succeeding Congress. The petitions to secure for the seamen equal right with all others have been denied and a disposition shown to extend to other workmen the system of compulsory labor.

Under the guise of a bill to subsidize the shipping industry a provision is incorporated, and has already passed the Senate, providing for a form of conscription which would make compulsory naval service a condition precedent to employment on privately owned vessels.

Having in mind the terrible and unnecessary loss of life attending the burning of the Slocum in the harbor of New York, the wreck of the Rio de Janeiro at the entrance to the Bay of San Francisco, and other disasters on the waters too numerous to mention, in nearly every case the great loss of life was due to the undermanning and the unskilled manning of such vessels, we presented to Congress measures that would, if enacted, so far as human law could do, make impossible the awful loss of life. We have sought this remedy more in the interests of the traveling public than in that of the seamen, but in vain.

Having in mind the constantly increasing evil growing out of the parsimony of corporations, of towing several undermanned and unequipped vessels called "barges" on the high seas, where, in case of storm or stress, they are cut loose, to drift or sink and their crews to perish, we have urged the passage of a law that shall forbid the towing of more than one such vessel unless they shall have an equipment and a crew sufficient to manage them when cut loose and sent adrift, but in vain.

The antitrust and interstate-commerce laws enacted to protect the people against monopoly in the products of labor and against discrimination in the transportation thereof, have been perverted, so far as the laborers are concerned, so as to invade and violate their personal liberty, as guaranteed by the Constitution. Our repeated efforts to obtain redress from Congress have been in vain.

The beneficent writ of injunction intended to protect property rights has, as used in labor disputes, been perverted so as to attack and destroy personal freedom, and in a manner to hold that the employer has some property rights in the labor of the workmen. Instead of obtaining the relief which labor has sought it is seriously threatened with statutory authority for existing judicial usurpation.

The Committee on Labor of the House of Representatives was instituted at the demand of labor to voice its sentiments, to advocate its rights, and to protect its interests. In the past two Congresses this committee has been so organized as to make ineffectual any attempt labor has made for redress. This being the fact, in the last Congress labor requested the Speaker to appoint on the Committee on Labor Members who, from their experience, knowledge, and sympathy, would render in this Congress such service as the committee was originally designed to perform. Not only was labor's request ignored, but the hostile make-up of the committee was accentuated.

Recently the President issued an order forbidding any and all Government employees, upon the pain of instant dismissal from the Government service, to petition Congress for any redress of grievances or for any improvement in their condition. Thus the constitutional right of citizens to petition must be surrendered by the Government employee in order that he may obtain or retain his employment.

We present these grievances to your attention because we have long, patiently, and in vain waited for redress. There is not any matter of which we have complained but for which we have, in an honorable and lawful manner, submitted remedies. The remedies for these grievances proposed by labor are in line with fundamental law, and with the progress and development made necessary by changed industrial conditions.

Labor brings these its grievances to your attention because you are the Representatives responsible for legislation and for failure of legislation. The toilers come to you as your fellow citizens, who, by reason of their position in life, have not only, with all other citizens, an equal interest in our country, but the further interest of being the burden bearers, the wage earners of America. As labor's representatives we ask you to redress these grievances, for it is in your power so to do.

Labor now appeals to you, and we trust that it may not be in vain. But if perchance you may not heed us, we shall appeal to the conscience and the support of our fellow citizens.

Very respectfully,

SAMUEL GOMPERS,	DANIEL J. KEEFE,
JAMES DUNCAN,	WM. D. HUBER,
JAMES O'CONNELL,	JOSEPH F. VALENTINE,

Labor's appeals in 1906 to our national administrative and legislative officers were then received with indifference and without redress, and they did not receive favorable consideration until the Democratic Party got control. It has been said that labor now has the legal and constitutional right to do the things the judges are forbidden to enjoin them from doing in this bill, which is true. It has been by the usurpation of power by the judges, perverting the laws, that this legislation has been made necessary. Judges have enjoined the organizations of workers of the country from exercising their legal and constitutional rights through their organizations.

When the Sherman antitrust law of 1890 was under consideration it was admitted that the provisions thereof did not apply to labor unions; but in order to make the bill clear beyond dispute, although he did not think it necessary, Senator Sherman offered and supported the following amendment, which had been proposed by Senator George, of Mississippi:

> This act shall not be construed to apply to any arrangements, agreements, or combinations between laborers made with a view of lessening the number of hours of labor or the increasing of wages, nor to any arrangements, agreements, or combinations among persons engaged in horticulture or agriculture made with a view of enhancing the price of agricultural or horticultural products.

This amendment passed the Senate unanimously, but was subsequently dropped from the bill because in the opinion of those Senators who had charge of the measure it was unnecessary, because under no possible construction would the court include such organizations under the provisions of the act.

The Sherman law was only two years and a few months old when a suit was filed in the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Louisiana, the object of which was to obtain an injunction preventing the defendants, the Workingmen's Amalgamated Council of New Orleans, from further prosecuting a general strike or cessation of labor which had been ordered and carried on by the council. In support of its prayer for the injunction, the bill of complaint stated the strike was operating to restrain interstate commerce.

Two of the defenses offered related to the antitrust law: First, that that law was not applicable to combinations of laborers. Second, that the object of the strike had been to compel employers to employ no laborers except those belonging to the union, which object, if accomplished, would not result in any restraint of interstate commerce.

Both of these defenses were overruled, the presiding judge in overruling the first-named giving utterance to the following significant words:

> I think the congressional debates show that the statute had its origin in the evils of massed capital, but when the Congress came to formulate the prohibition, which is the yardstick for measuring the complainants' rights for the injunction, it expressed it in these words: "Every contract or combination in the form of trust, or otherwise, in restraint of trade or commerce among the several States or with foreign nations is hereby declared to be illegal." The subject had so broadened in the minds of the legislators that the source of the evil was not regarded as material, and the evil in its entirely was dealt with. They made the interdiction include combinations of labor as well as capital; in fact, all combinations in restraint of commerce, without reference to the character of the persons who engaged in them. It is true that this statute had not been much expounded by the judges, but, as it seems to me its meaning, as far as it relates to the sort of combinations to which it is to apply, is manifest, and that it includes combinations which are composed of laborers acting in the interests of labor.

Thus in one of the first cases tried under the antitrust law and in the very first involving the rights of labor to combine, and in spite of the opinions and assurances of the very able Senators that by "no possible construction would the courts include such organizations under the provisions of the act," was the following statement and prediction of Senator Stewart justified:

> The original bill has been very much improved, and one of the great objections has been removed from it by the amendment offered by Senator Sherman (for Senator George), which relieves the class of persons who would have been first prosecuted under the original bill without the amendment.

This statement was made during the consideration of the antitrust law and after the proviso of Senator George, offered by Senator Sherman, referred to above, had been passed by a unanimous vote.

In his annual report, December, 1893, Attorney General Richard Olney, who can hardly be accused of undue prejudice in favor of union labor, severely criticizes this decision in the case of the workingmen's council, although he does not mention it by name, saying that that decision illustrated the perversion of a law from the real purpose of its authors.

The purpose of the so-called exemption features of the Clayton bill is to remedy the antitrust laws by supplying the omission which, when the original was passed, was seen by many to be fraught with danger. Far from being "class legislation," the purpose of this feature of the bill is to prevent class legislation or the application by the courts of this legislation to a class. It is designed to give the combinations of workingmen the same rights that are now accorded to combinations of capital—the right to combine for their mutual interest and to act under that combination, so long as such acts are not accompanied by violence or fraud.

The fact of the matter is that under the perversion rather than the interpretation of the Sherman antitrust law by the Federal courts, that which is held to be law is founded upon neither justice nor common sense. The Federal courts have fallen into that error which places voluntary organizations of working people, organized not for profit but for humanitarian purposes, in the same category with the greedy trusts, corporations, and monopolies which control the products of labor and which speculate in the necessaries of the masses of the people. It is equal to placing human beings and human endeavor in the same scale with a ton of coal, a barrel of flour, or a bolt of cloth.

There was never any intention on the part of the Congress of the United States to include voluntary organizations of workers and labor unions in the Sherman antitrust law, and all that has transpired since the enactment of that law clearly demonstrates the necessity for the enactment of the principles of the Bartlett-Bacon bill, which we have embodied in this measure, as a remedy for the wrongful position in which organized labor has been placed by judicial interpretation and judicial legislation.

Those who value the liberty and the freedom of the wage workers of the country will indorse and support those who have served to make this legislation possible. The right to organize must not be jeopardized. It is necessary for the freedom of the wage workers of our country, whose freedom must be preserved, or a democratic republican Government can not exist. I feel justified in asking the indorsement and support of the workingmen and their friends in my efforts to secure the passage of the important legislation directly affecting labor since being a Member of Congress.

I desire to insert here an editorial by Samuel Gompers, president of the American Federation of Labor, to be found in the March, 1914, number of the American Federationist, and also one in the current number of the same publication:

ANTITRUST LAW ENMESHES LABOR.

[By Samuel Gompers.]

If there was any doubt that the Sherman antitrust law, as interpreted by the courts, threatens the very existence of organized labor, that has been effectually vanquished by the recent action of the Federal grand jury in making an investigation into the affairs of the Allied Printing Trades Council of New York City. Those who have been opposed to the efforts of the American Federation of Labor to secure legislation which would remove labor organizations from the perverted application of the trust law have lost no opportunity to create the impression that the purpose of labor's legislation is to secure legal sanction for acts of violence and destruction. They have ever tried to divert attention from the real significance of the facts as expressed in the opinion of the United States Circuit Court in the case of the Workingmen's Amalgamated Council of New Orleans, which made this plain statement of the menace to organized labor:

"I think the congressional debates show that the statute had its origin in the evils of massed capital; but when the Congress came to formulating the prohibition which is the yardstick for measuring the complainant's right to the injunctiou it expressed it in these words: 'Every contract or combination in the form of a trust or otherwise in restraint of trade or commerce among the several States or with foreign nations is hereby declared to be illegal.' The subject had so broadened in the minds of the legislators that the source of the evil was not regarded as material, and the evil in its entirety is dealt with. They made the interdiction include combinations of labor as well as of capital; in fact, all combinations in restraint of commerce, without reference to the character of the persons who enter into them. It is true this statute has not been much expounded by judges; but, as it seems to me, its meaning, as far as relates to the sort of combinations to which it is to apply, is manifest, and that it includes combinations which are composed of laborers acting in the interests of laborers."

This was the initial endeavor to pervert the application of a law intended to benefit the working people by curbing combinations to increase profits, to manipulate and to speculate in the products of toil.

An opinion emphasizing that prosecution under the Sherman antitrust law was directed against combination, or what labor terms organization, was rendered by the Federal Supreme Court in the Hatters' case. In summing up the reasons for bringing the United Hatters under the terms of the Sherman law the court said:

"That the conspiracy or combination was so far progressed that out of 82 manufacturers of this country engaged in the production of fur hats 70 had accepted the terms and acceded to the demands that the shops should be conducted in accordance, as far as conditions of employment were concerned, with the will of the American Federation of Labor; that the local men demanded of plaintiffs that they should unionize their shop under peril of being boycotted by this combination, which demand defendants declined to comply with; that thereupon the American Federation of Labor, acting through its official organ and through its organizers, declared a boycott."

Now comes this investigation of the organization of the Printing Trades Council of New York and vicinity. It seems that these trades by causing union conditions to prevail generally in the printing shops of the city and by announcing through the union label what work was done under conditions that safeguard the lives, the health, and the welfare of the workers, have incurred the attention of the antiunion publishing house of Doubleday, Page & Co., and that this company complained to the agents of justice. The degree of success which the printing trade organizations attained was their offense in the eyes of complainants and which were laid before the district attorney and by him before the grand jury.

This effort to apply the provisions of the Sherman antitrust law to combinations of workers aims at the very existence of effective organizations. What shall it profit the workers to have an organization that is not effective? And what shall be the fate of the workers without an organization? Can anyone with a mind and a heart, who knows the greed and the brutality of the industrial world, be so inhuman as to desire to strip the workers of their one protection? Would any humane person wish to force each printer or each bookbinder to make his own working agreement with the agents of the great wealthy publishing houses? Does any vainly imagine that the workers could secure any of their claims to justice if they did not have some way of making those claims effective? Few employers look upon industry as an economic laboratory for evolving principles of economic justice. Unorganized workers toil under conditions that destroy health, exhaust the working power, and make inroads upon the reserve forces. Organization of the working people is necessary not only for their progress and conservation, but for the welfare of the whole Nation.

Not only have combinations or organizations on the part of the workers been considered crime, but certain methods of attaining the normal, laudable purposes of the organization have been proscribed. At some time or other the Federal courts have assumed the right to declare illegal and criminal all the normal, necessary, beneficial, and protective activities of the officials and members of labor organizations. Free workingmen have been told that although each one has a legal right to stop work for any reason or for no reason, that when a number of them agree for their common protection to do that which they have a lawful and natural right to do their action becomes a conspiracy.

In order to hold the activities of the organized workers illegal it has been necessary to evolve a peculiar legal theory—although certain acts are deemed legal when performed by one person, by some legal legerdemain they become illegal when done by more than one.

Although labor organizations have been declared by courts "not only lawful, but highly beneficial," legal proceedings have been instituted against its members and agents for distributing strike funds, that workers in revolt against intolerable conditions might have bread for themselves, their wives, and their children; workers have been forbidden to tell or to publish the reasons why they were willing to make a struggle for better conditions.

Let no one think that strikes are undertaken without seriousness and full consciousness of the hardships and the suffering to the striker and those dear to him. Yet it happened in Philadelphia that when sweated workers in the garment trades, after drudging long, weary hours for a pitiful pittance that was insufficient to provide the common decencies of life, asserted their rights as self-respecting free women and struck in order to secure any consideration of their needs and claims to justice there were women who tried to help them because they were heartsick at the misery and exploitation of these needlewomen, and their sense of justice revolted at the wrongs. What was the reward of these unselfish women, concerned about the welfare of their less fortunate sisters? They were proceeded against under the Sherman antitrust law for conspiracy in restraint of trade.

Are the people of these United States willing that human bodies, human minds, and human hearts shall longer be counted as of less value than trade and profits?

Of the creating of trade and profits there is no end; but who among men can heal minds that have been embittered and poisoned by injustice, health that has been wrecked by cruel drudgery, bodies that were not permitted to develop during the growing period?

Wrongs done to human bodies and souls can never be righted. The workers ask legislation that shall enable them to prevent the occurrence of these wrongs. Shall their rights be deemed of less value than property rights?

The men who are said to be interested in the proceedings begun against the printers of New York City have in interviews given to the press called attention to the printing trades label and the circulating of information regarding the attitude of employers toward organized labor. The union label is the proof that work was done under conditions which protect the health and the life of the workers, by workers who have been trained for their work, who have working hours that conserve vitality, and who receive wages that enable them to live like human beings with ideals and aspirations.

The organized workers must choose between two courses. They must either insist upon their standards, which protect the lives and promote the well-being of the workers, use every means to combat poorer standards that prevail under the unfair companies, or they must see better wages, better working conditions replaced by lower wages and poorer conditions. They must force poorer conditions to give way to the better or the poorer will force the better to give place to them.

Organized labor believes that these conditions should prevail. They wish to do all in their power to establish them. Have they not a right to information that shall enable them to spend their wages for articles that have been made under the best conditions obtainable? Each workingman has not the time or the opportunity to get this information for himself. By cooperative effort a natural, easy way has been established to protect the welfare of the workers. It has been effective.

Now, because certain interests hostile to organized labor wish to withhold from the workers the leisure, the working conditions, the wages that are justly due them, shall the trade union label be proscribed as an illegal agency in restraint of trade? Are there those willing to assume the responsibility to deny the right to use of the trade union label? Such an action would restrain trade in goods made under union conditions in order to facilitate trade in goods made under conditions that breed diseases which endanger not only the worker, but all those who use the products they make, and that waste the vitality, the producing power of the people, which is the Nation's greatest wealth.

Denying the right to use the trade-union label is a way of restricting the rights of the workers to full control over their purchasing power. Surely the right to spend his wages in such a way as promotes his best interests is an inherent right of every man, yea, even of every burden bearer of the country.

However the workers may wish to bestow their patronage, it is theirs to bestow. It belongs to no other man.

Patronage is a favor that must be sought and earned. No dealer can command it. No dealer can call it his property—'tis his, 'tis another's, according to the fancy of those who buy. It is a right which each buyer exercises according to his own conceptions and needs. The dealer who receives it is fortunate, but he can not count himself illegally injured when it is withdrawn. Patronage is a personal right, not a property right.

Men of all ages have claimed and exercised the right to boycott for a principle. Our colonial forefathers boycotted English tea and English stamps. The Consumers' League boycotts the products of sweatshops. The United States Post Office boycotts certain publications. The Anti-Saloon League boycotts certain products. Shall those who contribute a necessary work to American industry be denied the right to bestow their patronage in a way that furthers their interests? Why the discrimination?

This question of social and economic justice resolves itself into a clear-cut issue. Shall the rights of the working people, the great masses of the people of the United States, be withdrawn in order to bestow special privileges upon certain employers to assure them profits, however unjustly to their employees their business affairs may be conducted?

That line of action is not the wish of the American people as they declared their desires in the last election. The candidates representing the principles enunciated in the two political platforms which declared in favor of the legislation which the workers demand received 10,412,977 votes, as opposed to the 3,484,974 votes cast for the other big party that refused to indorse labor's demands. Can anyone truthfully declare that the people are not in sympathy with that which the workers demand as necessary for their welfare? The spirit of the age is sympathetic, humane. The people desire the welfare of human beings and seek information how best to promote their purpose.

That which is most urgent, most imperative, is the legislation which the organized-labor movement is seeking—legislation which will safeguard to all the workers those fundamental rights without which they are helpless to maintain their freedom and to protect themselves.

Organized labor makes these demands not only for themselves but for all the workers, aye, for all the people. It is better able to interpret the needs of the workers than is organized capital. The farming interests of the country indorse labor's position. These two elements represent a large and substantial proportion of the Nation. They ask that they be accorded justice by the laws and the courts of the land. They ask that human beings shall no longer be classified in the same category with the things which they produce. They ask that printers, carpenters, hat makers shall not be treated as things, but as men and women with all of the desires, ambitions, feelings of other human beings. This is what they are pressing home upon the consciences of the lawmakers.

This is the principle which is embodied in the Bartlett-Bacon bill, now pending in Congress. The workers of all parts of the country are demanding that the principle of this bill be enacted into law. That demand is founded upon the realization that this legislation is necessary to protect their right to make trade agreements. That demand is a plea for justice. Let those who make the laws for the people give heed to the demand for human rights. The invasion of one right means danger to all rights. Safeguarding this right means that all other rights shall be safer. Organized labor will be satisfied with nothing but full recognition of the principle for which it has been contending. It now appeals to the hearts, minds, and sense of justice of the lawmakers.

LABOR NOT A COMMODITY.

[By Samuel Gompers.]

This great principle is about to be established as a law of our land: "The labor of a human being is not a commodity or an article of commerce." The fight which the workers of America have waged for that principle with unfailing persistence and determination resulted in a momentous victory when, on September 2, the Senate passed the Clayton antitrust bill.

The Senate Judiciary Committee reported the bill with some amendments. None of these materially modified the labor sections of the bill except the amendment striking out the clause of section 18 which provided for the right to picket. When the labor sections were under discussion Senator CUMMINS offered a substitute for section 7 of the bill, which contained a definite declaration of the meaning of labor power, and provided for the right of existence and operation of labor organizations, limitation and regulation of the issuance of injunctions, the right to picket and to withhold or bestow patronage, the right of peaceful assemblage. But the substitute omitted one important feature contained in the Clayton bill as reported by the Senate Judiciary Committee and was thereupon defeated. But the declaration of a fundamental principle contained in Senator CUMMINS's substitute was then proposed by the Judiciary Committee on the floor of the Senate in this language:

"The labor of a human being is not a commodity or an article of commerce."

Section 7 as passed by the Senate is as follows:

"That the labor of a human being is not a commodity or article of commerce. Nothing contained in the antitrust laws shall be construed to forbid the existence and operation of labor, agricultural, or horticultural organizations, instituted for the purposes of mutual help, and not having capital stock or conducted for profit, or to forbid or restrain individual members of such organizations from lawfully carrying out the legitimate objects thereof, nor shall such organizations, orders, or associations, or the members thereof, be held or construed to be illegal combinations or conspiracies in restraint of trade under the antitrust laws."

The opening statement of this section of the bill gives it strength and virility. This declaration removes all possibility of interpreting trust legislation to apply to organizations of the workers and their legitimate associated activities. This declaration recognizes the essential difference between the labor power of the worker and that which he produces. Governmental regulations, trust laws, may rightfully apply to the products of labor, but they do not rightfully apply to the labor power of a free man. The debates in Congress upon this principle prove most conclusively the broad humanity and desire for human welfare that characterize the minds of the statesmen who enacted this legislation. This principle which for years could find little favor among those in authority is now an accepted principle of industrial freedom. The amendment to section 7 was accepted by the Senate without a dissenting voice.

As a substitute for the picketing clause of section 18 which the Judiciary Committee has stricken out the Senate adopted the following: "Or from attending at any place where such person or persons may lawfully be for the purpose of peacefully obtaining or communicating information." This was also accepted without a dissenting voice. This section of the bill was further strengthened by amending the last clause to read "nor shall any of the acts specified in this paragraph be considered or held to be violations of any law of the United States."

The bill was sent to conference. It is understood that the labor sections of the bill have been agreed to by the conferees, and that an early report is expected upon the bill.

The workers of America have won a great victory for themselves and for all humanity. The principle and the rights incorporated in labor provisions of the Clayton antitrust bill will be the foundation upon which the workers can establish greater liberty and greater opportunity for all those who do the beneficent work of the world.

Mr. Speaker, I would like very much to have the right to extend my remarks in the RECORD, to include other legislation, and to incorporate in my remarks this bill of grievances, because several Members have asked me what it was.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman make that request?

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. I should like to make brief statements in regard to other legislation that has passed Congress.

Mr. MOORE. Reserving the right to object, is that the bill of grievances which was submitted to President Roosevelt?

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. MOORE. Do you intend to incorporate with that the reply that President Roosevelt then made?

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. No; I have not got that. I have no objection to inserting it, if the gentleman will furnish it.

Mr. DONOHOE. Do we not understand that all gentlemen who speak on this proposition have the right to extend their remarks?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Yes.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. I so understand, but I want to put in other matter, in regard to other labor legislation that has passed Congress. I am usually brief, and I shall not take up much space in the RECORD.

Mr. MOORE. I have reserved the right to object, merely to ask the gentleman if he intended to incorporate with that bill of grievances the reply that President Roosevelt made to Mr. Gompers?

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. I have not got it. I do not know what it was.

Mr. MOORE. It ought to be included——

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. I will not object to inserting it if the gentleman will furnish it.

Mr. MOORE. I will not object to the gentleman's request, but I think the President's reply ought to be included, in order to tell the whole story.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I dislike very much indeed to object to the request of my colleague. I wish he could print in the RECORD any statement he wanted to, but for the reason already given I shall object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois objects.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, then I ask to insert this bill of grievances to which I have referred.

Mr. MANN. I think the gentleman has that right under the discussion of this bill.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. KEATING. Suppose a Member of this House in extending his remarks on this bill were to undertake to point out that this was the concluding act of a Democratic legislative program, would the Speaker hold that the Member could not mention the other items of that Democratic legislative program without violating the permission granted to the House?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair thinks he could not.

Mr. KEATING. He would be compelled to confine himself absolutely to the discussion of this one measure, and could not refer to the others?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under the order that would be so, in the opinion of the Chair.

Mr. WEBB. I ask my friend from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD] to use the remainder of his time.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized for eight minutes.

Mr. MANN. Is the gentleman from North Carolina going to conclude in one speech?

Mr. WEBB. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I do not believe that any country in the history of the world ever had such an opportunity as this country now has to develop its own domestic commerce and to increase its foreign commerce. We ought, in my judgment, to be encouraging the production in our own country of many articles for which we are now wholly dependent upon foreign lands. [Applause on the Republican side.] I think we ought to be making our own dyestuffs, our own chemicals, our own medicinal preparations, and that instead of importing silks we ought only to import silk and manufacture it here, and that instead of exporting cotton to be manufactured abroad and then imported to this country from abroad we ought only to export that cotton which is to remain permanently out of this land. [Applause on the Republican side.]

With England, France, Germany, and Russia involved in a great European war, with other countries participating in a lesser degree, so far as numbers are concerned, we have the opportunity now by wise legislation to encourage our own people to build manufacturing institutions, to erect factories and enter upon new enterprises, to make America independent practically of foreign aid in commerce, and to give us an inlet into every foreign commerce with our manufactured articles. But instead of rising to the occasion, instead of understanding the situation, instead of giving encouragement to those who are willing to invest their money in these enterprises, we are doing everything we can to threaten and demoralize trade, to hold the penitentiary over men who invest capital, and to make men fear.

The country to-day is in a condition of fear. We have more currency in circulation than ever before, and less credit. With more money in the land, it is harder to get. It comes through fear largely, through threats of legislation.

Men do not invest in enterprises merely for the love of investment. They hope to make a profit. Without the expectation of reward business is not undertaken. A new factory will never be constructed unless some one believes that there is a chance to make money by it. But we seem to be legislating upon the theory that notwithstanding all that we do to prevent business, business will go on as usual.

Germany extended her foreign trade and increased her home production in a greater degree during a few years than has ever any other country of the world. How did she do it? Not by threatening to put everybody in jail who invested money. She encouraged business. I think it would be a very good time for us, with the world conditions as they are now, to stop trying to hamper business and to legislate so that we may increase our business and add to the prosperity of our land and of our people. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. GRAY].

Mr. GRAY. Mr. Speaker, while it may be true that this bill does not include full and complete provision for adequate relief against trusts, I am convinced that it is an improvement over existing law, and will be more effective to destroy monopoly, so far as it is possible to remedy these evils by regulation. And while I will give my support to this bill as the best obtainable measure for relief at this time by regulation, I confess that I am not optimistic as to the success of this or any antitrust legislation to restore competition and equal opportunity to men in the world of industry and trade.

The greed for wealth and power is never satisfied, and I do not believe that the interests which have organized these combinations will ever submit to regulation or allow this or any other law to be enforced against them. They have become the rivals in power of the Government itself, and they will use the power they have thus acquired to resist all attempts at regulation and control.

We have to-day three general systems of industry of which we know—the competitive system of industry, under which prices are fixed and determined by competition or by the selling rate of the lowest producing factor—the monopolistic system of industry, under which prices are fixed by the arbitrary rule of controlling interests and at the highest point within the ability of the consuming public to pay, or monopoly for the benefit of the especial few; and socialism, or the cooperative system of industry, under which prices are determined by the actual cost of production, or monopoly for the benefit of all the people.

While I favor the competitive system of industry as stimulating individual effort, responsibility, and initiative, yet when all antitrust remedies shall have been exhausted and regulation fails to restore competition and equal opportunity in the industrial world, and when I must choose between private monopoly, for the benefit of the few, and the cooperative system, or monopoly for the benefit of all the people. I will choose cooperation and collective ownership. I will choose monopoly for all the people before I will submit to private monopoly for the exploitation of the masses for the benefit of the few. If trusts and monopolies must exist, let them be operated for the public good and not for selfish gain. If competition can not be restored, let the people own the trusts. [Applause.]

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, has the gentleman from Minnesota used all his time?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota has one minute remaining.

Mr. MANN. How much time has the gentleman from North Carolina?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina has 24 minutes.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I shall not occupy the 24 minutes, but I am glad my friend from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD] has not occupied quite all his time. It is an answer to the criticism of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. NELSON] that this bill has been passed through the House and the Senate in an unfair and partisan manner. I appeal to the gentleman's fairness to say if he ever knew of any measure framed by a party to be passed through both Houses with less partisanship and unfair methods than this trust bill. We allowed 20 hours for debate. We threw the bill wide open for amendment, and the gentleman knows that we accepted amendments from his side of the House with the same frankness that we would have accepted them from this side. As far as I am concerned, the idea of partisanship never entered my mind during the entire consideration of the bill. When it came back to the House on the conference report, if we had desired to shut off debate from the other side we could have done it within an hour or less time. Instead we let you have more time than you actually wanted to use.

Mr. LEVY. Mr. Speaker, will my colleague allow me——

Mr. WEBB. No. I can not yield now.

Mr. LEVY. The gentleman will not give me any time.

Mr. WEBB. So, Mr. Speaker, I believe my Republican friends will agree that this bill has been passed through the House with as little partisanship for its magnitude as any bill has ever been passed through this body. My friend from Wisconsin [Mr. NELSON] complains that we allow in sections 2 and 4, as he says, the selling of articles abroad cheaper than at home. He did not mean to say that, I am sure. We permit the discrimination in price by American manufacturers in foreign countries, but we do not exempt them from the Sherman antitrust law. We have not changed the law at all with reference to foreign sales. I ask my friend if he would deny the American manufacturer the right to sell at different prices to foreign countries, and if he would make it a crime if he did do it? I believe in being fair and frank with ourselves and with the country.

Again, Mr. Speaker, he complains that we put exceptions in the section, and I ask him again if he would put a man in jail who discriminated in price because he sold one man in bulk or one man a better or poorer quality than he sold another? Would he put him in jail for that?

Mr. NELSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. Yes.

Mr. NELSON. Does the gentleman expect me to answer these inquiries?

Mr. WEBB. I would be very glad to have the gentleman answer them if he can do it categorically.

Mr. NELSON. The gentleman will remember that I stated that you pretended to prevent discrimination in price. Now, why was it necessary to suggest all these loopholes?

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I will answer that immediately, by saying that we have not suggested a loophole, but only stated exceptions, which ought to be a defense in any suit for discrimination in price. I ask my friend if he would put a man in jail who discriminated in price under those circumstances; and does he not know that if we had left those exceptions out of this section and a man should be indicted or sued for violating it, he would be able to set up the exceptions as a complete defense in the trial? Of course he could. Yet my friend insists upon putting in criminal penalties leaving those exceptions out. I do not believe that he would vote for such a bill if it were offered him.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. Certainly.

Mr. NELSON. As this was originally drafted, were there not criminal penalties in it?

Mr. WEBB. I just said that there were; but I would not be willing, and neither would my friend, to put a man in jail for discriminating in price because he sold one man a better and another man a poorer quality.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. WEBB. The gentleman can do so, of course.

Mr. NELSON. So far as your prohibition is concerned, is it true that it is neither included in the Sherman law nor in the fifth section of the Trade Commission bill?

Mr. WEBB. It is not included in either, except so far as we refer it in enforcing this section to the Federal Trade Commission. Sections 2 and 3 stand alone, and are not amendments to the Sherman antitrust law, but supplemental to it. It would take a combination of such acts and a persistence in them to reach the point where they would violate the Sherman law. The object of this law is to prevent the creation of a trust by preventing the practices which make trusts; to prevent the little things which, if persisted in and combined, will ultimately result in a violation of the Sherman law—and that is why we call it supplementary to the trust law and not an amendment to it.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. Oh, I heard my friend read his Supreme Court decision yesterday.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I would simply call the gentleman's attention to the Standard Oil Co. case, where they so clearly define this kind of an offense.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I have argued that with my friend before. He knows that there is no court in the land that would hold a man guilty of violating the Sherman antitrust law simply because he discriminated in one, two, or three instances in one county in the United States alone in price. He has to do it in such a way and to such an extent and with such persistence as to restrain trade or create monopoly. This law we are now considering will catch him if he does it in one instance against one individual.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. Just for a question.

Mr. NELSON. When you have proven the actual fact of discrimination, how much more will you have to prove in order to prove that he has substantially lessened competition and done that which tends to monopoly?

Mr. WEBB. You do not have to prove either one. You will only have to prove such a discrimination as may be to substantially lessen competition or may tend to create monopoly. A strong Federal trade commission will stop all the discrimination and unfair practices that my friend complains of. They will stop all of these unfair methods of competition if you have a bold, brave, determined set of trade commissioners, which I hope we will have.

Mr. Speaker, what does my friend suggest as a substitute for this bill? He has been here 8 or 10 years, and where is his trust bill? He has been in Congress for 8 or 10 or 12 years and offers nothing, and the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD], sitting beside him, in his speech on the floor of the House when this bill passed, said:

We have been trying to enforce the Sherman antitrust law for 20 years, and trusts have been growing and growing.

A despairing cry from a Republican whose party has been in power for 20 years, with the exception of the last 2 years. Where are your trust bills with teeth? Where are your efforts to curb the trusts? Where have you done your best to stop the violations of the antitrust law? And yet my friend from Wisconsin [Mr. NELSON] announces to-day that because the Democratic Party has not done in 2 years what his party failed to do in 20 years he expects to go back to the flesh pots of the Republican Party. He prefers to vote for nothing rather than vote for this measure which looks toward curbing the evil practices of which he complains. From his viewpoint it seems to me that he should prefer a half loaf to no bread at all.

Why, my two friends, splendid gentlemen that they are, and I have the highest esteem for both, as they know, complain that this bill is not drastic enough, and the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] spoke for 20 or 30 minutes telling how he voted for it when it had criminal penalties, but says that since they have been taken out he has had a change of heart and is going to vote against it. Mr. MANN, the Republican leader, comes along with the concluding speech and says we are doing too much already to disturb business by threatening to put people in jail. You gentlemen ought to get together. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I will tell you, my friends, you are determined to assail us; it does not make any difference what we do. You expect to shoot us going and coming. I believe 54 of you voted for the trust bill when it passed the House. I do not know how many will vote for it or against it now, but do not put it on the ground of criminal penalties or the lack of them. There is some other motive that actuates you. As I said, you are determined to shoot us, no matter what we do or what bill we present. We have done our best and we have done far more than all of you Republicans have done in 20 years. We are trying to stop the violation of the Sherman antitrust law and prevent unfair trade methods that lead to its violation. What have you done during your 20 years in power?

Mr. MOORE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. I can not. We know the ranking Republican members of the Judiciary Committee have done nothing in 20 years. Trusts have "grown and grown." We are trying to do something and you are standing in our way like a stumbling block instead of aiding us, trying to embarrass us in every way that you can, while you profess to desire drastic laws on the subject. You are determined to criticize what we do. As I say, you shoot us going and coming.

The conservatives on your side shoot us, the radicals shoot us, and so you shoot us from both ends of the line. It reminds me of a story I heard down in Virginia. An old farmer was very proud of his pack of dogs, and among them he had a greyhound. The greyhound, as you gentlemen know, runs by sight and not by scent. One frosty morning he took the dogs out to chase a rabbit. The scent was hot, and all the dogs took after the rabbit, but the greyhound struck straight for the rabbit, and in his rapid flight he came in contact with a perpendicular strand of barbed wire, which split the dog open from the end of his nose to the tip of his tail. The farmer ran to the greyhound and saw his condition, and in his great hurry he put the parts of the dog together, carried them home, and put them in the kennel. The next morning when he went out to bury his dog, to his great surprise he found the dog still living, but he was horrified when he discovered that he had put the tail part of the dog where the head ought to be and the head part where the tail ought to be; but notwithstanding such terrible deformity, the exosmose and endosmose had caused the two parts to adhere and grow together and make a live dog. About a month or two afterwards one of his farmer friends came around and said, "How is that dog that was split open getting along?" The farmer said, "Fine; he is the best dog I have got in the pack." "How is that?" The farmer said. "It is this way: He can run both ways and bark at each end." [Laughter and applause.] And so on this trust bill the Republican side has been barking both ways and running in different directions; and they have done so in the last 25 minutes. They are "split open," too. [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

Now, Mr. Speaker, what we have really done and tried to do by this bill is to make unlawful discriminations in prices. We have made unlawful tying contracts. We have prevented interlocking directorates between common carriers and supply houses for the purpose of protecting the railroad companies and stockholders from exorbitant prices charged by supply houses. We have prevented interlocking directorates of industrial corporations. We have prevented interlocking directorates of banks over a certain size. We have done for labor what the Sherman antitrust law and those who framed it intended should be done. We have provided for trial of certain contempts by juries, something for which laboring men have been clamoring for, lo, these 20 years; and when this bill passes the laboring men should have a jubilee, because during the long, weary years of Republican administration they were begging at your doors and praying to you for such legislation, but they got a stone, and some of you have been so set against that kind of legislation in behalf of labor that to-day, this afternoon, some of you are going to vote against this bill on the pretense that you do not like it because it is not strong enough, when down in your hearts you do not like it because it is the great magna charta of the laboring man. [Applause on the Democratic side.] In addition to this, Mr. Speaker, we have thrown the doors of the court wide open for the first time to every man who is injured. He can enter the court at his home and sue a man or corporation who injures him or enter suit in the man's or corporation's home in all the courts for any amount he may sue for. And I contend, Mr. Speaker, that this bill is a thousand times better than nothing, which our Republican friends have persisted in giving to the people during the last 20 years. You have done nothing for them as against the trusts, and now refuse to help us do anything.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. WEBB. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I understood the gentleman to say a moment ago that this bill was labor's magna charta. I think I heard the gentleman from North Carolina say only yesterday, in debate with the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE], that certain phrases had been stricken out largely because of the speech made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE]. I have heard a great deal of discussion to the effect that the labor clause had now in reality been brought down to what the President really said, that it satisfied labor, but gave them nothing. I desire to ask if that is labor's magna charta?

Mr. WEBB. The Senate changed a few lines of language in reference to injunctions against labor. Where we say they shall not be enjoined from meeting at any place, the Senate made it "any place where lawful." I wanted to have some pleasant reference to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, who made a strong and vehement speech about labor congregating where they had no right. Everybody knows we did not authorize them to meet unlawfully in any public place, but only gave the right to assemble in a lawful way for a lawful purpose, and at a place where they may lawfully be.

The labor sections are just like they were when they passed the House and when you gentlemen voted for them. If you want to favor labor, vote for the bill.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Several provisions have been stricken from the labor clause.

Mr. WEBB. We have stricken out "consumers and fraternal organizations," so as to make the section apply to labor, agricultural, and horticultural organizations—organizations composed of men who produce something.

Mr. Speaker, that is all I care to say, and I ask that the House now vote upon the report. [Applause.]

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KIESS].

Mr. KIESS of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, the most ardent admirer or sanguine defender of the present national administration can not be blind to the knowledge or escape the charge that our country has not prospered under it. When on the 4th of March, 1913, the Democratic Party assumed full control of the Government, our land was in the full tide of prosperity and the Treasury in the receipt of an income more than adequate to meet every obligation. This was the proud condition existing when the Republican Party surrendered the stewardship it had administered for 16 years. The only cloud on the financial horizon was the doubt, born of past experience, of the ability of the Democratic Party to maintain unimpaired what it had so richly inherited from its predecessor in power.

Beginning under the administration of the wise and beloved McKinley and continuing under his Republican successors, our people had been blessed with a prosperity never matched. Industries so multiplied and throve, domestic and foreign trade so expanded, property so enhanced in value, as to make the measure of the growth and expansion beyond computation. The average material condition of the American was at the highest level ever known to any land or time. All who had the will or diligence to do so could share in this unrivaled season and partake of the harvest of this widespread industrial prosperity.

During this bountiful period, however, there arose a cult preaching and spreading a doctrine of doubt and discontent, sometimes charging that our prosperity was a sham or urging that if it existed it was not to be credited to the party in power. The misdeeds of a few business enterprises were painted as the common practice of all business. All business success was put under suspicion. The courts were assailed and the very form of our Government denounced as the mere cunning device to thwart the popular will. A protective tariff which had contributed so much to our upbuilding and well-being was pictured as a system for the enrichment of certain privileged classes at the expense of the masses. The farmer was told that protection robbed him for the benefit of the manufacturer. The laborer was told that it added nothing to his pay envelope, that the gain was limited to the profits of the employer. Residents of town and city were told protection enhanced the cost of living. So class was played against class to arouse opposition to the protective system, all the while ignoring the obvious truth that when one great industry or interest prospers all others share in the fruits, and that depression in any inevitably works depression in all.

Out of this propaganda of denunciation and discontent, fallacious teaching, and unsound economic argument was born the Democratic victory of 1912. It seemed as if the people had grown tired of prosperity and were willing to risk a change at any price or were deluded into the belief that it had become so much the settled order of things that nothing could disturb or overthrow it. One thing is certain, and that is if the people were in fact sick of prosperity and desired a change from that happy estate, they applied the proper remedy in the election of a Democratic administration. Our history is the abundant proof that it is an unsurpassed instrumentality to such an end. No one questions the patriotic purposes possessing our Democratic friends, all freely acknowledge their good intentions, but it takes something more than good motives and good intentions to make the wheels go round and keep the country in the pathway of progress. It takes a type of constructive statesmanship in which the Democracy has been singularly deficient.

Much of the record of this present administration, however high its aim, is not one to which history will point with any glowing pride. Its successes in our domestic affairs have been few, its failures many, and some of them lamentable. It has done much that it ought not to have done and undone some things which should have been left as they were. The solemn pledges of the platform adopted at the Baltimore convention in 1912 have had no binding force on the action of the Democratic Party, as evidenced in the measures of this administration. No party ever so speedily or glaringly turned its back to its platform declarations. It promised retrenchment in expenditures, but has practiced woeful extravagance. It declared for free tolls for our coastwise trade passing through the Panama Canal, wholly built by American skill and genius, toil, and money, but in flagrant violation of that express covenant it repealed such free-toll provision. The trust-regulating measures now in course of passage satisfy no one. As they are finally shaping, they are more prone to confuse than to clarify, more apt to hobble business than to set it free, more likely to raise doubt than to afford a chart for the guidance of honest enterprise. They will operate to invite a meddlesome, mischievous espionage upon legitimate business and to license and legalize monopoly instead of destroying it. It is government by bureaucracy, dangerous and abhorrent to the very genius of our institutions. These and kindred measures fathered by this administration are the widest departure in all our history from the principles of Jefferson, the patron saint of the Democracy. Hamilton himself, the arch apostle of federalism, would have shrunk with fear from such concentration of power. There is something both pathetic and ludicrous in a party professing a reverence for the teachings of Jefferson and yet promoting a system of government upon which he would have looked with horror. No more striking example of the utter inability of the Democratic Party to frame legislation intelligently can be cited than the income-tax provision. People generally believe in the wisdom, propriety, and justice of such a tax, but the administrative and other features of the existing law are so obscure that the wisest are yet in doubt as to their meaning and the tax is chiefly vexatious to those people who have none to pay. In the wide miscalculation as to the amount which would be realized from this tax and the crude, clumsy, unfair methods of its collection, we behold a notable instance of the lack of grasp and constructive power in Democratic legislation.

The conspicuous failure of this administration is the tariff law which it placed on the statute books and on the back of industry. The country was solemnly assured in 1912 that the tariff bill which the Democratic Party would enact into law would be so framed as not to disturb industry. A year's trial has shown that the measure it did pass has been baneful and scattered havoc broadcast from ocean to ocean. Few industries, large or small, have escaped the mischief wrought by this measure. The farmer, the manufacturer, the tradesman, the laborer, the capitalist—all have felt its chilling hand. A diminishing freight tonnage, consequent upon declining industry, has brought once prosperous railroads to the very verge of insolvency. Their reduced purchasing power is, in turn, reflected back in manifold ways. We have had protective tariffs and tariffs for revenue only; this existing law may well be denominated a tariff for depression and deficit. Its blight is to be seen in silent mills, in uncounted thousands of idle workmen, in diminishing profit to business, and the passing of dividends in the case of many securities once deemed sound and largely held by the widow and orphan and those of small means. It has operated to increase imports and diminish exports. It has not increased wages, but has decreased the chance to earn any wages. It has not reduced the cost of living, but has reduced the means to gain any living whatever. The full dinner pail was once an object of derision or merriment to our Democratic friends; the empty dinner pail to-day is a just and deep cause of their fear for the outcome of this pending election.

The New Freedom, of which, by the way, we are hearing less and less, is chiefly manifest in a freedom for the average man to earn less than formerly, in freedom for business to get less profit, in freedom for freight cars to lie idle on railroad sidings, in freedom for the foreign manufacturer to sell us what should be made in our own factories, in freedom for the foreign farmer to send his products here to compete with our own sons of toil. We were told that one of the high purposes of this administration was to create conditions for the better distribution of wealth. The measures taken have done nothing to distribute wealth, but much to destroy wealth. The distributees of wealth under this dispensation are scarce; a multitude have suffered a decline in their worldy possessions. The loss in property values during the past two years is beyond estimate.

To cheer us in this shrinkage of property values, diminishing profits for the employer, and shrunken pay envelopes for the employed we have been assured in high quarters that our changed situation is purely and merely psychological. We have had eras of war and eras of peace, eras of prosperity and eras of depression; now we are having something entirely new in a psychological era. In place of real wages the workman must be content to be paid in part in a specie of make-believe; instead of profits which show on the ledger, the business man must be satisfied with those which only exist in his mind; instead of checks for dividends, our railroads and other concerns can declare such as are payable in psychology. Folks generally are old-fashioned enough, however, to continue to prefer the substantial. Eggs from China, wheat from Canada, meat and corn from Argentina, the wares and products of foreign factories are not psychological; they are the real article, with which our own producer is obliged to compete, at once a menace to him, and in no wise lessening the cost of these necessaries to the consumer. For example, free sugar is a monstrous humbug, so far as advantaging our own people; it is only effective in threatening our promising beet-sugar industry with destruction and in depriving the National Treasury of millions of revenues, whose need is now so pressing.

Not only has this tariff law been disastrous to our industries, but it fails to provide sufficient revenue to run the Government—at least to run it on the expensive plan it is now being run. That the European war is the chief source of this particular shortcoming in this unfortunate law is a mere pretext. It would have failed as a revenue-raising measure even though smiling peace reigned where rages this dreadful war. So this law is to be supplemented by a war tax. Such a tax in a land in a state of profound peace with all the world is a new thing in political and fiscal nomenclature. In Buchanan's time bonds were issued to meet a deficiency in the revenues. Under Cleveland they were issued to sustain the crumbling credit of the Government, imperiled by the threat of free silver. Now we have the same old ghost, which ever haunts our Government during a Democratic administration, stalking about in the garb of war tax. The real deficiency has ever been a deficiency in Democratic statesmanship.

Impressed by the dismal failure of the Democratic Party to rise level to the needs of the hour, and aroused by the industrial distress and depression following its rule, the people are resolutely facing toward a restoration of the Republican Party to power. The 3d of November will show in unmistakable terms that this party has come back, and that our Republic proposes, as soon as may be done, to entrust it once more with the arduous duty of directing her destinies. The bitter trials through which our land is passing are convincing proof that it is safer to trust to experience than to indulge in experiment. The shining record of the Republican Party in the past inspires the just hope and firm confidence that it will be both able and faithful to meet the needs and issues of the to-morrow. Those who left the fold in 1912 are returning and, save a negligible remnant, will soon all be once more happily home again. The Republican Party is at once the bulwark for the preservation of the governmental institutions which have heretofore served us so well, and the advocate and exponent of those fiscal and financial policies which have so bountifully blessed us in the days gone by, and which will again redeem and restore our land to progress and prosperity.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the Senate joint resolution.

The Senate joint resolution was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. PADGETT, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

SENATE.

FRIDAY, October 9, 1914.

(Legislative day of Thursday, October 8, 1914.)

The Senate reassembled at 11 o'clock a. m., on the expiration of the recess.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, on yesterday the senior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] phoned me that he was very unwell and did not think he would be able to attend the session to-day, and asked me, in his absence, as the next ranking member of the Finance Committee, to look after the revenue bill. I understand that bill has been made the unfinished business, and I ask now that the bill be laid before the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. SMOOT. I was informed yesterday by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] that he intended to speak to-day upon the bill. I do not know whether there is anyone prepared to go on to-day upon the bill. May I ask the Senator from Missouri if he knows of anyone on the other side who desires to speak to-day?

Mr. STONE. I do not know, Mr. President. I wish merely to have the bill laid before the Senate.

Mr. SIMMONS entered the Chamber.

Mr. STONE. The Senator from North Carolina is now here, and I leave the matter to his guidance.

Mr. MYERS. I will ask what is the request? I have just entered the Chamber.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The request is to lay the unfinished business before the Senate.

Mr. MYERS. I wish to say in this connection that I had expected to ask that the conference report on the Alaska coal bill be taken up at this time. The Senator from North Carolina kindly stated that at any time I wished to take it up he would lay the revenue bill aside and let me do so. I had expected to call it up the first thing this morning, but the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] yesterday made a request, which was granted, that the Alaska coal-land leasing bill be printed in parallel columns, showing the House bill, the Senate bill, and the conference agreement. As that is a considerable job, it has not yet come from the printer, and I will not call up the report until the print is here. I wish the Senator from Nebraska and any other Senator to have the benefit of that print, and I may later in the day ask leave to bring up the conference report.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bankhead	Johnson	Page	Stone
Bristow	Jones	Perkins	Thomas
Burton	Kern	Poindexter	Thompson
Camden	Lane	Pomerene	Thornton
Chamberlain	Lea, Tenn.	Saulsbury	Townsend
Chilton	Martine, N. J.	Shafroth	Vardaman
Clapp	Myers	Sheppard	Walsh
Fletcher	Nelson	Shields	Warren
Gore	Norris	Simmons	West
Gronna	O'Gorman	Smith, Ga.	White
Hollis	Oliver	Smoot
Hughes	Overman	Sterling

Mr. TOWNSEND. The senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] is absent on important business. He is paired on all votes with the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED]. This announcement may stand for the day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Forty-six Senators have answered to the roll call. There is not a quorum present. The Secretary will call the roll of absentees.

The Secretary called the names of absent Senators, and Mr. REED answered to his name when called.

Mr. THORNTON. I desire to announce the necessary absence of my colleague [Mr. RANSDELL].

Mr. BORAH entered the Chamber and answered to his name.

Mr. SMOOT. I desire to announce the necessary absence of the senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], my colleague [Mr. SUTHERLAND], and the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF]. The senior Senator from New Hampshire is paired with the junior Senator from New York [Mr O'GORMAN], my colleague is paired with the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE], and the junior Senator from West Virginia is paired with the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN].

Mr. JAMES entered the Chamber and answered to his name.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Forty-nine Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present. The Senator from Missouri——

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, in view of the statement of the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS] with reference to taking up the conference report on the Alaska coal bill, I will ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside in order that that report may be considered.

Mr. BORAH. Before that request for unanimous consent is acted upon, I do not desire to interfere with the program, but I should like to ask the Senator from Montana——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair must have some understanding about this matter. The Senator from Missouri asked unanimous consent that the unfinished business be laid before the Senate. The Senator from North Carolina now asks that it be temporarily laid aside.

Mr. STONE. I will withdraw the request that I made.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is temporarily laid aside. It is not now before the Senate.

Mr. BRISTOW. I ask leave to present sundry petitions and to introduce several bills.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. HUGHES presented a petition of sundry citizens of St. Louis, Mo., praying for the enactment of legislation to prohibit the importation of convict-made goods, which was ordered to lie on the table.

ALASKA COAL LANDS.

Mr. MYERS. I ask that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the conference report on House bill 14233.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the conference report on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses upon the bill (H. R. 14233) to provide for the leasing of coal lands in the Territory of Alaska, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator from Montana, who is in charge of this bill, with reference to the amendment which was put on in the Senate as section 18, and which had for its object and purpose the repealing of section 16 of what is known as the reclamation extension act. I ask the Senator from Montana, as I see that is dropped out, why it was done? What was the reason for leaving it out? This was a very important provision of the bill and should have been retained.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I am as ardent a supporter of that amendment as the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] or anybody else could possibly be. I was exceedingly glad when the Senator from Idaho offered his amendment, and I supported it. In fact, when an amendment was put on to the reclamation extension act by the other House and brought in here by the conferees in a report. I opposed the adoption of that report with all of the energy and power of which I was capable. I was exceedingly glad that the Senator from Idaho offered an amendment to the coal-leasing bill to repeal that law. I will say, as one of the conferees, that we sat in conference five days, and up to the last I urged that that amendment be retained, as did all of the other Senate conferees, for that matter. We used every argument of which we were capable, but the House conferees simply would not agree to it. They said that unless we receded from that amendment there would be no agreement and the bill would fail of passage. We stood out against that sort of contention for five days, and finally, on the fifth day, two of the House conferees said they had to leave the city that night; that that was the last day they could be here; and that there had to be an agreement on that day or not at all. The Senate conferees simply receded because it was impossible to get the House conferees to agree to the amendment.

The Senate conferees looked upon it in this way: That, strictly speaking, this was not a bill on which an amendment of that kind would be expected to be found; that, in a literal sense, it was hardly germane to the subject of the bill, and that there might be many other opportunities when such an amendment could be brought in and insisted upon with better grace and with more force; that there might be other opportunities yet more advantageous for getting such an amendment on some other bill. Fearing our inability to reach an agreement with that amendment in the bill, we simply receded, hoping in the near future to get the amendment on some other bill where we shall have a better chance to get it through.

That is my understanding of the matter. The Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] was one of the conferees. He may have something further to say about it. That is all I can say on the subject. I repeat, it was with very great regret and as a last resort that I consented to recede from the amendment, but we had to do so in order to get any bill at all.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SAULSBURY in the chair). Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. BORAH. I do.

Mr. SMOOT. As one of the conferees on the part of the Senate, Mr. President, I wish to say that all of the members of the conference committee, both the House and Senate members, were in favor of section 18 of the bill, which was an amendment offered to the bill by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH]. My consent that it be disagreed to on the part of the conferees was not because two conferees of the other House were obliged to leave the city, but my consent was given upon the positive statement of Members of the House that it would be best not to force this question upon the House so soon after an adverse vote had been had upon it; that, in their opinion, it would be better to allow the matter to go over to the next session of Congress, when they thought they could organize the House and secure enough votes in that body either to place a similar amendment upon some bill or to pass it as a separate measure.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I take it, then, that the conferees on the part of the other House were not personally unfriendly to this amendment, but thought that this was an inopportune time to get it through the House? They thought we could best accomplish our desire at a more propitious time.

Mr. SMOOT. Every one of them was friendly to the amendment, I will say to the Senator from Idaho. I will further say to the Senator that when this question was voted upon in the House there was another question involved with it, and that was the question of compelling interest to be paid upon deferred payments in reclamation projects. It seems that the whole effort of those interested in reclamation projects was directed toward defeating the proposition of charging interest upon the deferred payments, and that very little was done toward organizing to prevent the passage of the law which section 18 is designed to repeal. I heard, not only members of the conference committee on the part of the House, who were all friendly to the amendment, but other Members of the House from the Western States before the committee state positively that in their opinion it was best not to press the amendment at this time. That was the reason why I consented that the amendment should go out. Nothing short of that would have been sufficient to induce me to have agreed that it should be eliminated from the bill.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, Congress is getting to be a peculiar body. Those things which peculiarly belong to administrative bodies and to bureaus are being taken over by Congress, while those things which belong peculiarly to Congress are being delegated to bureaus. We seem to want to administer and to escape the responsibility of legislation. This is a matter which has always been in the hands of the Reclamation Service, and it has been managed with success. Not only that, but if anything is a pure administrative matter, it is just such matters as that. I do not know of any instance in which the Reclamation Department has ever been charged with malconduct or bad management in regard to it.

I am not going, of course, to hold up this bill by a discussion of it at this time, because it would be fruitless; but I only desire to insert in the RECORD that section 16 in this extension law embodies a wrong principle and a wrong policy. I sincerely hope, and I have reason to believe, that Congress will reconsider its action, repeal section 16, and place the power back in the Reclamation Bureau, where it ought to be.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I wish to be recorded at this juncture as heartily concurring in all that the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] has said about this matter.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, before the vote is taken upon the conference report I desire to call to the attention of the Senate some of the provisions of the bill to which the Senate agreed and which have been eliminated in the conference report. I shall not take the time this morning to take up each section and call particular attention to the eliminations and changes made in the Senate bill, but I shall call attention to some of the principal items.

In section 3 of the Senate bill, page 14, beginning on line 6, the Senate agreed to this language——

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. SMOOT. I do.

Mr. NORRIS. From what print is the Senator reading?

Mr. SMOOT. I am reading from the bill as passed by the Senate.

Mr. NORRIS. Could the Senator just as well refer to the comparative print, which I presume he has on his desk?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I have just had the comparative print handed to me; I have not got it marked, and perhaps it would take me a little more time to indicate the changes on that print.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator referred to section 3.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. And he stated that it was on page 14. In the comparative print section 3 is on page 4.

Mr. SMOOT. That is true, Mr. President, but if the Senator will take the comparative print and follow the language of section 3 that I will read he will see just what has been eliminated.

Mr. NORRIS. The changes are shown in the comparative print at a glance, because the House bill, the Senate bill, and the bill as reported by the conference committee are printed in parallel columns.

Mr. SMOOT. Beginning with the words "and thereafter" the Senate inserted this provision, which has been eliminated in the conference report:

And thereafter suoject to any prior valid existing rights, which said rights may be perfected under the laws in force at the time the same were initiated, and under the rules, regulations, and practices of the Land Department relative to the acquisition of such rights, as interpreted and applied by the department at the time of the initiation of such rights.

That provision, Mr. President, was inserted on the floor of the Senate, and it has been disagreed to by the conferees.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I want to ask the Senator from Utah a question.

Mr. SMOOT. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. BORAH. I am unable to put my finger upon the section, but I want to ask the Senator what has become of the provisions which were put in by the Senate to the effect that in case of violation of the law with reference to trusts, monopolies, combines, and so forth, the procedure should be in the courts rather than by a forfeiture of the lease by the Secretary? The Senator will remember that the matter was debated upon the floor of the Senate, and it was contended by some of us that, if it was not provided in the lease that there should be a forfeiture of the lease in case of a combine or monopolistic practice, largely the virtue of the leasing system would have been taken away. The Senate put on a provision that the enforcement of the laws with relation to monopoly, and so forth, should be in the courts the same as if the party owned the land.

Mr. SMOOT. That is section 8a, and it is the provision offered by the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER]. That provision has been agreed to by the conferees.

Mr. BORAH. What section?

Mr. SMOOT. Section 8a.

Mr. POINDEXTER. That is true, as the Senator from Utah has said; but my understanding of the suggestion of the Senator from Idaho was that he referred to the provision which gave the district courts of Alaska jurisdiction. That provision was found in another section, and has been left out.

Mr. SMOOT. If that is what the Senator from Idaho referred to, that was section 15 in the bill as it passed the Senate. That section read as follows:

SEC. 15. That the jurisdiction of the district court of Alaska shall extend to and over any forfeiture or cancellation proceedings instituted under the provisions of section 9 of this act and to any and all controversies which may arise between the United States and any lessee or other person, association, or corporation growing out of any disputed controversies or proceedings arising under this act or under leases issued hereunder. All causes against the United States brought under the provisions of this act shall be tried in the same manner and under the same rules as controversies between citizens.

That provision, Mr. President, has been eliminated from the bill, but an amendment, as the Senator will see, has been made to section 14, referring to the same subject matter. The House conferees would not agree to the Senate provision. They positively stated that it would be absolutely impossible to get the House to consent to allow the Government of the United States to be sued. The Senate conferees took the position that, under the system of leasing, the Government of the United States became a party to the lease; that it was not only the owner of the land but a party to the contract, and therefore the party owning the lease should have a right to go into court, provided there was any disagreement or misunderstanding as to the question of the lease itself; but, as I have said, the House conferees positively refused to yield on that point, and it was stricken from the bill.

Mr. BORAH. I have section 8a here, and I was trying to secure information as to that also. Section 8a provides that—

SEC. 8a. If any of the lands or deposits leased under the provisions of this act shall be subleased, trusteed, possessed, or controlled by any devise permanently, temporarily, directly, indirectly, tacitly, or in any manner whatsoever, so that they form part of or are in anywise controlled by any combination in the form of an unlawful trust, with consent of lessee, or form the subject of any contract or conspiracy in restraint of trade in the mining or selling of coal, entered into by the lessee, or of any holding of such lands by any individual, partnership, association, corporation, or control, in excess of 2,560 acres in the Territory of Alaska, the lease thereof shall be forfeited by appropriate court proceedings.

Would not "appropriate court proceedings" involve the whole question of proving a combine, a trust, or a monopoly on the part of the parties alleging such combine and asking for a forfeiture? Is that the language which the Senator from Washington had inserted as an amendment?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, that concluding phrase was not in the amendment which I offered; it was inserted on the floor of the Senate.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from Washington is correct, the concluding part of the last sentence was adopted by the Senate itself, and the whole paragraph was agreed to by the conferees.

Mr. BORAH. As I said in the discussion of this bill, if the leasing system had anything to particularly commend itself to my judgment, it was the summary power of the Secretary of the Interior to protect the situation against combines and monopolies in the use of the commodity proposed to be mined.

Mr. President, if the parties must depend alone in enforcing or protecting their rights, or if the public is dependent alone upon the power of the courts to enforce their rights, I can not see any difference between the parties owning the mines and the parties leasing the mines, so far as monopoly is concerned. We could go in there, Alaska being a Territory, and enforce the laws against monopolies and trusts as against owners just as easily and just as successfully as we could against lessees.

One of the arguments which has been made in favor of the leasing system has been that under such a system it is within the power of the Secretary of the Interior, on being satisfied that a violation of the law with reference to monopolies or trusts has occurred, as the representative of the landlord, to forfeit the lease, the instrument having in it provisions with reference to forfeiture in case such conditions arise. Now, as I understand, this entire matter is taken out of the hands of the department and turned over to the courts. I have no objection to that proposition, Mr. President, except to say that it takes away, in my judgment, the real argument in favor of a leasing system in Alaska. We have been told time and time again in this country that the great virtue of a leasing system was by reason of the fact that we could protect against monopoly and combines better by the terms of a lease.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. SMOOT. I do.

Mr. JONES. I simply wish to call the attention of the Senator from Idaho to this proviso to section 14, which further emphasizes the provision taking this matter out of the hands of the Secretary of the Interior:

Provided, That the possession of any lessee of any lands covered by his lease and the operation of the mines and other works thereon or the title of the products thereof shall not be interfered with by the Secretary of the Interior, except after an appropriate proceeding in the district court of Alaska instituted for the purpose of securing a forfeiture or termination of such lease, and such forfeiture or termination shall take effect only from the date of entry of final judgment declaring such forfeiture or termination.

Mr. BORAH. That is the proviso under section 14 of the conference report?

Mr. JONES. Section 14; yes.

Mr. BORAH. Is not that a new proposition?

Mr. SMOOT. It is. It was added to section 14 after the conferees agreed to strike out section 15.

Mr. BORAH. There is one consoling fact about these conference reports—that pretty soon the balance of the Senate can go home and the conferees can make the law.

Mr. SMOOT. I agree with the Senator in that respect. In fact, as one of the conferees, after I was told that any amendment that was proposed by the House conferees would be agreed to by a majority of the Senate conferees, because they wanted the bill passed at this session, I refused to remain any longer as a conferee for the consideration of the bill. I want to emphasize the statement the Senator has just made in regard to legislation by conferees.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Has it not been the rule of the Senate that all the conferees could take into consideration was questions in dispute between the two Houses?

Mr. BORAH. That was an antique rule of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It must have been revoked at some time.

Mr. BORAH. Now, Mr. President, if the Senator from Utah will yield to me for a moment, on the suggestion of the Senator from Washington I perceive the entire purport of this amendment, and as I understand it I am opposed to the conference report. Section 8a reads:

If any of the lands or deposits leased under the provisions of this act shall be subleased, trusteed, possessed, or controlled by any device, * * * the lease thereof shall be forfeited by appropriate court proceedings.

It was hardly necessary to put that into the law, for that could be done anyway. But now they say:

Provided, That the possession of any lessee of any lands covered by his lease and the operation of the mines and other works thereon or the title of the products thereof shall not be interfered with by the Secretary of the Interior except after an appropriate proceeding in the district court of Alaska instituted for the purpose of securing a forfeiture or termination of such lease, and such forfeiture or termination shall take effect only from the date of entry of final judgment declaring such forfeiture or termination: Provided further, That such court proceedings must be instituted within 90 days after notice to the lessee of the facts constituting such cause of action, or the same shall be forever barred.

The last proviso is more surprising than all the preceding ones:

That such court proceedings must be instituted within 90 days after notice to the lessee of the facts constituting such cause of action, or the same shall be forever barred.

In other words, we have limited to 90 days the right of action for the prevention of monopolies and trusts.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I should like to suggest to the Senator right there that this notice, I presume, will come from the Government. I presume the only party who can give the notice is the other party to the lease; and therefore the Government itself would have control of that limitation. If it did not give the notice, the limitation would not commence to run. The statute of limitations fixing it at 90 days runs from the notice given to the lessee.

Mr. BORAH. Exactly.

Mr. NORRIS. So, as a matter of fact, it is hardly fair, in my judgment, to say that it is a definite limitation of the action to 90 days, because it is within the control of the Government to give the notice or delay giving the notice, and hence the statute would not run until it was given.

Mr. BORAH. Of course the construction which the Senator places upon the proviso with reference to who shall give the notice, what the notice shall be, and when the statute begins to run, is likely correct; but at the same time I think the Senator will concede that it is rather ambiguous in that regard.

Mr. NORRIS. I concede that, and I would rather that proviso were not in the law. I do not think it is a good thing. At the same time it does not seem to me that it is so bad as one might infer to begin with, because it is not a statute of limitations.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say——

Mr. MYERS. If the Senator will permit me, it was undoubtedly the unanimous understanding of the conferees that notice was to be given by the Government. There is nobody else who could appropriately give it. The Government can therefore, if it desires, get the facts and work up its case and be ready to bring suit, and then give notice; and if it is not complied with in 90 days it can then bring the suit.

Mr. BORAH. What was the object of giving this notice?

Mr. MYERS. To let the parties who are notified have some knowledge of what the Government contemplates doing, so that they may act in accordance with the demands of the Government, or comply with its rules, or do whatever the notice might cause them to do.

Mr. BORAH. I supposed it was for the purpose of giving the lessee an opportunity to get out of the trust.

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senator will read section 14 as it passed the House, without the proviso as agreed to by the conference committee, he will notice that it applies to the forfeiture of leases; and this proviso was agreed to with the thought that the Government, when they were going to forfeit a lease, at least ought to give notice to the lessee within 90 days. The House conferees first proposed a provision of 30 days, but a question arose as to whether they could get notice into the interior of Alaska in that time.

Mr. BORAH. If this were a notice for forfeiture, and the forfeiture took place at the instance of the Secretary of the Interior, nothing would be fairer or more just than for the lessee to have a notice of 90 days and an opportunity to show the Secretary of the Interior why the lease should not be forfeited. It would be entirely unjust for a lessee to be deprived of his right without some notice; but this is not a notice of forfeiture. This is a notice to the lessee and a barring of the right of action within 90 days.

Mr. NORRIS. It is a notice of the intention of the Government, I presume, to begin an action to forfeit the lease. Does not the Senator put that construction on it?

Mr. BORAH. I suppose that would be right; but what would the Senator from Nebraska think if there were incorporated in the Sherman antitrust law a provision to the effect that the Government should give notice of 90 days to any combination, and that if the Government did not get ready to act within 90 days after the notice the action should be barred?

Mr. NORRIS. Of course I would not favor that. Personally, I do not favor this provision here. It does not seem to me that it is at all necessary. It might be a good idea, and I suppose that was the original intention, to give notice when they intend to forfeit a lease. That would be proper. This, in reality, is a notice that the Government intends to bring an action to forfeit the lease.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me, it must necessarily be so, else the Government could bring action without giving a day's notice. By giving notice the party involved may be able to satisfy the Government that the alleged facts complained of do not exist and that an action is not necessary.

Mr. NORRIS. This does not say, and I am not sure that it would be held, that the Government could not bring the action without giving notice.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, in that connection, if the Senator will yield, it is perfectly obvious from the language of that proviso that the Government does not have to give any certain period of notice. It can give notice and bring the action on the same day.

Mr. MYERS. Why, yes; it can bring it the same day or the next day if it wants to.

Mr. BORAH. Yes; but it can not give the notice and bring the action after 91 days.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I agree with the Senator from Idaho that it is difficult to see the purpose of the provision. I should suppose the purpose of it was that when the Government had made a claim that the law was being violated by a lessee the matter should be put at rest within a certain period, so that he would know whether he could go on with his business or not and not have it protracted indefinitely.

Mr. MYERS. That is the true theory. That is the phase of the matter that was discussed in conference—that when complaint was made the lessee had a right to know whether the lease was going to be forfeited or whether any action was going to be taken to forfeit it; whether he should go ahead and make a further outlay of money and continue to prosecute his work, or whether he should refrain from doing so until the matter was determined by the courts.

Mr. BORAH. May I ask the Senator from Montana what is the object of giving this notice at all? The lessee must come into court later and justify himself, unless it contemplates that, the notice being given, he can go to the Secretary of the Interior or the Department of Justice and satisfy them that the action should not be begun.

Mr. MYERS. That may be done. I see nothing in the way of that. I see no objection to it. It is simply putting a man on notice that complaint has been made that he is violating the law, and if he can show the Government that an action would be useless it would avoid useless litigation. If he can not, the Government then, having notified him, must put the matter at rest by bringing the action within 90 days.

Mr. BORAH. One further question, if the Senator pleases. Am I correct in assuming that the power to forfeit a lease by reason of any combination or any monopolistic practice is taken entirely away from the Secretary of the Interior, and the subject can not be covered by the terms of the lease, but the forfeiture must be had alone in the courts, after trial and rendition of judgment?

Mr. MYERS. The Senator is correct. That is just exactly what that amendment says. It was the intention of the conferees that it should say and mean that.

Mr. BORAH. May I ask the Senator another question, since he is familiar with this matter and has given much attention to it? What, then, is the virtue of the leasing system so far as controlling monopoly of coal in Alaska is concerned?

Mr. MYERS. I think there is very much virtue in it. Mr. President, whatever virtue there may be I do not think is destroyed by the provision that the Government must prove a violation of law before a forfeiture can be declared, and before a man must forfeit perhaps thousands or maybe hundreds of thousands of dollars that he has put into the working of the leased property. I can not see any objection to a court passing upon it. In fact, the conferees thought that it was giving one man, the Secretary of the Interior, entirely too much power to arbitrarily declare a lease forfeited, and that that power belonged to the courts, and ought to be there.

Mr. BORAH. We have just created a Trade Commission which has the absolute power to determine whether or not a monopolistic practice has been carried on or is being carried on.

Mr. MYERS. I see nothing to prevent the Trade Commission investigating a complaint of this kind, and reporting its finding to the Secretary of the Interior or to the Attorney General of the United States, or to any other officer of the Government, and causing a prosecution to be started.

Mr. BORAH. We do not refer the action of the Trade Commission to a court to determine the matter. All the court can do, under the Trade Commission act, is to enforce the order of the Trade Commission. Here is an instance in which the Secretary of the Interior is deprived of his power to forfeit a lease which he has made, taking it completely out of his hands and turning it over to the court, and he can not move a hand until the court adjudges the question upon the facts.

Mr. MYERS. I think that is right. I see no objection to it. I do not believe in giving the Secretary of the Interior the power to make a lease, and having a man invest hundreds of thousands of dollars upon the strength of it, and then declaring it forfeited. I think he ought to have the right to be heard in court.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I should like to inquire of the Senator from Idaho if he thinks there is a necessary relation between the provisions of section 8a and the proviso of section 14; whether or not those two sections are not entirely separate.

Section 8a refers to the particular class of cases where there is an unlawful combination or trust, and provides for a forfeiture in cases of that kind. The language of the section is that "the lease thereof shall be forfeited by appropriate court proceedings." I am reading the last words of section 8a. It seems to me that in that class of cases the notice provided for in the proviso of section 14 is not required, and that the proviso of section 14 refers to all other cases for which a forfeiture may be adjudged, and includes any breach of conditions of the lease other than the grounds of forfeiture contemplated by section 8a.

Mr. BORAH. Under what rule of construction of the statute would the Senator make that distinction? It would all be construed together to make it work together, if possible, and to make effective all the different provisions of the statute.

Mr. STERLING. I think this principle of interpretation might apply: That that which relates to a particular thing, as section 8a does, will govern as to that thing, and that includes the provision relative to court proceedings. This provision will govern in the section 8a, which relates to the particular thing, namely, a combination or trust as cause for forfeiture of the lease; whereas section 14, though seeming to be general in terms, would be exclusive of the provisions of section 8a, and the notice would be required in all other cases, whereas in case of a combination or trust no 90 days' notice would be required at all, provision having been made in section 8a for that kind of a case.

Mr. BORAH. Of course, that construction could be put upon it; but I think the Senator will concede that the court might hold otherwise, because this proviso says:

> That the possession of any lessee of any lands covered by his lease and the operation of the mines and other works thereon or the title of the products thereof shall not be interfered with by the Secretary of the Interior except after an appropriate proceeding in the district court.

It seems to me that that would cover any lease that is made and for any kind of forfeiture that was asked.

Mr. STERLING. I see the reason in the construction of the Senator from Idaho, and yet section 8a in terms provides for a special case, and it provides further that a lease shall be forfeited by appropriate court proceedings, and court proceedings will be appropriate without the notice mentioned in section 14.

Mr. LANE. Mr. President, it seems to me that we are legislating for a long time here. The conferees have decided that unless these proceedings are begun 90 days after notice to the lessee that the Government shall be forever barred from any further insistence on the rights of the Government. Now, "forever" is an exceedingly long time.

Mr. MYERS. If the Senator will permit me, I take it this refers to the Government being barred in the cause of action that might have been set forth in the notice, not subsequent causes of action.

Mr. LANE. I know; but it seems to me that that is too long a time. I do not think any body of mortal legislators have a right to fix such a time. I think that sort of a power belongs alone to the Supreme Being. I think we should make the time a limited one of definite period.

Mr. MYERS. How long would the Senator have it barred? For five years?

Mr. LANE. A reasonable lifetime. Twenty-one years, I think, has been decided to be the average life of leases, or as long as the average of a human generation, but not forever. I do not like to see the Government barred forever from bringing a suit; and if it must be barred, I should like to have it barred for a reasonable length of time only, not for an unreasonable time. Why not put in a provision providing that it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Interior to begin these proceedings within a reasonable time and not make any forfeiture of the Government's rights at all?

Mr. MYERS. This report is not subject to amendment now. It must be taken as a whole or rejected.

Mr. LANE. But it is new matter which the conferees have inserted. It was not a subject in controversy.

Mr. MYERS. I do not know what the Chair would rule, but we changed the wording and kept the substance of it.

Mr. LANE. That provision is, I think, new matter, and it has been put in the bill by the conferees without authorization from either the House or the Senate. It is restrictive, and I venture the guess that there will be a good many lessees escape under it. That is a country which it is hard to travel over, and 90 days is no long time in snow or storm in which to get through that country. One might fail to file proper papers. There do come up blizzards in that country. It restricts the Government and it circumscribes the right of the people, and I object to it. I do it without prejudice and without any intention to reflect upon anyone. It is new matter, and it ought to be subject to an objection. For that reason I should like to make a point of order against it.

Mr. SMOOT. Before the Senator from Oregon submits his point of order, I hardly understand the provision as the Senator has stated it. Let us take the working that we expect in Alaska between the lessee and the Government and then apply this provision to it. John Jones makes a lease to the Government of the United States for 2,560 acres of coal land in Alaska. The Secretary of the Interior in executing that lease has all the power under the bill to include regulations of every sort. He has bid so much per ton for a lease, and his bid being the highest the lease is made with him. He goes on and produces coal for two or three years, and at that time there is an examiner from the department sent to Alaska, who makes an examination of Jones's working of the mine. He finds that Mr. Jones is not mining it economically, that he is wasting a great deal of the coal on the land that he has leased, and he finds that it will be necessary to take action against him, for the work is not being carried out according to the provisions of the lease. The examiner returns to Washington and reports to the Secretary of the Interior the conditions as he found them. The Secretary of the Interior can make another examination, or as many examinations as he desires, of the same property before final decision is reached. He can collect what testimony he thinks proper proving that the lessee has not undertaken to conform to the lease. The Secretary must give 90 days' notice to the lessee before he can start those proceedings. I think that is just and right. I do not think that any power ought to be given the Secretary of the Interior that he should have the right to annul and set aside the lease without a notice to the party or that he should bring it into court immediately without giving some notice to the lessee.

This provision gives the lessee a notice of 90 days that his lease is going to be contested by the Secretary of the Interior. After the Secretary of the Interior has collected all the evidence, after his examiner has examined the mine and reported to him that the lessee is not complying with the provisions of the lease, then, and not until then, does he give the notice; and after the notice is given I think if the Secretary of the Interior does not take action in 90 days he should be barred from bringing action upon that particular violation of the lease.

Mr. LANE. I know, Mr. President, that there are many contingencies or accidents which might easily arise which would prevent the Government from action, thus forever thereafter barring it. I think the provision ought to have been drawn with a little more care for the protection of the Government, and that it could have been drawn in a better way. I understand it is not now subject to change, but I think it is a dangerous provision. Without prejudice, I am going to raise a point of order against it as being the insertion of new matter here which is not authorized by either body. If we can, after a bill is in conference, put new items of legislation, either enlarging the powers which are given or circumscribing them, there is no end to what can be done.

I may be in error, but I protest against any such change as that. I make the point of order, Mr. President, if you will allow me, against this provision as being new matter, which has been placed in the conference report without authority from either this body or the other House, as far as I can ascertain.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will examine the precedents before ruling upon the point of order.

Mr. MYERS. With the permission of the Senator from Oregon, I will say in this connection that it has been my understanding that an amendment to a bill may always be further amended by the conferees. They have the right to amend an amendment. The conferees considered only the Senate bill, which was an amendment. It was a substitute in the Senate for the House bill as an amendment, and that amendment was taken as the subject matter of consideration by the conferees. If they could not agree exactly on that amendment from beginning to end, word for word, it is my understanding that they have a right to agree on amendments to the amendment, and that is what they did in this instance.

Mr. LANE. I should like to say in conclusion, if it is true that the conference committee can add new matter, a slice here and a slice there, inserting different items in the bill, and the only way to get rid of one that is obnoxious is to reject the entire report, they then have the power to legislate independently of either or both Houses. Yet the Senate has not the power, when the bill comes back here, to offer an amendment to the new legislation which the conferees have inserted in the bill. That is a most unfortunate condition for the United States Senate to be in.

Mr. MYERS. I merely wish to explain to the Senator from Oregon at this juncture one thing. The House passed one bill and the Senate passed in lieu of it another bill. If the conferees had no power to make any amendment to the Senate amendment, which was the substitute, then the only thing the conferees could have done would have been one of two things, either to report out verbatim the House bill or to report out verbatim the Senate bill, which was an amendment, having had no authority to change a word of either. That would have been impossible. If we had confined ourselves to that, there never would have been any report.

Mr. LANE. But this is new matter not inserted by either the House or the Senate, and I believe it is subject to a point of order.

Mr. MYERS. I do not see how either one can be changed unless we just take slices of one and mix them in with the other.

Mr. LANE. But we do compromise on a bill in conference; we give and take. That is the rule, I believe. But here we have new matter injected into the conference report.

Mr. WHITE. Will the Senator from Montana please point to the matter of which this is an amendment?

Mr. MYERS. The limitation provision?

Mr. WHITE. Yes.

Mr. MYERS. I do not believe there was any statute in either of the original bills.

Mr. WHITE. Then I make the point of order that here is a statute of limitations.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Will the Senator call my attention to the paragraph?

Mr. WHITE. It is on page 12, and is found in the conclusion of section 14, the column under the conference agreement.

Mr. President, this is the proposition I want to make: The statute of limitations in ordinary statutes never runs against the Government of the United States. That is a general rule in the construction of statutes of limitations.

Mr. MYERS. Will the Senator permit me now to answer his question further? I can do so in a more definite manner, I think.

Mr. WHITE. I am glad to yield for that purpose.

Mr. MYERS. Section 15 of the Senate bill provided for suits against the United States.

Mr. WHITE. On what page?

Mr. MYERS. It is on page 22 of the print of September 28.

Mr. WHITE. Is it in the comparative print?

Mr. MYERS. Yes; I can find it in the comparative print.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It is section 15 of the comparative print.

Mr. MYERS. It is in section 15, on page 13, of the comparative print. Section 15 of the Senate bill provides for actions in the district court of Alaska over controversies arising under leases, and at the end of the section it says:

> All causes against the United States brought under the provisions of this act shall be tried in the same manner and under the same rules as controversies between citizens.

There must be a statute of limitations to controversies between citizens of Alaska, and it will apply the same to the actions that were provided for in the Senate bill, whatever they may be.

Mr. WHITE. I would be glad if the Senator would point me to the provision where there is any limitation against citizens of Alaska.

Mr. MYERS. I can not do that just now. I will be glad to do it in a few minutes.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It is the general rule.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, I make the point of order that the committee of conference has placed a statute of limitation in the bill against the United States, requiring suit to be brought in 90 days after notice has been given the lessee of a breach of a condition in the lease. This is new matter and has not been considered by either House of Congress.

The committee, as I understand it, has not only injected entirely new matter into the bill reported by it where no justification is found for it in either the House bill or the Senate bill or the bill that either one of them passed, but, moreover, by subjecting the Government to this statute of limitation it reverses the rule adopted by the courts by making a statute of limitations applicable to the Government. The committee was without authority to insert this provision, and the Senate is confronted with the proposition that it can not amend the bill—can not strike it out because it is presented in the conference report, our only remedy being to defeat the conference report as a whole or sustain the point of order and thereby refuse to consider the report. The effect of that ruling of the Chair is that a conference committee can legislate for both Houses.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Upon further consideration and examination of the authorities the Chair believes that it is the rule of the Senate that conferees may not include in their report matters not committed to them by either House, and that a point of order can be made in the Senate that such new matter has been included in the conference report, but that it has been the custom to submit this question of order to the Senate. It was so ruled by Vice President Hobart in the Fifty-fifth Congress, and carries the weight of the opinion of Senator LODGE, of Massachusetts, as being the correct practice, submitting the question of the point of order as to whether it is or is not new matter not in dispute between the Houses that was brought into the report of the conference committee by the conferees.

The Chair presumes that the reason for those rulings was that the Senate might discuss the question of the alleged new matter; that if it was satisfied with the alleged new matter it might overrule the point of order, and if it were not satisfied with the new matter it might sustain the point of order. That appears to the Chair to be the reason why the former rulings have been to submit the point of order to the Senate.

The Senator from Oregon [Mr. LANE] and the Senator from Alabama [Mr. WHITE] have each raised a point of order as to the proviso in section 14 of the report of the conference committee, and the Chair submits the question of the point of order to the Senate of the United States for its determination as to whether it is or is not new matter with reference to questions that were not in controversy between the Senate and the House of Representatives.

Mr. SMOOT. Upon that I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. WHITE. I have the floor, I think.

Mr. MYERS. I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry, if I can get an opportunity.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Alabama [Mr. WHITE] has the floor.

Mr. MYERS. Would the Senator yield for a parliamentary inquiry as to the effect of the ruling?

Mr. WHITE. Certainly.

Mr. MYERS. I ask the Chair, if the point be sustained, would it not have the effect of rejecting the entire conference report? It could not have the effect of simply eliminating that section or subject matter, could it?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair thinks it would have the effect of rejecting the conference report; that the conference report would go back to the conferees with a statement upon the part of the Senate that the conferees had exceeded their authority and had introduced new matter into the report.

Mr. MYERS. That was my apprehension. Now, I want to say to the Senator from Alabama that in order to sustain his point of order I think it is up to him to show that in any controversy in the United States District Court of Alaska between citizens of Alaska there is no statute of limitations in civil actions. Section 15 of the bill as it passed the Senate provides that—

All causes against the United States brought under the provisions of this act shall be tried in the same manner and under the same rules as controversies between citizens.

There certainly must be a statute of limitations as to the Territory of Alaska in civil actions between citizens. If there be such, whether it be 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, or 10 years, it is simply changing the duration of the limitation and not putting in a limitation where there was none before. I confidently assert that there must be and there is a statute of limitations in civil actions in Alaska, the duration of which I can not exactly state.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, I think the laboring oar is on the Senator to show such a statute.

Mr. MYERS. The Senator from Alabama has raised the point.

Mr. WHITE. Yes; but the Senator from Montana affirms the proposition that there is a statute of limitations in Alaska.

Mr. MYERS. The Senator from Alabama has raised the point that there is none.

Mr. WHITE. No.

Mr. MYERS. He has necessarily raised it.

Mr. WHITE. The Senator from Montana has affirmed that there is one.

Mr. MYERS. Well, I will try to find it.

Mr. WHITE. Then, the laboring oar is in the Senator's hands to show that there is a statute of limitations; but, Mr. President, if that is shown, it does not and it could not make any difference. The section to which the Senator from Montana referred has no reference whatever to a statute of limitations; it is simply a provision as to the procedure in the courts. It reads:

All causes against the United States brought under the provisions of this act shall be tried in the same manner—

But that does not say anything about defenses that might be available to one party or another.

Mr. MYERS. The ruling upon the statute of limitations would have to be the same, Mr. President.

Mr. WHITE. But what statute of limitations?

Mr. MYERS. Any that may be pleaded.

Mr. WHITE. Well, which is it? Is the statute of limitations in a lease of this kind for 10 years, 20 years, or 30 years—what is it?

Mr. MYERS. The language reads:

In the same manner and under the same rules as controversies between citizens

I will try to get the statute of limitations of Alaska.

Mr. WHITE. If the Senator from Montana gets the statute it will not make any difference; it will not have any reference to the question we are discussing, not a particle; it has reference to the manner of conducting the trial in the court, and it has no reference to the defenses that might be available under certain conditions; it has no reference to the defense of infancy or coverture or the statute of limitations. Would the Senator apply these defenses to the United States? Would the Senator plead the defense of coverture to a suit against the United States because it is a defense that can be made by married women in the Territory of Alaska? Does the Senator insist that because there is in Alaska a statute of limitations the Government of the United States could be defeated in its action, or that the provision mentioned would authorize a plea of that kind to be interposed against the United States?

Mr. MYERS. It could be offered and overruled if anybody wanted to offer it.

Mr. WHITE. Yes; but I do not suppose the Senator could find a lawyer who would offer it.

Mr. MYERS. Neither do I think so.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator a question, if he will yield to me for that purpose.

Mr. WHITE. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Has the Senator presented his criticism not only upon this proviso because he insists that it is new matter coming from the conferees, but also upon the matter itself because it is objectionable?

Mr. WHITE. I am going to do that.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I desire to hear the Senator's objection.

Mr. WHITE. Yes; I will come to that criticism. There are two questions involved in it. One is as to the propriety of the legislation, and the other is as to the propriety of the act of the conferees in injecting this new matter.

We are confronted now, probably for the first time—certainly for the first time, so far as I know—with having the Government of the United States bound by a statute of limitations. There may be, possibly there are, isolated cases where the Government of the United States is affected the same as are individuals by a statute of limitation; but if so, they are very rare.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, is it not true that we have a statute of limitations which bars the Government from proceeding to set aside mineral grants on the ground of fraud?

Mr. WHITE. If the Government is expressly mentioned in the statute, then it is so, but only then.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Has it not been the policy of the Government and of Congress in its legislation with reference to titles to mineral grants and land grants to provide some statutory limitation as to the length of time in which the Government must proceed upon the ground of fraud against the person who has a patent obtained from the Interior Department?

Mr. WHITE. I do not think so; I will not say that it is not so, but no such case as that occurs to me at this time.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. WHITE. I do.

Mr. WALSH. The law is clearly as stated by the Senator from Georgia. The statute of limitations is five years against the Government of the United States. The Government must bring an action of fraud within five years.

Mr. WHITE. I do not deny that such a statute exists. I do not know of such a statute.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Will the Senator from Alabama allow me to interrupt him?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. WHITE. One moment before I yield to the Senator. I will ask the Senator from Montana if the limitation to which he refers does not apply to the criminal features of the statute?

Mr. WALSH. No; the limitation of the statute is three years as to all crimes except capital crimes.

Mr. WHITE. Now I yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, what I desired was to make clear the meaning of the question which I asked a few moments ago, as some Senators misunderstood me. My question had reference to procedure by the Government to set aside patents actually issued by the Interior Department based upon the claim of fraud, there being a statutory limitation, as I remember, against such procedure. I had reference to patents issued; and it seemed to me that perhaps the purpose was to treat these leases as grants from the Government and to put a statute of limitations upon them just as statutes of limitation were put upon patents granted.

Mr. WHITE. The reason would not be the same at all, because there the Government of the United States has issued its patent, and on the face of the papers the patentee is the owner of the title.

Mr. SMOOT. And has complied with all the rules.

Mr. WHITE. And has complied with all the rules, has probably made improvements, and is innocently acting upon the idea that the property is his; but the proposition here is that if a lessee who knowingly, willfully, and wantonly violates the provisions of his lease, instead of acting in accordance with it, he must first be notified of his own act, and then the Government is barred by this statute of limitations if suit is not brought in 90 days thereafter. The lessees are greatly favored, as compared with other lessees throughout the country, as under their leases they forfeit their rights by a simple violation of their provisions—they are not received in advance as the lessees under this bill will be if it is passed.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, wherein does that differ from the notice provided for in this bill?

Mr. WHITE. Under this bill the Secretary of the Interior has no right to declare a forfeiture of the lease. He is required to go into court, and at the end of the litigation—not at the beginning, but after a long-drawn-out litigation—it is for the court to determine whether or not provisions of the lease have been violated; and, in the meantime, there has been no declaration on the part of the Government of a forfeiture for violation of the terms of the lease. I doubt very much whether the court under such circumstances could forfeit the lease. The court has no power to act in the premises except judicially.

The bill does not provide that the Secretary of the Interior may declare the lease forfeited, but it says that he may go into court, and at the end of litigation—probably long drawn out—the court will determine whether or not there has been a forfeiture, when no one has declared a forfeiture and when there is no provision in the bill by which such forfeiture could be declared.

Mr. MYERS. I will ask the Senator if he is acquainted with any practice whereby a landlord can merely declare a lease forfeited and oust the tenant without going into court?

Mr. WHITE. Not quite that; but he declares, Mr. President, a forfeiture of the lease, and then it becomes a judicial question to determine whether or not the lease has been forfeited in fact.

Mr. MYERS. I see nothing in the provisions of the bill to keep the Secretary of the Interior from declaring a forfeiture of the lease.

Mr. WHITE. The bill does not provide for such action on his part.

Mr. MYERS. He may declare that the tenant has forfeited his lease, and then leave the question to the court.

Mr. WHITE. There is no provision authorizing that.

Mr. MYERS. He can put such a declaration in his notice, if he wishes to do so, and leave it to the court to say whether or not the lease has been forfeited.

Mr. WHITE. Why, I ask, is the United States Government put at this great disadvantage over all other landlords in the country, when we all know and when we all realize that the Government acts at best at a great disadvantage in that it is only present by some agent, and that agent may be indifferent to the rights of the Government?

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I fail to see any disadvantage. The Government can send any number of inspectors into the Territory of Alaska that it wants to, and every inspector has the right of entrance; he can secure all the knowledge necessary; so that I fail to see any great hardship or disadvantage to the Government in simply requiring it to write out a notice.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, the Government can only act, as I have said, through an agent. There is no selfish interest to the agent to stimulate his diligence. It is the same old proposition that we read of in the Scriptures, where the hireling fled and left the flock when the sheep were attacked by the wolves; but the master was ready to give his life for his sheep. An indifferent agent, falling under the influence of the lessees, might not act at all or might not act for a long period of time; and, then, this provision is carefully worded, so that the forfeiture does not take effect until the final judgment has been entered. Why is that? Why is there not a provision authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to declare a forfeiture and let the forfeiture take effect at that time, and not wait two, three, four, or five years for a long-drawn-out lawsuit to end?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. WHITE. In one moment.

After two, three, four, or five years have elapsed, and before the final judgment has been rendered, the mine may be robbed of everything that is valuable in it; and a forfeiture of the lease by the court at that time would be without any beneficial effect.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I assume that the Senator is discussing this matter for the purpose of enlightening the Senate in regard to it, and I am very anxious to follow the course of his argument, if I can. I should like to know what the practical operation of this provision would be. The Senator wants a clause in the bill, as I understand, providing that the Secretary of the Interior may declare a forfeiture at any time he sees fit. Suppose he does so; then what? Here is a man with a lease operating the property and the Secretary declares the lease forfeited. Then what? The man is in possession; he is operating the mine; and the Secretary has got to go into court to get him out. He can not get him out until there is a final judgment in the case. Now, in the meanwhile, what does he do?

Mr. WHITE. He robs the mine of its coal.

Mr. WALSH. No; I am assuming that the bill is framed as the Senator wants it.

Mr. WHITE. Oh, no.

Mr. WALSH. Oh, yes.

Mr. WHITE. If framed as I want it, he would be accountable to the Government for all the coal that he had taken out after the forfeiture.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, if the forfeiture should occur and the court should adjudicate that there was a forfeiture, the lessee is then accountable for all the coal.

Mr. WHITE. No; because this bill provides that the forfeiture does not take effect until the final judgment is rendered.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, that matter is easily taken care of. When the suit was begun the Government could go into court and ask for an injunction to enjoin the further operation of the mine. We who are accustomed to suits under the mining laws do not trouble about that at all.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, I did not yield the floor except for a question. I will be glad, of course, to answer, if I can, any question the Senator may ask. I am discussing this matter, which relates somewhat remotely to the question now before the Senate, to show the impropriety of overruling the point of order which I have made.

Mr. MYERS. May I inform the Senator what the statute of limitations in Alaska is?

Mr. WHITE. Certainly.

Mr. MYERS. The Senator having challenged me to show that there is a statute of limitations in Alaska——

Mr. WHITE. No; I said the burden was on the Senator; but I will be glad to have the information.

Mr. MYERS. Well, having put the burden on me, I will assume it, and will inform the Senator that the limitation of the statute in actions for the recovery of real property or for the recovery of the possession thereof in Alaska is 10 years. So that there is a statute of limitations there, as in every other country of which I have ever heard.

Mr. WHITE. Will the Senator, as a lawyer, say that that statute of limitations is applicable to the case presented in this discussion?

Mr. MYERS. If there had been no statute of limitations placed by Congress, they would either have to fall back on the statute to which I have referred or there would be none at all; and if that statute is not applicable, Congress then has made one that is applicable. The difference is only in the duration; the principle is the same.

Mr. WHITE. The Senator will not state, as a lawyer, that the statute to which he has referred has any application to the question under discussion; he can not afford to do so, for it does not have any such application; it has no kind of bearing upon the subject. The Senator says that if that statute is not applicable there is no statute; and if there was no statute, then Congress—or, rather, the conference committee—has provided the country with a statute.

Is it possible that the Senate of the United States will impose against the Government of the United States a statute of limitations that has received no consideration in the Senate, that has received no consideration in the House, and is presented for the first time in a conference report, when the Senate itself stands with its hands tied, without the right to offer an amendment? In other words, to secure the good that is in the statute we are made to swallow the bad, and the bad was put in the statute by the conference committee without consideration by either House of Congress.

I have been somewhat interested in the statements made from time to time that this report had to be accepted, or else the other House of Congress would not do anything. If that is the influence that one branch of Congress is to exercise over the other, when they are acting through committees in conference and not by the Houses themselves, then we had better pause and consider what we are doing.

I repeat that we are reversing the policy of the Government if this point of order is not sustained; we are making a statute of limitations against the Government when such is not the case even where statutes of limitation have been enacted, unless the Government is expressly named in the statute.

So much for that.

The next proposition is not so much the effect that this provision may have in this particular bill, but the effect the precedent may have upon the Senate in the future. Is the Senate willing in the future to surrender all of its rights as a legislative body to a committee—not the ordinary committee whose reports we may amend or modify, but a committee of conference—when it seems, at least in some cases—perhaps in this case—that the Members from the Senate did not approve the report, but accepted it because it was demanded by the Members of the House? If the Senate does that, has it not surrendered absolutely all of its powers as a legislative branch of the Government to a committee? Really it has done more than that. It has surrendered its powers and its prerogatives as a legislative body to the members of a committee appointed by the House, because it seems that the Senate conferees yielded their judgment to members of the committee appointed by the House.

We are establishing a precedent, Mr. President—either one that the Senate can stand by in the future with safety, and with assurance that its rights as a legislative body will not be impaired, or a precedent by which it is tying its hands and placing itself helpless at the feet of a conference committee. I do not believe that this should be done.

In the first place, this legislation should not be enacted. It is wrong. We ought not to require the Government of the United States to bring suit within 90 days. Suppose, on account of some defect or some mishap, the suit of the United States be dismissed, not be tried; or suppose through inadvertence or oversight it be allowed to be dismissed, or if by connivance of some officer it is dismissed, then in either of these events the Government could never bring an action again, because the 90 days' statute of limitations would have barred the suit.

Why, this is the most extraordinary legislation that has been offered in this body during the very short time I have been a Member of the Senate. By overruling the point of order we restrict the Senate to one of two courses—we must accept the whole bill or reject it. I insist, Mr. President, that the point of order should be sustained.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I am not opposed to the provisions of this bill; but, clearly, the Senator from Alabama [Mr. WHITE] is right in his contention that the conference committee has exceeded its authority by placing new matter in the conference report.

I shall vote to sustain the point of order made by the Senator from Alabama, and also made by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. LANE], because I believe it is a dangerous practice to give to a conference committee the power to insert new things that have not been considered in either House.

Mr. MYERS obtained the floor.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, before the Senator from Montana proceeds I should like to make a little criticism of the bill with a view of asking his opinion with reference to it.

Mr. MYERS. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I am anxious to support the report of the conferees. My desire is to facilitate the speedy passage of this measure, but the language of this proviso embarrasses me. It says:

That the possession of any lessee of any lands covered by his lease and the operation of the mines and other works thereon or the title of the products thereof shall not be interfered with—

Now, that is broad; it is just as broad as it can be—

by the Secretary of the Interior except after an appropriate proceeding in the district court of Alaska instituted for the purpose of securing—

And so forth.

The Government's mode of procedure is through the Secretary of the Interior. He can only interfere with either the working of the mine or the title of the products by a proceeding in the district court of Alaska, instituted for what purpose?—

For the purpose of securing a forfeiture or termination of such lease, and such forfeiture or termination shall take effect only from the date of entry of final judgment declaring such forfeiture or termination.

Does not that language mean that no interference with the work of a lessee shall be had, and no interference with the title to the products of his work, until a final judgment on a bill filed against him? I hope not.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. BORAH. It seems to me the construction that the Senator from Georgia places upon this language must necessarily be the only construction which can be placed upon it. The Senator will notice that it says:

That the possession of any lessee of any lands covered by his lease—

Now, if it were left to the mere question of possession, that would be all right; but it says:

That the possession of any lessee of any lands covered by his lease and the operation of the mines——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I read those words.

Mr. BORAH. Exactly.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia (reading):

And other works thereon or the title of the products thereof.

Mr. BORAH. Exactly. Now, if it were limited to the question of possession and title of the products, it might be just to say that it should not be interfered with until a forfeiture has been had; but here all questions of operation and of the manner in which the work shall be conducted are apparently excluded, as the Senator says, until a final judgment is rendered.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It was to bring the attention of the Senator from Montana to this language, in order that he might give us the view of the conferees with reference to it, that I rose. If a lessee is proceeding in a way that the department is confident violates the provisions of his lease and disregards the rights of the Government, under circumstances where ordinarily a court of equity would grant a temporary restraining order against the further operation of the mine or a restraining order against the disposition of the proceeds of the mine, does not this language so limit the power of the court that the Government is forbidden from interfering with his possession?

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I wish to make a remark to the Senator at this juncture.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I will yield the floor in a minute.

Mr. MYERS. I just want to make a remark at this juncture.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Certainly.

Mr. MYERS. The language of the bill is:

That the possession of any lessee of any lands covered by his lease and the operation of the mines and other works thereon or the title of the products thereof shall not be interfered with—

By whom?—

by the Secretary of the Interior, except after an appropriate proceeding in the district court of Alaska.

That is, the Secretary of the Interior can not interfere, he can not cause the mine to be shut down, he can not hamper or interfere with the working of it, until after a judgment rendered upon an appropriate proceeding in the district court; but, as my colleague has pointed out, there is nothing to prevent the court, at the time of the institution of the action, from interfering by the issuance of an injunction. The Secretary of the Interior can not interfere, but the court can by injunction.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I think that construction is a fair construction; but that was not the point I was making, nor the point which I understood the Senator from Georgia was urging.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. No.

Mr. BORAH. It takes away from the Secretary of the Interior himself all control over the minutiæ of the operation of these mines, and so forth—the question of proper protection, timbering, and all these things—until he has secured a forfeiture of the lease.

Mr. MYERS. Why, Mr. President, there is nothing to prevent the Secretary of the Interior issuing orders or making rules and regulations about the conduct of the mine. If the lessee obeys, all right. If he does not obey, he can give him notice after a certain time, or he can give him notice at the time of issuing the order, and file an action the same day and get an order of injunction.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The language might even be construed to indicate that the court was not to interfere with the possession of the products.

Mr. MYERS. I do not see how. The Senator would have to read something into the bill which is not there in order to construe it in that way.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. In what way could the Secretary of the Interior interfere except through court proceedings? Is there any statutory power given to him anywhere to cancel the lease or to dispossess the lessee? Has he any power except through the courts?

Mr. MYERS. None whatever; and it was the intention not to vest that arbitrary power in the hands of one man.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Then why put here a specific provision that he should not interfere if no statute gives him the right to interfere?

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I simply want to make a suggestion to the Senator. I take it that a court would not of its own motion issue a temporary injunction. It would have to be done upon the application of the Secretary of the Interior. Now, would not that be an interference that would be prevented? It certainly is an interference on the part of the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not understand how the Secretary of the Interior could interfere, except through the courts, unless some statute that has been passed in connection with these leases gave him the authority to do so.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the Senator from Georgia fails to observe the change of constitutional construction which has come upon the country of late. For some 75 or 100 years in this country it was assumed that the National Government could not do anything except that which it was authorized to do; but of late years the opposite rule has prevailed, and that is that it may do everything which it is not specifically prohibited from doing. It is not exactly in accordance with the Constitution of the United States, but I would not trespass upon the time of the Senate by invoking that instrument as against a statute in these times.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Does the Secretary of the Interior now assume, after property has been patented, to interfere except through the courts? Would he presume, after a lease had been signed and a party put into possession, to interfere except through the courts?

I ask the Senator, because I do not claim to have kept up with the mode of procedure for the past few years. Has the department so changed its mode of management that it interferes with a third party who has been put in possesssion under a contract or under a grant of some kind from the Government, just at the volition of the Secretary of the Interior, without the hand of the court being exercised to control the property?

Mr. BORAH. No; I understand they have not gone that far yet; but the theory has not been fully developed.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It occurs to me that this might be held to mean that the only interference by the Secretary of the Interior must be through the courts, and that he is not to obtain any kind of restraining order, and that there is to be no interference of any kind until final judgment with one of these lessees. That was disturbing me also.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, this measure bristles with provisions that the Secretary of the Interior may make all needful rules and regulations for the conduct of the mines which are leased, and unless there were some such provision put in here it might be construed that he had power to enforce his own rules and regulations, to hold the lessee to some kind of accountability for not living up to the rules and regulations. But the line is clearly drawn by this measure. The law gives the Secretary of the Interior the right to make the rules and regulations, but gives the court the right to declare a forfeiture for not living up to those rules and regulations. The Secretary can make the rules and regulations. He may send inspectors and agents there to see that they are being complied with. He may get all the needful information that the occasion may require. It provides that his agents and inspectors may have the right of entrance at any time; that they may have the right to inspect and see what is going on, and that they shall report to the Secretary of the Interior; but there is to be no interference with the possession or the operation except through the judgment of the court. While the Secretary of the Interior may not interfere, in his official capacity he applies to the court, with nothing to prevent the court, upon the application, from issuing an injunction to stop the working of the mines until the question may be determined in due process of law.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, is it not true that under the reclamation law the Secretary of the Interior is given the power to forfeit the contract of the settler and the rights of the settler without any action on the part of the court, and did we not reject an amendment to that law during the last session in which it was attempted to provide that there should be no forfeiture until the court acted upon the matter?

Mr. MYERS. That is true, Mr. President. There were a number who thought that that amendment ought not to be rejected; but from the mere fact that it may be wise and prudent to clothe the Secretary of the Interior with that power in regard to a reclamation project, which is in comparatively close proximity to the location of the Secretary of the Interior, which is close at hand, and which probably involves 40 or 80 acres of land, I do not think it is necessarily true that the Secretary of the Interior ought to be vested with the same plenary power in regard to subjects matter thousands of miles away, in an inaccessible country, and where it involves hundreds of thousands of dollars, perhaps. A man may have half a million or a million dollars invested in mining in Alaska. I am told that it will take half a million dollars to successfully operate a mine on any considerable scale there for commercial purposes. To say that he should be deprived of all his investment and all his property rights and all his vested rights and all the capital invested there simply on the ipse dixit of one man, perhaps without a hearing, without a notice, and without trial, is to my mind monstrous, and in no way analogous to the little reclamation example which the Senator has cited.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

Mr. MYERS. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska now, and then I will yield further to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Is it not true that both the section as adopted by the House and the section as adopted by the Senate, the two being very nearly identical, placed in the hands of the court the power to say whether or not the lease should be forfeited?

Mr. MYERS. Yes.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. If it is to be placed in the hands of the court, what is the reason for inserting this clause here, which seems to provide a technicality by which the court itself might be estopped later on from canceling and declaring forfeited a lease that might be entirely unworthy of being carried out?

Mr. MYERS. To what technicality does the Senator refer?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I will submit it to the Senator. Suppose the Attorney General or the officer of the Government who might be the district attorney for Alaska failed to bring suit within 90 days—and such things have happened, through the neglect of officials, sometimes through worse offenses—would the Government then lose an entirely good case and the lessee continue to hold his lease after he should have forfeited it?

Mr. MYERS. I will answer that in a minute. I had intended to get to that point, but I will take up first——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Will not the Senator answer it right at this point?

Mr. MYERS. Right now?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Right now.

Mr. MYERS. I wanted to see first what the Senator from Idaho had to say, but I will answer. It was the thought of the conferees to enact a bill which would be a workable bill, and which would result in the leasing of some coal lands in Alaska. If this legislation is to be barren of results, then no good is accomplished by its enactment. I apprehend men who have hundreds of thousands of dollars to invest in coal lands in Alaska will want to know, before they go into that far-away country under great disadvantages and engage in this hazardous occupation, what rights they are going to have, and whether or not they may be summarily put out of business by some agent or inspector or examiner who goes there.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. If the Senator will permit me an interruption, the bill as enacted by the Senate and the bill as enacted by the House did not permit anybody to put the lessee out in such a summary way. It provided that he could only be put out and his lease could only be canceled by an order of the court. Now, I ask the Senator, why is the Government restricted within 90 days? That is the question. Everybody agrees—the House and the Senate are in accord—in holding that the man could only be evicted and his lease canceled as the result of a court hearing and a court order. So what the Senator alleges about the summary proceeding has nothing to do with this case. The only question as I can see it is why should the Government be restricted to bringing a suit within 90 days. Why should a loophole be offered in the case of a lessee whose lease should be canceled? Why should he be given a loophole to hold possession forever because the Government agent might fail to bring the suit within 90 days?

Mr. MYERS. I was just going to answer that, and I will get to it immediately. I say the conferees thought that the power should be lodged in the court, and they thought if the lessee had subjected himself to forfeiture on account of not complying with the rules or regulations, or for any other cause, he was entitled to know what the Government was going to do about it; that he was entitled to know whether the Government was going to act on that complaint and accept the report of an inspector or examiner, and whether the Government was going to bring an action for a forfeiture of the lease. The lessee may be intending to extend his work, to tunnel in other directions——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Let me interrupt the Senator there. If that is very important—and I do not think it is an important matter to the lessee—I think as long as he is in possession he can go on in his operation; but if it was sought to enable the lessee to find out, then why not insert a provision that the lessee might take the initiative and bring it into court and secure a decision?

Mr. MYERS. I do not think that would be fair.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It seems to me the conferees have put into the bill a trap whereby the Government may lose its rights through a mere technicality, through the mere neglect for one day of the Attorney General or the district attorney.

Mr. MYERS. Not for 1 day; for 90 days.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. But if he goes 91 days the Government is estopped forever.

Mr. MYERS. The Government does not have to give a notice until it has the case prepared. It has its own time. If the Government decides the lease is to be forfeited, it has all the power in the world to send inspectors there, to get all the knowledge it needs, to get all the facts, to call witnesses, and to prepare its pleading and to have the action ready for trial. It may give notice one day and file the action the next day or the same day.

I do not think there is any ground for saying that it is a trap laid or that there is anything disadvantageous to the Government. If the Government has reason to believe that its rules and regulations are not being observed and that waste is taking place, and that the terms of the lease are not being complied with, it may take a day or a month or a year to astisfy itself of those facts if it wants to do it. It does not have to satisfy itself and give notice to-day or next month or next year. It can take its own time to do that, and it has all the time needed. It is not limited in any way. There is no limitation upon it. Having taken all the time it needs and having informed itself fully of the facts and even perhaps prepared its pleading, it can then give notice and it can file a suit immediately if it wants to do it. There is no manner or way on earth in which the Government can be trapped into losing any rights. Does not the Senator see that the Government can take as long as it wants to investigate and satisfy itself and to give this notice, and then it can bring suit the next day if it wants to do so?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. If the Government were a single individual, that would be one thing; but everybody knows there are many officials in the Government, and to put in a statute of limitation of 90 days, something almost unheard of in its brevity, seems to me to deliberately invite men to take advantage of a technicality against the Government officials.

Mr. MYERS. It is not a statute of limitations of 90 days. The limitation does not run from the time of the arising of the cause of action or from the knowledge of it or the discovery of it by the Government. It is only so many days after notice is given; that is all. It is really no statute of limitations at all. The Government can take 10 years if it wants to.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I asked the Senator why it should be limited to 90 days. He says it is because the lessee might be inconvenienced in making his further operations. To that I reply that it would be easy then to insert a provision that he could go into court and bring it to a head, but not that the Government should be forever barred.

Mr. MYERS. I do not think the lessees are hunting lawsuits. They want to be free from that.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I say, furthermore, the Senate went on record when it took this power out of the hands of the Secretary of the Interior. I voted to do it. I was willing to submit it to a court. I was willing to take it out of the hands of the Secretary of the Interior and place it in the hands of a court; but I am not willing to say that if the Secretary of the Interior or some agent of the Government or some district attorney takes 91 days instead of 90 days after the notice is given then the Government of the United States shall be forever barred, no matter how good its cause. I say if the Senator desires to give these lessees an opportunity to bring the thing to a head it would have been easy to provide that that should be done by allowing the lessee to go into court, not barring the Government if some agent of the Government fails to act.

Furthermore, Mr. President, I do not believe that any provision of this sort is necessary to invite investments. I believe that the bill is a liberal one to the lessee. I believe it holds out an attractive field for investment, and I think it would be an inexcusable blunder if in passing the bill we insert this clause, which evidently it was beyond the power of the conference committee to insert. There was no difference between the House and the Senate in this matter. The House and the Senate were in substantial accord. The conference committee has run in something absolutely new and has run it in for the benefit of men who might desire to take advantage of technicalities against the Government.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK], as well as the Senator from Alabama [Mr. WHITE], are entirely mistaken in calling it a statute of limitations. It is not a statute of limitations at all. There is no limitation on the Government as to the time when a cause of action shall arise. It is just like this: In our State we have a provision in the statute which says that in the case of unlawful detaining of real estate the owner of the property—the landlord—must give the occupant three days' notice to give up the property, and then he may bring his action. You might say that he has only three days in which to bring the action. He does not give the notice unless he wants to give it. The Government does not have to give this notice unless it wants to give it. It does not have to give any notice at all; and if it does, it may give it when it pleases.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Will the Senator yield to me for just a moment?

Mr. MYERS. Certainly.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. To the average layman's mind, with all this talk about a mystifying statute of limitations being put in, whether you call it a statute of limitations or otherwise, how can the Senator get around these plain words:

Provided further, That such court proceedings must be instituted within 90 days after notice to the lessee of the facts constituting such cause of action, or the same shall be forever barred.

The fact is, in the final analysis and in the solution of this bill, if this measure is passed, should the United States fail to complete its case within 90 days, the title to the land would forever pass from the people and go into the hands of these buccaneers. If it does not mean that, in God's name what does it mean?

Mr. MYERS. It takes language to answer a question as well as to ask it.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. The Senator may answer it, but the average layman can not be mystified with this thing. As the Senator knows, I am opposed to this whole bill.

Mr. MYERS. I thought that was the ground of the Senator's objection.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. It is a broad and a liberal ground. I do not believe in giving the coal lands away. I believe in the Government simply owning the land and letting it mine the coal for the people; but it shows to me that there is an uncanny thought. I say this respectfully and kindly to the Senator, for we are the best of friends, but I do say that to the plain, average man this is a sort of thimble-rigging process on the part of the grafters as against the rights and interests of the people.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, the Senator is entirely wrong in saying that the Government would lose title to that land.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. What do these words mean, let me ask you——

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LEA of Tennessee). Does the Senator from Montana yield, and to whom?

Mr. MYERS. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. WALSH. I should like to satisfy the Senator from New Jersey, as well as the Senator from Nebraska, who I am sure are desirous of understanding this provision and the necessity for it. It is altogether erroneous to talk about its being a statute of limitations. It bears no relation to a statute of limitations. It has to do with an action in equity brought before a court in equity to decree a forfeiture of a lease. Equity abhors a forfeiture and will never enforce it unless there is a plain violation of a contract requiring forfeiture. If the party claiming the forfeiture does anything at all recognizing the continuing existence of the lease after he has knowledge that the right of forfeiture exists, he thereby waives his right to claim the forfeiture. For instance, if a forfeiture of a lease is claimed for failure to pay rent, and the rent has become due, and the landlord accepts payment of the accrued rent, he thereby waives his right to insist upon a forfeiture on account of the nonpayment of the rent. He has not six years within which to begin an action to have a court of equity decree a forfeiture on account of the breach. He has not a day after he gets notice of it, beyond a reasonable time within which to institute an action, and he must do nothing meanwhile to recognize the continuance of the leasehold. Let me call the Senator's attention——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Will the Senator stop right there? The Senator will not claim that the Government is estopped the same as a private individual?

Mr. WALSH. Of course the Government is estopped.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Government of the United States is not bound as a private individual is bound.

Mr. WALSH. The Government of the United States is bound by exactly the same rules when it becomes a landlord.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Government of the United States can take money from an individual, and does it time and again in public-land cases, and it is not bound at all as a private individual.

Mr. WALSH. That is quite a different proposition.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The same rules that apply to a private individual do not apply to the Government.

Mr. WALSH. That is quite a different proposition. I want to read from Tiffany's Landlord and Tenant.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. In answer to the Senator who has just tried to explain to me——

Mr. WALSH. If the Senator will pardon me, I want to make it clear to the Senator that this is an extension of the right of the Government; it is not a limitation on the Government at all. If it were not for this statute, the Government would be barred to start this suit. Immediately upon its receiving notice of the breach it must at its peril begin suit. Under this statute it has three months after it gives the lessee notice of the breach within which to start action.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. It does not say so here.

Mr. SMOOT. I want to say to the Senator that that was not the intention of the conferees nor is it the position taken by the conferees. The position taken by the conferees was that they did not think it proper that the Secretary of the Interior should have a year or two years or three years to give notice, but that the lessee was entitled to receive notice within 90 days.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. What right had the conferees to go into new matter, which had not been discussed or considered by either House?

Mr. SMOOT. I assume that the——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Are the conferees to legislate in an independent way?

Mr. WALSH. If the Senator will let me finish——

Mr. MYERS. I yield to my colleague to finish his statement.

Mr. WALSH. I read from Tiffany's Landlord and Tenant, page 1306, volume 2:

> As before stated, the question whether the breach of a condition subsequent shall have the effect of terminating the tenant's estate is ordinarily a matter wholly in the option of the landlord; that is, the landlord may or may not enforce a forfeiture for such a breach. Sometimes, however, by his language or conduct after a breach of condition, he elects that the tenancy shall go on as before, and thereby precludes himself from thereafter enforcing a forfeiture; that is, as it is usually expressed, he thereby "waives" the forfeiture. Ordinarily, if the landlord, after knowledge on his part of a breach of condition by the tenant, does any act which recognizes the tenancy as still existent in spite of such breach, he thereby precludes himself from enforcing a forfeiture for such breach, and the fact that he did not intend, by such conduct, to waive his right of forfeiture is immaterial in this regard. A case might perhaps occur in which actual knowledge by the landlord of the breach of condition would not be necessary in order that his conduct might take effect as a waiver, the breach being such that he is chargeable with knowledge thereof, but ordinarily actual knowledge is necessary.

The idea might as well be dismissed that if it were not for this provision the Government of the United States would have 6 years or 10 years after a breach had occurred within which to commence suit to recover possession, because after the breach has occurred under the general law, if it did anything at all to recognize the continuing existence of the lease, its right to forfeiture would be gone.

For instance, Mr. President, if it took the royalty accruing under the lease after the breach, it would thereby recognize the continuance of the lease and would be precluded from enforcing the forfeiture. This law provides that an accounting for royalties must be made every month. We will say a breach occurs on the 1st day of May of a condition in regard to the method of mining or of a provision for the care of the men employed. The Government is informed about it on the 1st day of May or the 5th day of May or the 10th day of May. On the 1st day of June it takes the stipulated royalty; on the 1st day of July it takes the royalty. Now, under the general law it would be precluded from insisting upon a forfeiture of that lease by reason of such breach, but under this statute it has three months after notice to the lessee is given setting out the facts constituting the breach.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. MYERS. I yield.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The explanation given by the senior Senator from Montana is entirely different from and inconsistent with the explanation given by the junior Senator from Montana.

Mr. MYERS. I wish to say I have had no time to give any explanation yet.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The senior Senator——

Mr. MYERS. When a Senator asks a question and lets me utter about six words and interrupts me with another question, that is not giving an answer to a question.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I understood the Senator from Montana to have said 90 days were given because it was unjust that the Government should have an indefinite time, and to that I replied that that could have been cured by giving the lessee an opportunity to go into court if he was anxious to find out.

Mr. MYERS. That is the Senator's theory that the Government has not in toto declared a forfeiture.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The senior Senator from Montana states this is done for the benefit of the Government; that otherwise the Government would not have one day; that it would be estopped if it had taken a royalty on a single ton of coal. I can not believe that doctrine. I can not believe that an official of the Government, by accepting money from a delinquent, would bind the Government, and I doubt whether the Senator can bring here any authority to support that contention. If there is such a contention, then the thing that the committee should have done was to have put in a provision to protect the Government, but not to protect the lessee, because there should be no forfeiture. It should not be possible for any official of the Government, by taking money for an extra ton of coal, to bind the Government and estop it from taking other action. It is a dangerous and outrageous doctrine that the sovereignty should be bound by the rules of estoppel which bind private individuals. If the committee desired to protect the Government and the public interest, it should have inserted a provision that the Government should not be estopped by the action of its representatives in continuing to accept money from a lease which was subject to forfeiture.

Mr. WALSH. That is exactly what it has done. The Government is accorded three months in which to begin.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I may be excused from differing from the Senator. I do not think three months are adequate. I believe that that is inserting new matter in this law.

Mr. MYERS. I call the Senator's attention to a fact that he seems to entirely overlook. The Government does not have to give this notice until it gets ready and sees fit.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I understand that one official may give the notice. It may be the duty of another official to bring the suit. But between the two the opportunity is given here for the Government to be estopped and prevented, and I do not think that is proper legislation.

Mr. MYERS. The whole matter of the litigation and everything else is in the hands of the district attorney.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. When the bill was before the Senate the simple question was whether the Secretary of the Interior or a United States court should decide whether or not a lease had been forfeited, and the Senate decided that rather than give so much power to the Secretary of the Interior it would place it in the hands of the court. Now, the committee goes further and proposes to limit the Government and provide that if it does not act within 90 days after notice is given it is estopped; it is cut off and deprived of its right to forfeit the lease. I think that is a dangerous technicality inserted there, which may cost the Government a great many leases through the neglect of the officers.

Mr. MYERS. It gives the Government all the time it wants to give notice. That is something that we can not get away from.

Now I wish to resume answering some questions asked me about the matter. The Senator from New Jersey spoke about the Government forever losing title to the land. Of course there can be nothing to that. The language is "the title of the products" of the mine.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Very well; but a 99-year lease is practically equivalent to giving the mine away.

Mr. MYERS. And the lessee can have no greater title to the products than the lease gives him. He could not have absolute title to the products. Of course that can not be interfered with except by the judgment of a court. I think that is entirely proper, and that is what the Senate bill really provides in substance, as the Senator from Nebraska has said.

While the Senator from Nebraska has said that my answer differs somewhat from that of my able colleague [Mr. WALSH], I was answering the question on the Senator's own theory and trying to show that no harm whatsoever could be done to the Government; that no disadvantage could be worked to the Government; and that the Government could not fall into a trap, as the Senator has said in very plain language. The reason why the Government can not fall into any trap and why there can be no trap is that this whole matter is in the hands of the Government and the district court for the district of Alaska. The district attorney does not have to give the notice until he gets ready, and he need never give it at all if he thinks the complaint is not worthy or deserving or not well grounded; but once the district attorney or any other agent of the Government working under the district attorney in the District of Alaska sees fit to give that notice, then there is an element of justice to the lessee to be considered. Certainly his rights should be considered somewhat in the matter. I do not, as the Senator from New Jersey has said, class the lessee as a buccaneer. This bill was not drawn on the theory that every man who takes one of these leases is a thief and a robber, but that a man who puts hundreds of thousands of dollars, a half million dollars, or perhaps a million dollars into a lease has some rights and is a factor that is entitled to some consideration in the matter.

The officials of the Government having had complaints made to them, perhaps through an inspector or through any other avenue that the Secretary of the Interior provides, that rules and regulations are being violated by a lessee, the district attorney, the law officer of the Government, may decide that such complaint is not well grounded and not petition for the forfeiture of the lease. He does not have to give any notice at all; but after having thoroughly satisfied himself, after having gone to the full extent in this matter and prepared himself for the legal battle which he is going to bring on, he gives the required notice. The notice having been given, is not the lessee entitled to know whether or not he is going to be haled into court? Is he to go on forever with that sword hanging over his head which may drop at any moment? The further expenditure of hundreds of thousands of dollars may depend on whether or not he is going to be haled into court and his lease forfeited.

Mr. LANE. I should like to ask the Senator, if the lessee were doing right, what harm it would do to him to have a sword hanging over his head to drop if he did wrong?

Mr. MYERS. He wants to know from the court whether the court says he is doing right or wrong.

Mr. LANE. I should like to ask the Senator if the lessee does not himself know whether he is doing right or wrong?

Mr. MYERS. I often think I am doing right when other people think I am doing wrong. I think I am right about this bill, but the Senator from Oregon and the Senator from New Jersey think I am wrong.

Mr. LANE. I have noticed that.

Mr. MYERS. It is up to the Senate to decide it.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me to make a suggestion, I wish to say that I was one of the conferees on this bill. The purpose of the bill was, first, to try the scheme of leasing the coal lands in Alaska. We apprehended the difficulty of getting anybody to take coal leases at all. All the coal operators say that nobody will take such leases.

In regard to the particular matter under discussion, I will ask the Senator from Nebraska if he thinks it is fair, after the Government has had all the time it wants to work up its case, that it should thereafter have an indefinite time in which to bring the action, meanwhile keeping the lessee in suspense? Suppose, for instance, that my colleague [Mr. ASHURST] is a leaseholder and the Government claims that he has violated the rules and regulations. He claims that he has not done so. The United States Government, through its legal department, says to him, "You have been violating your lease, and we give you notice now that we are going to proceed to a forfeiture of it." In the meantime the Government has had ample opportunity to investigate and to work up its case, and then it has 90 days within which to bring the action. Is not that time enough for it to bring suit to determine whether or not the lease should be forfeited? If the Government does not bring suit within the 90 days, can you not conceive of the calamity that might happen to the leaseholder? The Government might keep the threat of a lawsuit hanging over him until the expiration of his term, and make it almost impracticable for him to operate the property because of a fear that a forfeiture would be worked. So that, in order to get him from under this sword of Damocles, if you please, it is provided that, after notice is served on him, the Government must bring the suit within 90 days.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, there are two answers to the question asked by the Senator from Arizona. One is that the object could have been attained by permitting the lessee to go into court and test the matter; the other answer is the answer given by the Senator from Montana—that this does not extend the Government's rights at all, or that this was necessary in order to give the Government a right of extension. Who is right? One conferee says that this is done for the purpose of enabling the Government to have 90 days' time, whereas it would otherwise have no time. The other conferee says that this limitation is necessary in order to make it impossible for the sword of Damocles to hang indefinitely over the head of the lessee.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. They do not give notice until they are ready to forfeit.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I understand that. We understand the terms, we understand the facts; but I say one of the conferees takes the position that this is a limitation, and that the limitation is for the purpose of protecting the man from the sword of Damocles.

Mr. MYERS. I have expressly denied that. It is not a statute of limitations.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The other conferee takes the position that it is for the benefit of the Government and not for the benefit of the lessee.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I was not talking of the benefit to either. I was talking of absolute justice between the lessor and the lessee.

Mr. WALSH. I wish to inform the Senator from Nebraska that I am not one of the conferees.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator from Montana was practically in charge of the bill in the Senate. The bill was thrashed out and thoroughly discussed; it was discussed in the other House; and now the conferees, of their own motion, without any warrant from either the House or the Senate, have inserted a brand-new provision in the bill which I think endangers the whole thing. It opens the door to such similar frauds as were perpetrated in Alaska when we had a hard fight to save the coal lands, when we had to drive a Secretary of the Interior from office and arouse the public sentiment of this country to protect the coal lands from proceedings of that sort.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I for one protest against the conclusion which the Senator reaches. He may reach it as his own opinion, but nevertheless every possible effort has been made to avoid such conditions as those growing out of the Cunningham controversy. There can be no question of that kind raised in this case. None but a very suspicious mind could ever entertain the idea that because the Government is required to give notice that it is going to bring suit and must bring the suit within a specified time, therefore it is intended to bring about a situation under which there may be a repetition of the Cunningham controversy. I do not think that should be held here before the country as a scarecrow to defeat a good bill. The Cunningham claims are not involved in the bill, and it would be impossible for such a controversy to arise under the bill. If notice is given by the Government and a lease is forfeited, the Government will get the land back. I do not think that the suggestion should be made that because there is a requirement that the Government as the lessor of the land shall give notice to the lessee before it can bring a suit some unscrupulous persons will get hold of Alaska.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I went all through that coal-land fight in the House of Representatives, and I know something about it. I know that the coal-land thieves came here to Washington and secured legislation; I know they came here to Washington and applied at the Department of the Interior and secured a decision; I know they controlled officials in Alaska; and I am not willing to have anything put into this bill which, by opening the door to technicalities, will also open it to those men or to any other men like them to get possession of Government property and hold it.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I agree with the Senator as to that, and will ask him to show how such a contingency could happen under this bill.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I say that question was not left open in the Senate and was not left open in the other House, and the conferees went beyond their power when they undertook to put this provision in the bill.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I beg to assuage the fears and the excitement of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] by assuring him that no coal-land thieves appeared before the conferees when this bill was under consideration.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I did not say that. I hope the Senator will not put language into my mouth.

Mr. MYERS. I think that was a very fair inference from the Senator's statement that the coal-land thieves had again got in their work on this bill.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I said that as a justification for avoiding any legislation which would open the door to performances of that sort I wanted to retain the provisions of the bill as it passed the Senate and as it passed the House of Representatives in this particular, and I object to a new provision going into a bill like this without any opportunity to discuss it.

The only matter we discussed here in reference to that question was whether the Secretary of the Interior or the court should declare a forfeiture; that is all there was to it, and in order to give every opportunity to investors we said, "We shall give to the court the power to declare a forfeiture." Now, here is a brand-new provision, which ties the hands of the Government by requiring it to begin action within 90 days after the notice is given; and I say the hands of the Government should not be tied. If the Senator desires to give the lessee an opportunity to get an early decision, let him be authorized to go into court, but do not insert a provision which will tie the hands of the Government and forever close the door for an attack upon the lease of that grant if the Government fails to act or its agent fails to act within 90 days.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I shall in a few moments conclude my observations on the points which have been raised, and I prefer to do so without further interruption, unless it be for a question. If any Senator wishes to ask a question, I shall be glad to answer it. I have not yet, however, finished answering the questions put to me when the Senator from Nebraska first rose.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I desire, then, merely to ask the Senator a question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. MYERS. With pleasure.

Mr. LEWIS. I have had some association with subjects touching Alaska particularly and that part of the country; and, of course, I am acquainted, as many of us are who have lived in the West, with the controversies which have arisen regarding it. May I ask the Senator from Montana, the chairman of the committee, if the object of this change to which he alludes, and to which reference has been made by the Senator from Arizona, is merely to put the lessees of the Government in connection with the Alaska lands in exact relation with the Government as are the ordinary lessee and lessor and landlord and tenant in the ordinary affairs of contract in the life of human beings anywhere else in the United States?

Mr. MYERS. Yes; considering the difference in the conditions between Alaska and the remainder of the country and the fact that the Government is a party to the contract.

Mr. LEWIS. The lease is to be one that is to be forfeitable; and if the ordinary notice of ejectment is not complied with, the Government may go to the court and eject the tenant on whatever ground it may have?

Mr. MYERS. That was the idea.

Mr. LEWIS. Is that the theory?

Mr. MYERS. Yes.

Mr. LEWIS. In other words, it is simply applying the law of landlord and tenant or the law of lessee and lessor to the coal lands in Alaska?

Mr. MYERS. Yes; so far as they may be made applicable to Alaska under the circumstances.

Mr. LANE. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator a question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. MYERS. With pleasure.

Mr. LANE. If that was the intent, I should like to ask why it was not so stated in plain terms?

Mr. MYERS. We think we have said so; we did not have to say so in plain terms; we think the language of the bill says so.

Now, Mr. President, I resume where I left off. My colleague has taken the position that the Government would be entitled to no time at all after the discovery of the reason of the cause of action or the cause of forfeiture——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I hope the Senator will talk a little louder, so that we can all hear him.

Mr. MYERS. I did not think there was any difficulty about my voice carrying.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I could not hear the Senator.

Mr. MYERS. My colleague has stated the law, in his opinion, to be that in the absence of some such provision as this the Government would have no time at all in which to bring action after learning that the cause of forfeiture had arisen. By this provision the Government is given 90 days in which to bring its action, where otherwise it would not have any time at all. I yield to my colleague's opinion of the law as to that.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Does the junior Senator from Montana think that the Government would have no time unless this 90-day provision were put in?

Mr. MYERS. He does. Was not the Senator here when my colleague expressed his views?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Unfortunately, I was out of the Chamber for a few moments at that time.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I stated my position to be that, without express provision in the law, if a forfeiture in the lease occurs, the Government might immediately institute an action to declare the forfeiture and have the lease terminated; but if it did not do that, if it afterwards took rent or royalty under the lease and treated it as a subsisting obligation, it would thereby waive the forfeiture and could not thereafter be heard to assert that the lease was canceled. That is the rule applicable between landlord and tenant in all cases. Now, the bill here provides that the Government shall give notice, and that they shall have 90 days after a notice is given in which to begin the action.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I accept that conclusion of the law. I claim that, in justice to the lessee, the Government ought to bring its action within a reasonable time, and I think 90 days is sufficient. There is an element of justice to the lessee in this matter which should be considered; he should not be entirely without consideration. In viewing it from that standpoint, in looking at it in that light, from the rights of the lessee, as I was about to say a while ago when I reached that point, if the Government has cause to believe that the rules and regulations are being violated, and its inspector or examiner investigates the mines and reports to the officials that there is cause for forfeiture of the lease, the Government can take all the time it desires for further investigation; it can take a year or 5 years or 10 years to look into the matter if it so wishes; it is its own master of time and conduct; and, having taken all the time that it desires—and there is nothing to prevent it doing so—and having caused notice to be served on the lessee that there is cause for forfeiture of the lease, that the rules and regulations are being violated, then I say that the Government, having taken its own time to give that notice, and having given that notice, it ought within a reasonable time—and I think 90 days is a reasonable time—to bring action to have the matter settled in court. The lessee may very likely believe, and almost inevitably in all cases will believe, that he is not violating the rules and regulations—that there is no cause for forfeiture of the lease. He may often, and doubtless generally will, honestly be of that belief; there may be an honest difference of opinion between the Government and the lessee in that respect. Then the lessee should not have that notice, which is nothing more nor less than a threat of a suit, to be hanging over his operations forever or for the lifetime of his lease, which may be 50 years.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. MYERS. With great pleasure.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Under this bill who is required to serve that notice on the lessee?

Mr. MYERS. The bill does not say. The Secretary of the Interior, however, has the making of all needful rules and regulations, and may, if he sees fit, make a rule or regulation designating a person to serve such notice. That is a minor detail not covered by the bill. The Secretary of the Interior may say who shall perform that function, and may select anybody he chooses.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The notice would have to come from the Secretary of the Interior himself, as the result of his own conclusion, unless he prescribes some one else by rule to perform that office.

Mr. MYERS. I suppose he could do it himself, or designate some one else to do it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I say the power of direction upon the subject would be vested in the Secretary of the Interior under his authority to make rules and regulations.

Mr. MYERS. I think so; I do not see why it would not be so vested.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. And the power would rest, then, in him unless by some rule or regulation he placed it on some one else?

Mr. MYERS. I should judge so. He is the man to make the rules and regulations, and he is the one to send out the inspectors and examiners to see whether the rules and regulations are being violated.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The authority to represent the Government is vested in him?

Mr. MYERS. I think that is the natural conclusion.

The point I wish to impress upon Senators is that notice having been given, which is virtually notice of a lawsuit, the threat of a lawsuit, it would not be fair to let that threat hang over the lessee for years and years. His lease may have 49 years yet to run, it may have 50 years yet to run, and it would not be fair or just or proper to let that threat hang over him, to let that uncertainty, that cloud upon his title, you might say, hang over him during all the remaining years of his lease. He might want to borrow money to carry on his operations, but he could not raise a dollar with that notice, with that threat of action by the United States Government hanging over him; and I believe the Government, after having taken all the time it desires to give the notice, ought to settle the dispute by bringing the action, and let the court decide the controversy.

The idea that the Senator from Nebraska advances, that the lessee ought to bring the action, I think, is unreasonable. Men who invest hundreds of thousands of dollars in mining operations are not hunting lawsuits; they are not bestirring themselves to bring action in the courts; they want to avoid that very thing; and, the Government being the complainant, the Government inspector or examiner being the moving body in the matter, the burden rests upon the Government to prove its allegations that the rules or regulations are being violated.

I do not see how the lessee could bring the action; I do not see how he would go about it and undertake to prove a negative or to prove something that as yet has not been established, to prove something that has not been shown, to prove that he is not violating rules and regulations. Until the complaint is filed, until the pleadings are in and an issue is raised, the lessee would not know what allegations he had to meet. It would be supreme folly for him to go into court and be combating in the dark. He would not know what to combat; he would not know the specifications; he would not know the charges. It is absolutely unreasonable and untenable that the lessee should bring the action and try to prove a negative or to disprove something that has not been charged against him as yet in legal form in the shape of a complaint in an action. It would be impossible; he could not do it. The Government has to bring the action and establish its charges; and I think the Government ought to do so in order to relieve the lessee of the odium of a charge and notice hanging over him.

I think that if we are to have an Alaskan coal-leasing law we ought to have a workable law; we ought to have a law which would invite capital. If there are no leases entered into, this law will be barren of results, and that is not what we are legislating for. We want a law that will attract capital. It will take money, and lots of money, to develop the coal resources of Alaska and to mine the coal there. It is a very difficult undertaking, and in order to invite capital there and to be sure of letting some leases, I think that the lessees ought to be informed of what they have to confront, what the procedure is going to be, what the Government is going to do if a charge arises of violating the rules and regulations promulgated by the department.

The conferees put this provision in because they thought it would be fair to the Government and they thought it would be fair to the lessee. There is absolutely no statute of limitations about it; it is simply a detail of the law, so that the lessee will know what he will have to confront and the Government may know what to do in case differences arise.

The Senate bill provided that these differences should be adjusted in court; that the parties should go into court and have their differences adjudicated; and the mere fact that the conferees have added to that a minor detail that the Government shall give notice if it is going to bring suit, and then brings the action within 90 days, I hold is no substantial departure from the Senate bill. It is not an essential; it is clearly adding a minor detail of procedure; it is not putting in a statute of limitations where there was none before; it is merely making the statute and the intention of the lawmakers more explicit, and I do not believe that it is a departure from the substance and intent of the Senate bill. It is only making it a little plainer, a little better for both the parties, for the Government and for the lessee. It is letting them both know what they will have to confront and what they will have to do. It is for the benefit of both and harms nobody, so far as I can see; and I do not believe that the point of order that it adds a statute of limitations where there was none before is well taken.

While this provision was put in by the conferees, I am free to say it was suggested by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN], and owing to the fact that for several years he lived in and followed the pursuit of mining in Alaska, what he has to say about the subject has great weight with me, and had great weight with me in agreeing to put this provision in the conference report.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. MYERS. With pleasure.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I merely desire to ask the Senator a question. The Senator has called attention to section 15 and has shown that the last clause of that section did provide a statute of limitations, the application of certain rules of limitation by statute. Section 15, as passed by the Senate, used this language:

> All causes against the United States brought under the provisions of this act shall be tried in the same manner and under the same rules as controversies between citizens.

If that clause carries the ordinary rule of limitation, it would be limited to causes against the United States. It does not indicate that any statute of limitation should apply against the United States, does it?

Mr. MYERS. I do not think the point which I made was well taken. I do not think there is any question of a statute of limitations in it at all. I will concede there was none before the bill went to conference, and I claim there is none now. It is not a limitation at all, as my colleague, I think, has plainly shown, and as I have contended, after looking into the matter and thinking of it more thoroughly.

If we pass this bill in such shape that the lessees will find their occupation of coal lands full of uncertainty, not knowing with what they are going to be confronted, and with, at least, the condition confronting them to their knowledge that the Government may serve notice on them that they are violating the rules and regulations—and it is very reasonable to serve notice of violation, because there is no use of having regulations unless you are going to serve notice that they are being violated—if you leave it in this condition, that the Government may serve such a notice and have an indefinite length of time in which to follow it up with an action, I do not believe, and the conference committee did not believe, that you were going to get anybody to take leases in Alaska and invest money up there for the mining of coal. You have to make it definite, plain, clear, and concise in order to induce men to put hundreds of thousands of dollars up there and let them know what is going to confront them. If you should leave it open in that vague way, so that the Government may undertake to charge a man with violating the rules and regulations and yet never prosecute the matter to an adjudication in court, the conferees did not believe anybody would ever invest any money in coal mining in Alaska, and believed there never would be a single lease let.

That was the judgment of all of the conferees. It was especially the judgment of the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN], who lived and followed mining as a vocation in Alaska for several years; and, as I say, what he says on the subject has great weight with me, because he knows the conditions better than I do, and, I think, better than most of us do.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to interrupt him?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. MYERS. With pleasure.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I find, on page 5 of the comparative print of the bill, as passed by the Senate, this provision, in order to safeguard the people:

> Provided, That no more than one of said blocks shall be included in any lease.

As the bill comes from the conference committee that is stricken out.

Mr. MYERS. Oh, it is in the bill at several other places, and it was a mere repetition at that point.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. It is stricken out here.

Mr. MYERS. Yes.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. What, in the name of Heaven, was the object of striking it out?

Mr. MYERS. It is in once and that is enough, is it not?

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. The Senator says it is in the bill at several other places, but I have not found them.

Mr. MYERS. Yes; at several other places.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I will take the Senator's explanation as being sufficient.

Mr. MYERS. I am glad to satisfy the Senator on one point.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I am not satisfied on any of them.

Mr. MYERS. The Senator said my explanation was sufficient.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I will take the Senator's explanation. We will not cavil over that. A lawyer can split hairs in a way that a layman can not combat; but I observe that section 15, on page 13, is entirely stricken out. What does that mean? The latter part of it reads:

> All causes against the United States brought under the provisions of this act shall be tried in the same manner and under the same rules as controversies between citizens.

The conference committee struck that out.

Mr. MYERS. The place of that was taken by the very section we have been discussing here for several hours.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. The other section we were discussing was on page 12, at the bottom of that column. This is on page 13 and is stricken out.

Mr. MYERS. It is immaterial what page it occurs on. One was stricken out, and the other was put in.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I think, every time, that which was put in was for the interest of the speculator and against the people.

Mr. MYERS. I am sorry the Senator has such a poor opinion of the conferees of the Senate and the House.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I have a very high opinion of them; but they are wonderfully human, and they are just as liable to make mistakes as men who are not versed in law and do not know the hair-splitting methods or the hair-splitting arguments of the average lawyer.

Mr. MYERS. Is the Senator from New Jersey liable to err?

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Oh, I am very liable to err. I have erred a thousand times; but, by the eternal Heaven——

Mr. MYERS. Make it a thousand and one.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. If I do err, I am going to err on the side of the people, and not on the side of a band of speculators like the men who first tried to secure these lands through the Cunningham claims. My friend says this is not the same Cunningham claim or the same Cunningham men. It may not be absolutely Mr. Cunningham; but while "the voice is Jacob's voice, the hands are the hands of the other fellow," according to the Biblical phrase—I can not quote it exactly, for I am not sufficiently versed in such matters; but it is the uncanny methods of the speculator that drew public attention to this subject, and I say that in the face of the aroused public opinion on this question this is a most unfortunate and disastrous bill.

Mr. MYERS. I am sorry the Senator from New Jersey is no better versed in the Bible than he is in the law. I commend him to the study of both. Both will do him good.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. That is all very well; but I have lived without much knowledge of either one of them, and have been a fair citizen at that.

Mr. MYERS. I admit that the Senator is a splendid citizen, but I believe he could be still better if he had a good knowledge of both.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I do not think the law would help me, in view of that which I see.

Mr. MYERS. Of course, if the Senator thinks he could not be made any better citizen than he is, I shall not quarrel with him about that.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Oh, you can not put any such notions into my head or any such words into my mouth.

Mr. MYERS. Now, Mr. President, I shall conclude in two or three minutes, and I ask not to be interrupted any more. I have held the floor too long; but I think the Chair will bear witness that I have been speaking only a very small percentage of the time I have been on the floor.

The matter simply comes down to this: Senators talk about hairsplitting contentions. I think the contention that this enacts any statute of limitations where there was none before, and is a substantial departure from the substance and intent of the bill, is as technical and hairsplitting as anything could be. I do not think there is any substance or merit to it. There was no limitation in it before, and there is no statute of limitations in it now. It is simply a minor detail of procedure and regulation which perfects the bill and makes it plainer. That is all there is to it.

According to my understanding, if conferees take up an amendment of one body or the other, and can not agree on either accepting or rejecting that amendment, they have a right to amend the amendment, as long as they do not depart from the spirit and intent of the amendment and the bill itself; otherwise there never could be any conference agreements at all. If you could not make any amendments to an amendment which do not violate the spirit and intent of the amendment or of the bill itself, there never would be any agreement.

In this case we had only two things before us—the House bill and the Senate bill. The House passed one bill; the Senate struck out all after the enacting clause, and passed another bill as an amendment. If we can not change either one of those measures in the slightest degree, provided we keep within the confines of the substance and intent of the bill—if we can not change any one of those provisions in the slightest degree, even to make it plainer and more specific, without violating the rules of the Senate and having the entire conference report thrown back—then there never would have been an agreement in this case, and there are a great many important measures on which there never would be any agreement.

It would have been impossible to have reported back either the House bill in its entirety or the Senate bill in its entirety. In order to have reported back the House bill in its entirety the Senate conferees would have had to recede and back down from their entire amendment, and concede everything to the House. You can imagine what a clamor of objections there would have been here if we had come in and had said, "Yes, Senators, we just backed down from everything. We just gave up to the House in everything." I can imagine what a clamor of indignation that would arouse here.

If we could not do that, could we expect the House conferees to back down from everything and accept the Senate bill in its entirety, without the crossing of a "t" or the dotting of an "i" or the change of a character or letter in it? It is not in human nature. It could not be expected when men of different views meet. We had to get together the best we could, even if we did change the verbiage a little in minor details.

The situation is simply this: If the Senate rejects this report, there can be no Alaskan coal-leasing bill at this session of Congress. Two of the House conferees have gone home, to return no more this session, and their whereabouts is unknown. One has gone to the far West on account of the ill health of a member of his family. Another is campaigning. Neither one of them will return to the House at this session. If this report is rejected, there will be no Alaskan coal-leasing bill at this session of Congress.

Of course it is within the province and prerogative of the Senate to do that, and if it does I shall not complain. I am an humble servant and instrument of the Senate in this matter. The conferees, however, sat for five days—long hours, too—and the Senate conferees held out stubbornly for nearly all of the substantial Senate phases of the bill. On the last day, the fifth day, two of the House conferees told us that they were going to leave the city that night; one was going to leave at 6 o'clock and the other during the night, and they said that unless we could get together on that day there would be no Alaskan coal-leasing bill at this session of Congress; it would go over to the December session. We got together on that day, and I believe I can truly say that the House gave in on as many contentions as the Senate did. The Senate conferees gave up no more than the House conferees gave up. It was a fair meeting of opposing forces. The Senate conferees stood out to the last afternoon, to the last hour, for a number of contentions; and at one time it looked as if there was not going to be any agreement at all. Finally, however, in the last hour, we got together and made this report.

If the report is rejected in its entirety on account of some point of order, there will be no bill at this session. The whole subject will have to go over until December. It will be thrown back into conference and all thrashed out again and attended by much uncertainty as to what will be done and what will result. The conferees have done the best they could here, and have submitted a bill that was about the only bill they could submit. It had to be that or no bill at all. The Senate conferees in the main—or, at least, a majority of them—felt satisfied with it. I have talked to some Senators who are interested in the bill and some who were opposed to many provisions of the Senate bill, and who express themselves now as well satisfied with the conference report. Feeling that it is better than the Senate bill was, they are better satisfied with it.

While this conference report may or may not meet with the approval of the Senate—and if it does not, as I say, I bow in humble submission to the power of my master, which is the Senate—while the Senate may send the whole thing back, and have no bill at all at this session, merely on account of a point of order about a minor detail, the bill has met with the approval of other high authority—an authority from which much was taken in the framing of this measure differently from what it was first contemplated to be.

I take the liberty of reading a letter sent to me by the Secretary of the Interior, dated October 7:

Hon. HENRY L. MYERS,
Chairman Committee on Public Lands,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I desire to express my gratification at the action of the Senate and House conferees upon the Alaskan coal-leasing bill in reporting a measure which embodies the desirable features of the coal-land bills as passed by the Senate and House, respectively. The conference report bill seems to me an eminently satisfactory and workable measure, designed to secure the early development of Alaska's coal resources under restrictions safeguarding the public interest.

With respect to claims initiated under the former coal-land laws, a large number of which are pending before the department for adjudication, it neither takes away from nor adds to the rights of such claimants, leaving such cases to be considered and adjudicated in accordance with existing laws, which action, investigations having been completed, will be taken by this department within less time than the period fixed in section 3 of the conference report bill.

I earnestly hope that Congress will adopt the conference report and that the bill will become law at an early date.

Cordially, yours, FRANKLIN K. LANE.

Mr. President, as I say, I feel that I have held the floor too long, but I have done only a small share of the talking which has gone on while I had the floor.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, before the Senator takes his seat I should be glad if he would give us a little information.

Mr. MYERS. I shall be glad to give any that I can.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. There are two or three questions I should like to have answered.

Mr. MYERS. With great pleasure.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. In the first place, will the Senator call our attention to the limitation as to quantity which is still contained in the conference report?

Mr. MYERS. The limitation is to 2,560 acres—just the same as it was before.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MARTINE] pointed out that the provision on page 5 dealing with that subject had been stricken out.

Mr. MYERS. Oh, that occurs four or five times in the bill, and that was stricken out at that one point as being repetition, surplusage, duplication. It is in the bill in numerous places.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It is expressly declared elsewhere?

Mr. MYERS. Yes; it is expressly declared in a number of other places.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Now, will the Senator call our attention to the provision contained in the conference report as to compensation by the lessee? I was myself very much dissatisfied with the measure as it left the Senate in that respect.

Mr. MYERS. The maximum royalty was stricken out.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. There is now no maximum?

Mr. MYERS. No maximum—just as it came from the House. It is to be not less than 2 cents per ton—but no maximum is fixed—and then a rental of so much per acre.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Which means not less than 2 cents per ton, and as much as the property commercially is worth?

Mr. MYERS. Yes; as much as the Secretary of the Interior may fix, and in addition the annual rental—payable at the beginning of each year, on the lands covered by such lease, at the rate of 25 cents per acre for the first year; thereafter 50 cents per acre for the second, third, fourth, and fifth years; and $1 per acre for each and every year thereafter during the continuance of the lease.

So that the maximum royalty is stricken out. It remains as the House sent it over in that respect.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Two thousand five hundred and sixty acres is the maximum amount that may be embraced in any lease?

Mr. MYERS. Yes; 2,560 acres is the maximum permitted to any one corporation.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator a question. When I referred to the provision on page 5, which reads—

Provided, That no more than one of said blocks shall be included in any lease—

the Senator said that that was omitted in several other places.

Mr. MYERS. No; not omitted. I said that it was found in several other places.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Where is the provision stating that a man or a company shall not hold more than one such block?

Mr. MYERS. I will find it for the Senator. It is in several places.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. It is in the bill.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Well, that is like telling a man, when he complains of the loss of nails in his work, that "he will find the nails in the bill."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will call the Senator's attention to the end of section 8, on page 9.

Mr. MYERS. Has the Senator section 8 before him?

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Yes; I have section 8.

Mr. MYERS. Section 8a reads as follows:

If any of the lands or deposits leased under the provisions of this act shall be subleased, trusteed, possessed, or controlled by any device permanently, temporarily, directly, indirectly, tacitly, or in any manner whatsoever, so that they form part of or are in any wise controlled by any combination in the form of an unlawful trust, with consent of lessee, or form the subject of any contract or conspiracy in restraint of trade in the mining or selling of coal, entered into by the lessee, or of any holding of such lands by any individual, partnership, association, corporation, or control, in excess of 2,560 acres in the Territory of Alaska, the lease thereof shall be forfeited by appropriate court proceedings.

It is in several places here. It is at other places. If the Senator will give me a minute, I will find other places here. Section 3, on page 4, says:

But in no case exceeding 2,560 acres in any one leasing block or tract.

Mr. WHITE. But how many leases?

Mr. MYERS. It says only one.

Mr. WHITE. Does it say that?

Mr. MYERS. I will find that, too, if the Senator will give me a minute. It says only one. If the Senator wants me to find it and read it to him, I will do so.

Mr. WHITE. Oh, no; I just wanted to find where there is no other lease permitted. I wanted to be satisfied about that.

Mr. MYERS. All right; I shall be glad to satisfy the Senator.

Mr. WHITE. I wanted to find where the man is limited to one lease.

Mr. MYERS. Very well; if the Senator will just give me one minute. I will find that. There have been so many prints of this bill that it takes a minute or two to find it. It has really become a little bit mixed up on account of the various prints and amendments.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I think the Senator will find it on page 7, section 5. There is a provision there that consolidations can be made of not to exceed 2,560 acres.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, section 6 covers the whole thing:

That each lease shall be for such block or tract of land as may be offered or applied for, not exceeding in area 2,560 acres of land, to be described by the subdivisions of the survey, and no person, association, or corporation, except as hereinafter provided, shall be permitted to take or hold any interest as a stockholder or otherwise in more than one such lease under this act.

Mr. MYERS. That is where it is. I yield the floor now, unless there are some further questions to be asked.

Mr. WHITE. I should like to ask the Senator a question.

Mr. MYERS. Very well.

Mr. WHITE. Where is there any limitation as to the number of leases a party may take?

Mr. MYERS. My colleague [Mr. WALSH] has just read that.

Mr. WHITE. No; he said——

Mr. WALSH. I have just read it—

And no person, association, or corporation, except as hereinafter provided, shall be permitted to take or hold any interest——

Mr. WHITE. Any interest?

Mr. WALSH (reading)—

as a stockholder or otherwise in more than one such lease under this act.

Mr. WHITE. That does not prevent two leases.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I desire to make a few remarks about the point of order.

I should regret very much, indeed—interested as the State of Washington is in some legislation which would provide for operating coal mines in Alaska—to see this bill fail because of the objection that anyone might entertain to the proviso which has been under discussion.

I agree myself that it is unnecessary to insert any provisions in the bill providing for court procedure in determining controversies arising under the bill or specifically creating any certain procedure. I think the difficulty which we have had has been rather from the opposite extreme. We have had too much court procedure, and there have been too many complications and too many technicalities, too many delays and appeals in determining the rights of the public as well as of private parties. To say the least, those things will take care of themselves. It is not necessary, in order to protect the rights of the lessee or of anyone, to add anything to the common law or to the statutes already existing in that regard. But, Mr. President, now that it has been incorporated in the conference report, I see nothing substantially injurious to the public or to any private interest in the proviso.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HITCHCOCK in the chair). Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. POINDEXTER. In a moment, if the Senator will pardon me.

I do not think the proviso is really subject to the point of order, as being a matter not in dispute between the two Houses of Congress. It is certainly not clear that it is outside of matter in dispute between the two Houses of Congress; and, in my judgment, it is clearly within such matter.

This was the difference between the two Houses on this particular question: As will be seen on page 12 of the comparative print of the bills of the two Houses, you will notice near the bottom of the page a small paragraph in the House bill and in the Senate bill in which the difference arises, and in the difference between those two paragraphs is contained the subject matter which is covered by this proviso.

The House bill provided that the lease to be made by the Secretary of the Interior "may provide for resort to appropriate methods for the settlement of disputes." Now, the Senate changed that, and provided that "the lease may provide" not for a resort to appropriate methods but "for the enforcement of other appropriate remedies for breach of specified conditions thereof." The language is "of other appropriate remedies," but there is evidently a misprint there, and it means "or other appropriate remedies."

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President——

Mr. POINDEXTER. Just a moment. There is quite a substantial difference between saying that the lease might contain terms providing for a resort to appropriate methods and a provision that the lease itself should provide for the enforcement of the conditions of the act.

Mr. WHITE. May I inquire of the Senator what section he is reading from?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I am reading from section 11 of the House bill, section 14 of the Senate bill. Now, what does the conference report do in regard to that? It left out both of those paragraphs and inserted in the place of them this proviso:

Provided, That the possession of any lessee of any lands covered by his lease and the operation of the mines and other works thereon, or the title of the products thereof, shall not be interfered with by the Secretary of the Interior except after an appropriate proceeding in the district court of Alaska instituted for the purpose of securing a forfeiture or termination of such lease, and such forfeiture or termination shall take effect only from the date of entry of final judgment declaring such forfeiture or termination: Provided further, That such court proceedings must be instituted within 90 days after notice to the lessee of the facts constituting such cause of action, or the same shall be forever barred.

Instead of providing that the lease itself should contain terms providing for the enforcement of the conditions of the act, and instead of providing, as the House did, that the lease should contain terms providing for a resort to appropriate methods of settling and enforcing those conditions, the conference report provided that the differences in dispute should be submitted to a court, and that in that proceeding the action should be commenced within 90 days after notice of the violation of the conditions of the act or the terms of the lease. That is the same subject matter. It is no more distinct from it than the House provision was distinct and different from the Senate provision. It is a method of dealing with the enforcement of the conditions of the act. The Senate and the House differed as to how it should be done.

The conference report is a little more specific and says they shall resort to proceedings in a court. Now, what is the effect of this provision which says that the court proceedings shall be instituted within 90 days after notice to the lessee of the facts constituting such cause of action? I agree entirely with the Senator from Montana that it is not in any sense of the word a statute of limitations. It is no more a statute of limitations, Mr. President, than is the provision of the code of the State of Washington which provides the manner in which civil actions must be commenced in court. That statute provides that—

Civil actions in the several superior courts of this State shall be commenced by the service of a summons, as hereinafter provided, or by filing a complaint with the county clerk as clerk of the court: Provided, That unless service has been had on the defendant prior to the filing of the complaint, the plaintiff shall cause one or more of the defendants to be served personally, or commence service by publication within 90 days from the date of filing the complaint.

Nobody ever claimed that that statute was in any sense of the word a statute of limitations. It was a provision with reference to the manner of commencing and conducting causes of action, and that is what the proposition in dispute is. It is no more a statute of limitations than is the provision that a defendant must answer summons within 20 days or 30 days, or whatever the provision of the statute may be. It is no more than if the requirements were to answer a bill of interrogatories within a certain time, or that a party must take any other step in a civil proceeding within a certain time from the period when notice is served upon him.

That is what this is. Now, what is the effect of it substantially as to compromising in any way whatever the rights of the Government? It is true that this contains the proviso that if the action is not commenced within 90 days from the time the notice is served the cause of action to which the notice relates shall be forever barred. I apprehend that under the language of the statute of Washington, which I read a moment ago, if a plaintiff failed to serve his summons within 90 days from the time when the complaint was filed, the effect of it would be that that action would be dismissed. The cause of action would be preserved. He could start a new action. The defendant could not plead a judgment of dismissal based upon the failure to serve a summons within 90 days from the time when the complaint was filed as res adjudicata of the issues in the case upon which a complaint stating the cause of action was based. But I apprehend that under this proviso the effect would go much further, and that a dismissal of an action because it was not commenced within 90 days from the date that the notice was served would prevent the plaintiff from beginning another action upon the same cause—from setting up the same cause of action in another procedure.

I do not agree, as I said before, as to the necessity or wisdom of that proviso; but what does it amount to? What is the cause of action? The only cause of action of any importance would be that the mine was being conducted under such conditions or in such a manner as to constitute a monopoly or to violate some of the terms of the lease or some of the provisions of this act. If it was conducted under those conditions, the same conditions would remain the day after this cause of action was dismissed, and would constitute a new cause of action; and if they did not, then the complaint which the public had against the abuse would be removed, and it would at least be no substantial injury done to the public, because there was no cause of action on some past evil which had been removed.

If a man continued to be a part of a monopoly for one day or one week after the original action had been dismissed under this provision, a new cause of action would arise and would not be affected in any way whatever by this proviso.

Mr. LANE. I should like to ask the Senator if the term "forever after barred" means nothing?

Mr. POINDEXTER. It means that the cause of action which existed at the time the notice was filed would be forever after barred.

Mr. LANE. And a new notice would have to be given?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Oh, no; it would not affect it in any way whatever.

Mr. LANE. Then, I ask the Senator, what is the use of putting in the term that the Government is to be forever after barred?

Mr. POINDEXTER. The benefit of it has been explained many times by the members of the conference. The effect of it is perfectly obvious. Whether or not it is correct as to policy is another question. I myself do not think it is necessary or advisable. I would not vote for it if I had an opportunity to vote upon it separately from the conference report, but I do not think it is a matter of substantial importance to the Government. I do not think it is a matter of substantial importance to the lessee, for the very reason I have just stated—that although he might be protected from having hanging over him what has been very floridly called here the "sword of Damocles" in this cause of action, another cause of action for the same circumstances would be arising every day. So what would be the difference? He would not be immune from suit. Monopolies are not transient things that exist to-day and disappear to-morrow. If there is a monopoly of any extent which oppresses the people, it continues from week to week and from year to year, and so long as it continues it is a constantly recurring violation of the statute and would not be protected for one instant by the provisions of this conference report.

Mr. President, I want to be very brief, because I should like to see some action taken upon this bill. I am very apprehensive, as the Senator from Montana has said, that unless some action can be taken on it and if it goes over into the indefinite future we may never have an opportunity to pass it. My interest in the bill is not based so much upon the leasing provisions of it or the system of leasing provided for in the bill as in those provisions which would establish an entirely different and, in my opinion, a far more effective system. The principal reason which would cause me to hope that the chance of failure of this bill will not be taken by rejecting this conference report is in those provisions that the Government of the United States, instead of transporting $500,000 worth of coal around Cape Horn every year for its Army and its Navy, will give employment to its citizens and subserve the interest of that country by mining its own coal, as good as that which it gets in Pocahontas or in any other mines of Maryland and West Virginia which it is now using.

What does this bill provide upon that subject? Section 2 of the bill contains this proviso as it is reported by the conference:

SEC. 2. That the President of the United States shall designate and reserve from use, location, sale, lease, or disposition not exceeding 5,120 acres of coal-bearing land in the Bering River field and not exceeding 7,680 acres of coal-bearing land in the Matanuska field, and not to exceed one-half of the other coal lands in Alaska.

That last provision was placed in the bill, I take pride in saying, upon an amendment which I proposed in the Senate, and I think it a very important one—

Provided, That the coal deposits in such reserved areas may be mined under the direction of the President when, in his opinion, the mining of such coal in such reserved areas, under the direction of the President, becomes necessary, by reason of an insufficient supply of coal at a reasonable price for the requirements of Government works, construction and operation of Government railroads, for the Navy, for national protection, or for relief from monopoly or oppressive conditions.

There can not be more comprehensive language than that. If there is any objection to it, it is not because it is restricted. I think that its virtue consists in its comprehensiveness. It gives the President not only the power to mine coal in Alaska—where conditions are so different from those existing in the States—not only for the Government service, but for any other purpose which, in the opinion of the administrators of the Government, may relieve the people from the oppressions of monopoly, giving them the benefit of its vast stores of coal, which are so close to harbors and so easily accessible, more so by far than the coal deposits on the Atlantic coast.

That is one of the great provisions of this bill which I am interested in being enacted into law, and which far outweighs in its possible beneficial consequences any objections which a fertile mind might find to the proviso which we have been discussing here this morning, and which I think is not at all substantial.

That is not all, Mr. President. There are other provisions of the bill of great importance and not connected with the subject which we have been discussing. Section 8 of the bill, which is section 10 of the conference report, provides:

That in order to provide for the supply of strictly local and domestic needs for fuel the Secretary of the Interior may, under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe in advance, issue to any applicant qualified under section 3 of this act a limited license or permit granting the right to prospect for, mine, and dispose of coal belonging to the United States on specified tracts not to exceed 10 acres to any one person or association of persons in any one coal field for a period of not exceeding 10 years, on such conditions not inconsistent with this act as in his opinion will safeguard the public interest, without payment of royalty for the coal mined or for the land occupied: Provided, That the acquisition or holding of a lease under the preceding sections of this act shall be no bar to the acquisition, holding, or operating under the limited license in this section permitted. And the holding of such a license shall be no bar to the acquisition or holding of such a lease or interest therein.

Mr. President, the pioneers of Alaska have been ground between the upper and the nether millstone by the oppressions of private monopoly on the one hand and the fight which it has been necessary to make for the protection of the public on the other hand. In the great battle which has been waged and which it was necessary to wage to save this immense domain from being constricted and assimilated by private monopoly, these resources have been temporarily locked up, and the people living upon the ground, who ought to be encouraged in every reasonable way by a just Government, have been deprived of the use of this necessity of life—particularly a necessity there—though it lies at their very doors. This section of the bill, which provides for temporary leases for small areas of land not exceeding 10 acres for local or domestic use, is a benign provision which in itself justifies all the time and interest which have been given to the passage of this bill, and I would dislike to see that provision fail.

There are some other provisions. Section 12 of the bill provides a system of protection for labor and the establishment of proper and decent conditions in the mining of coal, which is bound to have a reflex action upon the conditions in coal mines in other places, and it authorizes those terms to be inserted in leases which are made by the Government under this act. That is a provision of far-reaching consequences, which far outweighs any objectionable features in the bill. As the conferees reported it, it provides as follows:

SEC. 12. That no lease issued under authority of this act shall be assigned, except with the consent of the Secretary of the Interior. Each lease shall contain provisions for the purpose of insuring the exercise of reasonable diligence, skill, and care in the operation of said property, and for the safety and welfare of the miners and for the prevention of undue waste, including a restriction of the workday to not exceeding eight hours in any one day for underground workers, except in cases of emergency; provisions securing the workers complete freedom of purchase, requiring the payment of wages at least twice a month in lawful money of the United States, and providing proper rules and regulations to secure fair and just weighing or measurement of the coal mined by each miner, and such other provisions as are needed for the protection of the interests of the United States, for the prevention of monopoly, and for the safeguarding of the public welfare.

The last clause which I have just read would put into the hands of the Government—and if the Government in turn is not in the hands of the people, then there is no salvation for us anywhere—a most unlimited authority in disposing of this land under these leases, except where there are specific provisions in the act to be complied with, to prevent monopoly, to supervise, to regulate, to insert in the deed of lease any conditions which the ingenuity of a wise Government can devise to relieve the people in that section of the country from the extortion of coal monopolies, which have oppressed the people in other sections in a notorious manner. I would dislike to see that provision fail. It goes a long way to vindicate the wisdom of this act.

It has been suggested, Mr. President, reverting again to the particular subject of discussion—the proviso inserted by the conference committee—that it would open in some way a loophole for the Cunningham claims to reassert themselves and to gain some benefit or privilege which they have not now. That can not possibly be the effect of this act, because it is provided in section 15:

That the passage of this act shall not affect any proceeding now pending in the Department of the Interior, and any such proceeding may be carried to a final determination in said department notwithstanding the passage hereof.

That is an absolute guaranty, in my judgment, and I think there ought to be such a guaranty. The Senate has a right to demand it—that nothing in this act shall compromise in any way whatsoever the rights of the Government in the controversies which have been pending for such a long time as to claims hitherto located. I think it is protected absolutely by that provision.

Now, it has been further argued with a good deal of force and suggested with a great deal of ingenuity that this proviso in dispute would deprive the Government of its ordinary legal and equitable remedies in the courts; that the Government could not interfere in any way whatever with the possession of the land under lease or the operation of the mines thereof until final judgment had been rendered. That at first reading is a more or less specious objection, but it is only specious, because upon a more thorough reading of the provision it is perfectly obvious that no such effect could possibly flow from it. What does it say?

That the possession of any lessee of any lands covered by his lease and the operation of the mines and other works thereon or the title of the products thereof shall not be interfered with by the Secretary of the Interior except—

Except what? Does it say except a final judgment has been obtained? Not at all. It says, on the contrary—except after an appropriate proceeding in the district court of Alaska instituted for the purpose of securing a forfeiture or termination of such lease.

Except after procedure instituted for that purpose, not except after the final judgment, declaring the forfeiture, has been obtained. That construction can not possibly justly be given to the provision. It goes on to say:

And such forfeiture or termination shall take effect only from the date of entry of final judgment declaring such forfeiture or termination.

That is a very different thing from providing that the Government may not enjoy the benefits of all interlocutory proceedings before final judgment declaring a forfeiture or termination of the lease. If there were no such provision as this, how would the forfeiture or the final termination of the lease be declared until there was a final judgment in the court? That would have been the case under the provisions of the House bill and of the Senate bill before it went into conference, or of the conference report as it stands should this provision be eliminated from it.

The Senate bill, which I assume represented the deliberate judgment of the Senate in the matter, provided as follows:

SEC. 14. That any such lease may be forfeited and canceled by appropriate proceedings in a court of competent jurisdiction whenever the lessee fails to comply with any provision of the lease or of general regulations promulgated under this act.

That does not mean that it might be forfeited by beginning an action. Of course no one—no lawyer, no Senator—would contend that it meant any such thing. It could only mean that upon an appropriate procedure commenced and prosecuted to final and successful judgment could the lease be terminated. So the insertion of this proviso, as I said in the beginning, has no substantial effect upon the rights of the Government as they were defined in the bill as it passed the Senate, and leaves it substantially as it was before.

I think, largely, from any standpoint, either of the Government or the lessee, it is unnecessary and ineffective to insert that provision—with the exception of the limitation barring forever the action if it was not brought within 90 days after notice is filed—and for other reasons, which I have already stated, that is not important, because the cause of action would be of such a nature that it must necessarily constantly be recurring from day to day.

In section 8a I think the bill fairly safeguards the public and the Government against monopoly. Section 8a is substantially the amendment which I offered, but the provision which appears in it for court procedure was not contained in the original proposed amendment. The original amendment read as follows:

SEC. 8a. That no coal land shall be subleased nor in any way whatsoever used for speculative purposes, and if any of the lands or deposits leased under the provisions of this act shall be subleased, trusteed, possessed, or controlled by any device permanently, temporarily, directly, indirectly, tacitly, or in any manner whatsoever, so that they form part of or in any way effect any combination or are in any wise controlled by any combination in the form of an unlawful trust, or form the subject of any contract or conspiracy in restraint of trade in the mining or selling of coal, or of any holding of such lands by any individual, partnership, association, corporation, or control, in excess of 2,560 acres in the Territory of Alaska, the lease thereof shall be canceled, and said individual, partnership, association, or corporation shall forfeit the right thereafter of obtaining lands under lease under the provisions of this act.

Now, the contention is made that this proviso in section 14 weakens the efficiency of the Government to prevent and restrain monopoly, because it superimposes in the administration of the act a long court procedure. Let us see what the condition would have been if it had not been inserted and this amendment had been adopted in its original form. We will assume that a lease had been made and the Secretary of the Interior had declared that it constituted a part of a monopoly, and that for that reason he issued an order canceling it. What is the situation?

There is the coal operator on the ground with his investment, his machinery, his buildings, in pedis possessio, occupying the property. The Secretary says, "You have formed an unlawful combination." The lessee says, "I have not formed an unlawful combination." The Secretary says, "Get off of the ground." The lessee says, "You have no right to order me to get off the ground, because I have violated no condition of the lease, and I will not get off of the ground." What is the Secretary going to do about it? He can not do anything except to go into court and avail himself of his equitable and legal remedies which this proviso simply specifies, and leaves them in substantially the same situation as if it were not adopted.

I hope the conference report will be adopted.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, I wish to ask a yea-and-nay vote on the question now before the Senate; and it does not seem to me as though there is a quorum here. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. LANE. Mr. President, I wish to say a few words on the question now under discussion. I think the statement made by the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS] of his opinion that the rights of the Government were amply protected and that the lessee would gain no advantage from this provision, is aside from the question. The question is as to whether a conference committee appointed by the Senate to confer with a committee representing the House—to discuss and arrive at a conclusion between them as to what part of a measure passed by the two bodies should be accepted and what rejected—have the right to insert entirely new matter. I think they have no authority further than to discuss those matters which have been passed upon by the two Houses which they represent, and that, if they go aside from that by way of elimination of important provisions in the bill or by the addition of new matter, they act outside of their function as conferees, and that they are assuming authority which is not vested in them. If we allow conference committees to do that, they become the authors of legislation, as in this case, and not the Senate or the House.

These questions should by right be the subject of discussion by the Senate and should be left to the decision arrived at by the Senate; and when the conference committee puts in new matter, as it has done here, entirely changing, in my opinion, the bill, it seems to me that its report should be rejected.

I do not mean to reflect in any way upon the integrity of the conferees or to impugn their motives, and yet I think they have inadvertently strayed from the path of their duty; that in looking into the subject they have arrived at a conclusion as to what they thought the bill should contain and which they thought was the right one. They have put their decision in the bill, and then coming in here with it, the Senator under its rules must either reject the entire report, with which in the main we may agree, except as to the one provision which, in effect, nullifies the provision which the Senate has endeavored to put in the measure, or accept it as an entirety. That is the point which is under discussion, and that point goes further than this bill. It is a matter of importance in all our legislation.

If we concede in this instance that a conference committee have such a right, as some contend they have, it may be that it will in the long run be better for the country that the remainder of the Senate go home and turn the legislation of the country over to some committee of five intelligent Members informed upon the affairs of the Nation. It would no doubt save a good deal of time and much discussion; and there is no doubt, too, that it might be better; but that is not the way that the Congress is constituted and that is not the understanding of the people as to the manner in which legislation is enacted. To this method of procedure I make objection. I want to make objection to the assumption——

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, will the Senator from Oregon permit an interruption?

Mr. LANE. I will.

Mr. CLAPP. I think there has been some misunderstanding about the action of the committee. It not infrequently occurs that a committee of conference find themselves confronted by a legislative exigency under which they report to the Senate matters that are not strictly within the authority of the conferees. Under those circumstances the Senator in charge of the bill should state to the Senate that the conferees have felt it necessary to make such a report, and call the attention of the Senate to it. Then it is for the Senate to say whether or not they will accept it. I think I myself have followed that course and I have known other Senators to do so, and as a rule, if they can make the Senate see the necessity for it, there is no particular objection to it; but it should be called to the attention of the Senate by the Senator in charge of the bill, and then there can be no criticism.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, if the Senator from Oregon will permit me, I thought I had done as the Senator from Minnesota suggests. I had the floor here for about two hours, less such time as was taken by interruptions, and during the course of my remarks I stated the reasons for the action of the conferees and went into the matter fully. I think the Senator from Minnesota was certainly not on the floor at that time.

Mr. LANE. That was to-day.

Mr. MYERS. Yes; to-day. I think also that the Senator from Oregon evidently was not on the floor.

Mr. LANE. That was, Mr. President, after the report to which it is claimed we are tied was made to the Senate. If there was any question in the Senator's mind before to-day, I see no reason why he should not have brought it in and then received the consent of the Senate for authority to take the action which has been taken by the conferees and make the change.

Now, the Senate finds itself in this peculiar position: It must either reject this entire report or adopt this provision, with which many Members are not satisfied. Many Senators do not have the confidence in it which the members of the conference committee have.

The Senator has said that there was an attempt on their part—he did not use those words, but he stated that the conference committee felt that they should invite capital to go into Alaska to open the coal mines. That is the Senator's personal opinion and the opinion of the conferees. If those coal mines are good mines, capital will go in and invest in them; but if they are not good mines, you could not coax capital to invest in them.

The Senator thought that 90 days' notice was enough. There are plenty of gulches in Alaska, 40 or 50 miles from other gulches, which at certain seasons of the year, when there are 30 feet of snow on the west slope of the mountains, you could not reach in 90 days. I lay in Alaska at one time for 2 months and 20 days waiting for the rivers to freeze and the snow to fall in order to get out with a dog team, and the party ahead of me were met by an overflow of the waters coming over the top of the ice and were tied up for nearly a month on the trail. It took me 17 days to walk out with a dog team. You can not go through that country in winter like you can here. There are no macadamized roads, no railroads, no steamboat traffic in the winter. The party on the trail before the one which I have mentioned were hung up for two months and were said to have had to eat their dogs before they got through. Such conditions may arise again.

On the west coast of Alaska in the wintertime, in certain portions of the country where the snowfall is 30 feet deep, if you step 3 feet off the trail you will go down 30 feet through the snow to the ground, and it takes a long time to fight your way up to the trail again; you have to pound the snow down hard enough in order to make your way back.

Time and contracts should and do run differently there than they do "outside," as they call it, for the reason that there are certain seasons when one can not travel. I do not think the Government should be tied to so short a limit of time—the Government of the United States; Uncle Sam, poor, unfortunate old Uncle Sam, who always comes out at the little end of a well-greased horn. I think his rights should be preserved. No brief limit should be placed upon him in which to show that there was a fraud being practiced on the people of this country or in which to assert his rights.

The tenderness for the lessee appeals to me; but the people of this country have to stand sponsor and guard for this property, and fight for it, if you please, with their neighbors, in order to retain possession of it for the lessees. Uncle Sam has 90 days in which to make good. If he does not, he is barred forever—forever; day without end, time beyond the computation of man; not merely for a million or two years [laughter], but forever. Only the Supreme Being can make a law that runs forever; yet here is a conference committee that goes out and, as sleek as a button, makes a law against Uncle Sam, whose representatives its members are in part, which forfeits his rights and bars him forever. There is "nothing doing" for Uncle Sam for a long, long time. [Laughter.]

I do not like that kind of a law. I never saw a franchise without a time limit except those in Massachusetts, which can be abrogated at any time when in a court of law it can be shown that the contract has not been complied with. Whenever you find a franchise or a lease which runs without limit, without any restrictions, without any right in the hands of the people who gave it, who have to stand guard over it, by which they may reclaim it into their hands if its terms are not carried out in a manner for the benefit of the people, you had better look out for it. It is a bad one. You do not want to take any interest or stock in it; that is, not on the other side of the question. It is a good lease or franchise to own or to buy in on, and sometimes is quite profitable.

So I say the conference committee has innocently, guilelessly—they are no doubt a guileless set of gentlemen—passed a law here, or assumed the authority to pass a law. I say this with all due respect to the Senator from Montana. I do not want to hurt his feelings. I have no feeling in this matter. They have assumed to pass a law which circumscribes the rights of the people, and, in my opinion, is not for the benefit of the people of this country. Then, in addition, they have stepped on the toes and the dignity of the Senate by assuming the right to legislate for us and now try to tie us to their action, and to that I object.

In other instances the bill has been somewhat changed, and I am told—and I wish to say this in all fairness and in commendation of the committee—that some of those changes are improvements on the bill as it left the Senate. They have improved it and made it better. Here is one change, however, which, in my opinion, limits the rights of the Government unduly. You can rest easy in your minds if you come to the conclusion that Uncle Sam and the people of this country are never going to get the best of any of the lessees of these coal lands. They never have done so. Our history does not run back more than 140 or 150 years in that line; but every time Uncle Sam has fooled with leases he has got bitten, and bitten badly. If we had now in the hands of the people of this country, so that they could be sold for the benefit of the people, all the lands which have been lost through ill-advised legislation and leases, there would be enough money in the Treasury to pay all the running expenses for the next five years without any more taxation, and we would not have to enact the emergency tax bill which we are going to take up as soon as we are through with this conference report.

My attention was called, quite independently of this and before this matter came up for discussion, to the fact that there was a supervising inspector out now in some of the Western States inspecting some other inspectors who had passed off some very bad leases on the Government, which had cost, directly or indirectly, in one way or another, to the people whom they represented, some hundred million dollars. When the Government has to employ inspectors to inspect inspectors—and lots of things can happen to inspectors which a person who is not familiar with them would not suspect—I feel that it would be safer not to confine it to 90 days in which to take action looking to the cancellation of these leases.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I have the greatest respect for the conferees, but it does seem to me that this addition from them was not an adjustment of any difference between the two Houses, but an affirmative announcement of additional propositions where the two Houses were in agreement.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, may I call the Senator's attention just at this point to what the disagreement was over which we labored for five days before evolving this solution?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. MYERS. The only reason why I interrupt the Senator is that he says there appears to be no disagreement.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. MYERS. I wish to call his attention to what we considered a disagreement.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Certainly.

Mr. MYERS. This point was covered by section 11 of the House bill, found on page 12 of the comparative print. It is short, and I will read it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. There is no difference.

Mr. MYERS. No difference between what?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Between section 11 of the House bill and section 14 of the Senate bill.

Mr. MYERS. It is section 15 of the Senate bill that the difference existed in.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I intend to discuss section 11 and section 14 myself.

Mr. MYERS. Section 15.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I am going to discuss section 11 and section 14, which are the two provisions——

Mr. MYERS. Why will not the Senator discuss section 15? That is where the difference is.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. One moment. In order that the Senator may understand me, I will say that I intend to discuss section 11 of the House bill and section 14 of the Senate bill, section 14 being the one to which this proviso has been added. Now, if the Senator will just call my attention to any section that justified this proviso other than section 11 and section 14, I shall be glad to discuss it also.

Mr. MYERS. Section 15 of the Senate bill is where the difference existed, not section 14. Senate section 14 is not the section that was in conflict with House section 11. It was Senate section 15 and House section 11 that were in conflict. The Senate conferees would not take House section 11 and the House conferees would not take Senate section 15, and the difference was compromised by putting this proviso at the bottom of section 14.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. What provision in section 15 does the Senator consider justifies the proviso?

Mr. MYERS. I will tell the Senator in a second. Just let me finish that explanation first, if you please.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes; certainly.

Mr. MYERS. In order to solve the matter we took this proviso and added it onto section 14 of the Senate bill. We struck out entirely section 15 of the Senate bill—eliminated it—and put this proviso on section 14 of the bill as a substitute for both section 11 of the House bill and section 15 of the Senate bill. Now I will tell the Senator why I think sections 15 and 11 are in conflict. I hope the Senator will get out of his mind the idea that it was section 14 of the Senate bill which was in conflict, for it was not; it was section 15 of the Senate bill and section 11 of the House bill that went out. They both went out, and this was patched up to take the place of them.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Section 11 of the House bill is left in.

Mr. MYERS. I refer to section 11 of the House bill.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Section 11 of the House bill is found in section 14 of the conference report, practically.

Mr. MYERS. Then it was section 15 of the Senate bill that this was intended to supplant. This proviso, hooked onto section 14, took the place of Senate section 15, and now I will point out why I think Senate section 15 is in conflict with House section 11.

Senate section 15 says:

That the jurisdiction of the district court of Alaska shall extend to and over any forfeiture or cancellation proceedings instituted under the provisions of section 9 of this act and to any and all controversies which may arise between the United States and any lessee or other person, association, or corporation growing out of any disputed controversies or proceedings arising under this act or under leases issued hereunder. All causes against the United States brought under the provisions of this act shall be tried in the same manner and under the same rules as controversies between citizens.

That section provided for actions to be brought against the United States, which is a very unusual thing, and the House conferees said they never would agree to it. They said that if you opened up the way for every dissatisfied claimant and every dissatisfied lessee and every man whose application for a lease was turned down to sue the United States, the United States district court for the district of Alaska would be simply flooded with suits against the United States. The House conferees used this illustration in argument. They said: "Efforts have often been made to authorize Indian claimants to sue the United States, to throw open the floodgates and let any Indian tribe or any individual Indian who thinks he has a claim against the United States go into the district court of the United States and sue the United States." They said: "That has always been resisted, justly and wisely so, because it would throw open the floodgates and bring about a torrent of litigation that would be unending, and would weigh down the courts so that there would be no time or opportunity for any other litigation." They urged that claim agents and lawyers, in that event, would go around amongst Indians and persuade them to be dissatisfied, and convince them that they had some claim against the United States, and that it would be very easy to take a bogus claim and convince an Indian that he had been defrauded and then bring suit on a contingent fee, just on the bare hope that they might catch on to something and get a little something to divide between the attorney and the Indian. They said it would be the same way in regard to these matters; that if you were going to open up the way for dissatisfied people in Alaska who think they have not been treated right about the letting of these leases to sue the United States it would be a very remarkable and unprecedented and unwise action.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to interrupt him there?

Mr. MYERS. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Then you abandoned that entirely, because you have not put anything at all of that kind in this proviso.

Mr. MYERS. We abandoned that because it was in dispute. It was in disagreement. The House conferees would not agree to it. They said that if we insisted on that there would never be any agreement and there would never be any bill.

That section provides for litigation, however. To show you that our substitute is in accord with that in principle and in spirit, in substance and in intent, in every particular except the remarkable proposition of allowing people to sue the United States, I will show you that this section 15 provides for having all litigation and all controversies and all causes of action adjusted in the district court of the United States for the District of Alaska.

The difference between section 15 of the Senate bill and section 11 of the House bill is that House section 11 says:

That any such lease may be forfeited and canceled by an appropriate proceeding in a court of competent jurisdiction whenever the lessee fails to comply with any provision of this act, of the lease, or of general regulations promulgated under this act and in force at the date of the lease; and the lease may provide for resort to appropriate methods for the settlement of disputes or for remedies for breach of specified conditions thereof.

That section goes further than litigating in the courts and says that the terms and conditions of the lease itself may provide for arbitration and for other methods of settlement than by adjudication in court. The Senate conferees would not agree to that in its entirety; but the solution of the matter was that section 15 of the Senate bill was stricken out, and this proviso was attached to section 14 of the Senate bill and made to read as section 14 now appears in the comparative print on page 12.

The only difference I can see is that one detail is added. The principle there is that you can litigate, you can adjudicate, in the Federal court, but you can not sue the United States. The Government must be the plaintiff, and it must give notice, if it has any fault to find, and must bring the suit within 90 days.

I think that is only a change of detail, of the method of procedure, and it does not change the substance of it or the principle at all.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, the Senator has not relieved my mind at all on this subject, in spite of my cordial regard for him both personally and officially. The conferees have stricken from the Senate bill a provision that the House had agreed to.

Mr. MYERS. Where did the House agree to it?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I am going to show the Senator. I am going to get the Senator to wait a few moments, and let me show him. The provision that he has just stated the Senate conferees could not agree to is embodied in the bill that we passed.

Mr. MYERS. But it was not stricken out. It was the Senate section 15 that was stricken out.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Just one moment. The provision in section 11 to which the Senator said the conferees could not agree had already been agreed to by the Senate of the United States, and was a part of the bill which we passed; and the conferees have stricken out a provision which both bodies passed. Now, let us see.

Mr. MYERS. I should like to ask the Senator——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I can not yield now. Just let me finish, and then I will yield to the Senator. Let me show him what I mean.

Mr. MYERS. I should like to ask a question which I think is very pertinent at this point.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Very well; I will yield.

Mr. MYERS. I should like the Senator to point out where section 15 of the Senate bill is in the House bill.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I did not say section 15; I said section 14. I said that section 11 of the House bill and section 14 of the Senate bill are practically the same. Section 14 as passed by the Senate contains the language found in section 11, to which the Senator said the conferees could not agree. I repeat that the conferees have stricken out by their report a provision which both the Senate and the House had passed.

Mr. MYERS. I should like to ask a question at this juncture.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Certainly.

Mr. MYERS. Is the last part of House bill ection 11, which provides for arbitration, in Senate section 14?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes. I am going to read those two provisions, and show that they are practically the same. I contend that there is no difference in the actual meaning of section 11 as passed by the House and section 14 as passed by the Senate. It is a matter of phraseology, and not of practical result. Now, let us see.

Section 11 of the House bill provides:

That any such lease may be forfeited and canceled by an appropriate proceeding in a court of competent jurisdiction whenever the lessee fails to comply with any provision of this act, of the lease, or of general regulations promulgated under this act.

Section 14, as adopted by the Senate, provides:

That any such lease may be forfeited and canceled by appropriate—

It left out the word "an", that is the difference—

by appropriate proceeding in a court of competent jurisdiction whenever the lessee fails to comply with any provision of the lease or of general regulations promulgated under this act.

The language being entirely the same, except that the Senate left out the word "an." Then the House provision added:

And in force at the date of the lease.

The Senate provision, section 14, left that out. Now let us see what the balance of the two was:

And the lease may provide for resort to appropriate methods for the settlement of disputes or for remedies for breach of specified conditions thereof.

This is the provision of section 11 of the House bill which the Senator said our conferees could not agree to. Let us see what we did upon the same subject at the close of our section 14:

And the lease may provide for the enforcement of other appropriate remedies——

Mr. MYERS. Where is the Senator reading? I should like to keep up with him.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The close of section 14 of the Senate bill.

Mr. MYERS. Of the comparative print?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The comparative print.

Mr. MYERS. How far down? I do not see anything of that kind.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Page 12.

Mr. MYERS. I will ask the Senator to show it to me, please.

[Mr. SMITH of Georgia indicated the part referred to by him.]

Mr. MYERS. That was stricken out, though.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It was passed.

Mr. MYERS. No; that is the Senate bill. It was stricken out in conference.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. That is what I said. The Senator says it was stricken out in conference. That is true. I am showing that the conferees struck out what we had agreed on. I am reading section 11 of House bill and section 14 of Senate bill, and I am showing you that they were the same thing, and that our conferees struck out what both Houses had agreed to and put in this provise in its stead.

I have just read the close of section 11. I will read it again. It is very short:

And the lease may provide for resort to appropriate methods for the settlement of disputes or for remedies for breach of specific conditions thereof.

That is an authority to put into the lease provisions covering the settlement of disputes or remedies of a breach beyond simply an appeal to the courts. Now, our section 14, which we adopted, carries a provision for appeal to the courts, and then adds:

And the lease may provide for the enforcement of other appropriate remedies for breach of specified conditions thereof.

Therefore the House provided that in addition to the right to appeal to the courts the lease could provide for additional remedies in the way of settling disputes, and the Senate, following the House, did practically the same thing. When we turn to the report of the conferees, we find that they have agreed to strike out what both bodies did.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. BORAH. In order to test the question of whether or not there is any difference between these two clauses, could you not put anything in the lease under section 11 that you could put in the lease under section 14; or, vice versa, could you not put anything in the lease under section 14 that you could put in the lease under section 11?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Unquestionably. In a little different language, under this provision adopted by each House, there could be inserted into the lease provisions for the settlement of differences. Both Houses agreed to this, and our conferees have stricken out the action of both Houses. The Senator from Montana tells us that the Senate conferees could not agree to this proviso about the lease contained in the House bill when the Senate itself had agreed to it.

Now, my friend the Senator—and I say that not formally, but because it is true—refers to section 15, and calls my attention to what I think was a very objectionable provision that we put into section 15. I think his criticism upon it as reported from the conferees justifies its being stricken out. I condemn the latter part of section 15 which we passed, providing that—

All causes against the United States brought under the provisions of this act shall be tried in the same manner and under the same rules as controversies between citizens.

Inviting generally the institution of suits against the United States in Alaska growing out of these leases, just like suits between individuals, is an unwise provision. I think the leases, as contemplated by both Houses, ought to have contained provisions for some sort of a board to pass on these matters, representing the Government, subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, and that a general invitation for anybody who wanted to do so to sue the United States for anything he wanted to sue it for was unwisely put into section 15 by the Senate. But the elimination of that provision in section 15 in no way gave a reason for the proviso that has been added to our section 14. It has no reference to suits against the United States. It has reference to actions by the United States against lessees. So, dropping the provision in section 15 by which anybody might have sued the United States gives no reason for our conferees adding a proviso to section 14 limiting the right of the United States, through the courts, to assert and enforce the rights of the Government.

The first part of section 15 provides for the jurisdiction of the district courts of Alaska over any forfeiture procedure, and so forth. I think they have that, anyhow. I do not see how there can be any question that they have it, and I really do not see why we put section 15 in there. I think section 14 clearly would have covered the desirable part of section 15, and the latter part of it might well have been abandoned. But in none of the provisions of section 15 do I see a reason for going back to section 14 and striking out the proviso in section 14 of the Senate bill, found also in section 11 of the House bill, that there could be inserted in the leases provisions looking to the adjustment of differences.

I find in this proviso absolutely new matter—a limitation of the right of the United States to proceed and a limitation of the time within which it must proceed. I may be wrong, but I can not concede the doctrine of estoppel as against the United States, even if somebody had heard that one of these lessee companies had violated the terms of its contract of lease and the United States Government continued to receive the rental thereafter. It is not a subject about which I have made any special investigation; but the impression it makes upon me is that no such doctrine of estoppel would apply to the Government as that which applies between individuals. I am reasonably familiar with the doctrine of estoppel as to individuals, but, as I recall the reason upon which the doctrine of estoppel is applied, I can not see how anyone could stand for the United States Government in an attitude to bind the Government by such a doctrine.

I think the criticism is just upon this report—first, that the conferees have added a proviso at the end of section 14 not a subject of conference; second, and still more important, our conferees have stricken out an important provision in the bill which was practically the same in the House bill and the Senate bill—the provision which allowed the contracts of lease to have inserted in them a plan for the adjustment of differences and the settlement of disputes.

In regard to the suggestion that mining companies may have had an influence on the committee, I want to say that I resent it as quickly as my friend from Montana would, because I am sure that no one believes that anybody in either the House or Senate is doing his work except with an earnest purpose of serving the public, and we are all liable to be wrong sometimes in that effort.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Just one word more and then I will be through. I do not know that I would have made this criticism or expressed myself upon the subject except I do feel that conference committees are assuming—not so much in this case, but in many cases—a little more authority than they ought to assume. I do not believe in legislation by conference committees. It is a dangerous way to legislate. It is a way by which we are liable to obtain ill-considered legislation.

In this connection I have one more thought which has been in my mind for some little time that perhaps I should not express. It is the habit on the part of both Houses when a bill is sent from the other House to write a new bill instead of amending the bill presented by the House first acting. I do not understand why whenever an important measure is passed by one of the Houses the committee which takes charge of it in the other feels called upon to write a new bill; that it starts with the title and then puts in an entire new bill. It becomes exceedingly difficult for conferees to adjust the differences of the two Houses when each House passes an entirely independent bill instead of taking the bill that the House first passed and amending it and perfecting it.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I yield.

Mr. JONES. I agree with the Senator that that happens. Does not the Senator agree also that there is a habit here at any rate which probably leads conference committees to go further than they really ought to go in that we frequently adopt amendments and say, "Oh, well, the conferees will take care of the matter"?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I agree with the Senator from Washington about that. I do feel that we ought to adopt provisions when we have made up our mind that we are going to stand by them rather than to send ill-digested legislation to a conference committee. Perhaps the Senate as a body has been responsible for the suggestion to the conferees in numerous cases where we have passed a measure with parts ill digested, relying on the conferees to perfect the work that we ought to have done ourselves.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, it was said a while ago that this difference between the conferees and what led to the solution of the difference in this respect should have been explained to the Senate. I thought I had done so, but in view of the remarks of the Senator from Georgia I will endeavor to do it a little more specifically and particularly than heretofore, if possible. I shall try to be brief about it.

As long as the Senator wants an explanation, I will say the way it came about was just simply this: When we met in conference the House bill was laid aside altogether. As Senators know, when the bill came over here from the House the Senate amended it by striking out all after the enacting clause and, by way of an amendment, substituted an entirely new bill of the Senate's own construction.

By the way, I will digress long enough to say I am glad to know that our set of conferees are not the only conferees who have been sinning, in the opinion of some Members of the Senate, about their duties under the rules. I dislike to see our conferees made a goat of all former sinning conferences that have been in existence heretofore. I dislike to see the Senate let this practice go on for years and years placidly and then all of a sudden arouse to its rights and demand that our conference committee shall make amends for inattention to the rules in the past, when we have sinned no more than have others.

That was the situation which confronted us. The Senate had adopted an entirely different bill. We met in conference, and it was agreed at once, at the outset, that we should take the Senate bill, which was the last to pass either branch, and go to work on it and perfect it. The House conferees very graciously acceded to that without any contention.

To begin with, the House bill was laid aside right then and there. The House conferees disagreed right then and there, at the outset, and everything in it was laid aside, so that section 11 of the House bill was relegated with all the rest of the House bill.

When it came to considering the Senate bill section 15 of the Senate bill was considered to cover substantially the same ground or the same phase of the subject matter that section 11 of the House bill had covered. But the House conferees said they would not agree to section 15 of the Senate bill. They announced absolutely that there would never be any agreement as long as that stayed in, and they gave their reasons. I recounted the reasons here a little while ago in my last talk.

Then it was agreed to strike out section 15 of the Senate bill; the Senate conferees agreed to recede from it. Then the question arose what to put in in the place of it. Section 11 of the House bill had gone out entirely with all other provisions of the House bill. Section 15 of the Senate bill was receded from, and we did not want to bring in a maimed bill. We did not want to bring in a three-legged horse minus one of its chief supports and foundations.

It is said that we took the first paragraph of section 11 substantially as it is found in the first paragraph of section 14 of the Senate bill. That is true, but section 15 of the Senate bill went a great deal further and covered a great deal more ground than section 14 of the Senate bill, because section 14 of the Senate bill only provides that leases may be forfeited and canceled by appropriate proceedings in a court of competent jurisdiction. That is about the substance of it. It just says it may be done in court.

Mr. JONES. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. MYERS. I yield.

Mr. JONES. I ask the Senator if there was any substantial disagreement among the conferees over the provisions of sections 11 and 14.

Mr. MYERS. Yes; in this way: Section 14 in the Senate bill is substantially section 11 of the House bill.

Mr. JONES. That is the reason why I asked the Senator whether there was any substantial disagreement among the members of the conference over sections 11 and 14, which to my mind are substantially the same.

Mr. MYERS. No; not between them as far as they go; but section 15 takes up the same thread and goes a great deal further, just as I was saying when the Senator asked the question.

Mr. JONES. That is what I wanted to know—whether there was not a substantial agreement between sections 14 and 11.

Mr. MYERS. As far as they go. Section 14 of the Senate bill merely provides that it must be done by an appropriate proceeding in court. Section 15 of the Senate bill goes into detail as to how it shall be done in the court. It does not end by simply saying that it shall be done by an appropriate proceeding in court, and leave it up in the air in a vague way. Section 15 goes into details, and says that the lessee may sue the United States Government and that—all causes against the United States brought under the provisions of this act shall be tried in the same manner and under the same rules as controversies between citizens.

Do you not see that it lays down the procedure? It does what section 14 does not attempt to do. Section 14 only authorizes these things to be settled in court. Section 15 goes into the procedure, and even authorizes individuals to sue the United States Government. It lays down the rules of procedure, and says that—

all causes against the United States brought under the provisions of this act shall be tried in the same manner and under the same rules as controversies between citizens.

That was a separate thing from section 14, which only in a general way authorizes an adjudication in the courts. So the House conferees would not agree to section 15 of the Senate bill, and it was stricken out.

Now, we had to get something to take the place of that. We had to lay down rules of procedure, or at least we wanted to do so. We had a desire to lay down the rules of procedure which are not covered in section 14. At the same time, in considering that we considered the second paragraph of section 14 of the Senate bill, which reads:

And the lease may provide for the enforcement of other appropriate remedies for breach of specified conditions thereof.

We considered that that was in absolute conflict with section 15 of the Senate bill, which said that the jurisdiction of the District Court of Alaska shall hear all these controversies. There apparently was a contradiction between the two.

Now, in putting together something that was in the bill in lieu of Senate section 15 and making some rules of procedure, which we had receded from, we struck out the part of section 14 which we considered inconsistent with section 15 and took the first part of section 14, which authorized court procedure, and took our proviso here, which authorizes rules of procedure in lieu of those stricken out, and put them together and agreed that they should take the place of section 15 of the Senate bill.

Now, that is the modus operandi, the operation, the working of the minds of the conferees as near as I can tell the Senate. I contend that in receding from one section which provided rules of practice and procedure and trial of causes and substituting a somewhat different rule of practice and procedure and trial of causes it did not affect the substantive law of the matter, that it was only a matter of procedure, and was not a substantial departure from what had been in the Senate bill before and what the Senate had acted upon; only we thought it was a better provision and more compatible with the proceedings to be instituted.

Mr. O'GORMAN. May I ask the Senator why the last proviso of section 14 of the conference report was inserted, barring the Government unless the suit is instituted in 90 days?

Mr. MYERS. We discussed that at great length this morning, but I will take pleasure in recounting my idea of it for the benefit of the Senator from New York. The conferees felt that it was only just to a lessee if any complaint was made of him about violating the rules and regulations. The Senator will see that the Secretary of the Interior has the right to send agents and inspectors to these mines and see if the rules and regulations are being violated. We felt it was nothing but right that if any charge was brought of a violation of the rules and regulations to give the lessee notice of it, and let him know that he was being complained of, so that he would know what the charge was. He might be able to adjust or remedy it, or comply with any demand made upon him; and if he refused to do so, then, in order to settle the rights of the Government and the lessee, the Government might institute its suit within 90 days to forfeit his lease.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Ninety days after what?

Mr. MYERS. After the notice.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Notice on whom?

Mr. MYERS. It does not say who is to give the notice. I suppose the Secretary of the Interior may make any rules or regulations to cover that. I desire to call attention to section 17 of the bill that is before the Senate:

That the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to prescribe the necessary and proper regulations and to do any and all things necessary to carry out and accomplish the purposes of this act.

Now, it is one of the purposes of the act to give a notice. The Secretary of the Interior may say who has to give it. It was our idea that after the notice was given it would be a cloud on the lessee's title, on the validity of his lease, and that the matter ought to be brought to an issue and to trial and it ought to be determined; that the lessee claiming that he had not violated any rules and regulations, the Government claiming that he had, the matter ought to be brought to an issue and adjudicated.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Considering the great distance from Alaska to the city of Washington, where the Interior Department is located, and the probable necessity of the Interior Department being consulted with respect to any of these attempted forfeitures, does the Senator think that 90 days is sufficient time within which the Government must act at its peril?

Mr. MYERS. I thought so and the conferees thought so, for this reason: It is 90 days after service of notice on the lessee. He is served with a notice, and then this action must be brought.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Served by whom?

Mr. MYERS. I just said the Secretary of the Interior must say who is to serve it.

Mr. O'GORMAN. But the section does not state it.

Mr. MYERS. When the Secretary of the Interior comes to make a rule covering that he can say the United States marshal of the District of Alaska may serve it or the district attorney may serve it. I say it is not any too short a time, for this reason: It is 90 days after issuance of the notice or order for the notice to be served; but after service of the notice on the lessee, then within 90 days the action must be brought in the district court of the United States for the District of Alaska, right there on the ground.

Mr. O'GORMAN. How far from the claim?

Mr. MYERS. I do not know; it may be a considerable distance; but the Government does not have to serve the notice until it has its pleadings ready and is ready to bring the suit.

It can put off the notice until the day before the suit is brought if it wants to do so, or it can do both in one day.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Under the language of this provision of section 14 any notice conveyed to the lessee may be treated by him as the notice within the contemplation of the section. The Government is not, under this provision, required to serve notice upon him. He may receive notice in any way, formally or informally.

Mr. MYERS. I have just quoted section 17. It says that the Secretary of the Interior may make all needed regulations. Now let me refer to the point the Senator made about notice:

Provided further, That such court proceedings must be instituted within 90 days after notice to the lessee of the facts constituting such cause of action, or the same shall be forever barred.

I think the Senator from New York will admit that that must be notice by the party who is going to bring the action. It can not be notice from a neighbor or a drummer or a traveling man; the notice must issue from the party who is going to bring the action, I take it.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Is it intended that in every case notice must be given to the lessee before the action is commenced?

Mr. MYERS. Yes, sir; in order to give a man notice that the charge had been brought against him and that unless he convinces the department that the charge was erroneous he is going to be sued.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. MYERS. With the consent of the Senator from New York, I will yield to the Senator.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I have just one further observation to make.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Very well.

Mr. O'GORMAN. If the Senator will pardon me, is it not likely that in many instances after the lessee's attention has been called to some alleged violation of the terms of the lease there will be a period of negotiation and effort on the part of the lessee to meet the demands of the department, followed perhaps by promises on the part of the lessee; and yet, if any time out of those 90 days be given to negotiation, it may reach the limit of the 90 days in negotiation, and then be too late for the Government to invoke its right to institute an action for the cancellation or forfeiture of the lease?

Mr. MYERS. The Government could file the action, and then if the negotiation settled it after the action is filed, the action may be dismissed.

Mr. O'GORMAN. In that case, if negotiation must follow the suit rather than precede it, the Government is always put to the necessity of beginning a suit.

Mr. MYERS. Very seldom. I think negotiation might both precede and follow. It might arise that a lessee might be notified by due notice, authorized notice, that he did not have in his mine the right kind of safety cages; he might install them, and then no action would be necessary.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

Mr. MYERS. I yield to the Senator from Washington, if the Senator from New York consents, and then I will yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I wanted to answer one of the questions of the Senator from New York, or to make a comment upon it. It seems to me, if this provision had been to the effect that the complaint must be filed within 90 days after it is served on the defendant, it would have been to all intents and purposes the same as reported by the conference committee, though in different words.

Under the laws of Alaska an action is commenced by the filing of a complaint in court; and I take it that in practice, whatever is provided for in this provision would be worked out practically as a part of the process of bringihg suit. I think that is what it amounts to, with the exception of the clause which makes a failure to do that a bar to bringing action on the same cause again, which, in my judgment, is an unwise though not substantially injurious provision.

Mr. MYERS. Now I yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The Senator from New York proceeded with the same character of question that was in my mind. This provision is:

That such court proceedings must be instituted within 90 days after notice to the lessee of the facts constituting such cause of action or the same shall be forever barred.

Without any statement as to what kind of notice it shall be; without providing that it must be a notice from the Secretary of the Interior. Might it not be held, if any agent of the Government called the lessee's attention to some violation of the contract of lease, that the Government would waive any right to insist upon a cessation of the violation unless legal procedure began in 90 days?

Mr. MYERS. Oh, Mr. President, I would impress upon the Senator from Georgia and upon the Senate that section 17 of the bill reported by the conferees, which is now before the Senate, says:

The Secretary of the Interior is authorized to prescribe the necessary and proper rules and regulations and to do any and all things necessary to carry out and accomplish the purposes of this act.

If there is any ambiguity or uncertainty there, it is not fair to presume that the Secretary of the Interior would merely let it continue to exist. He will make a rule stating who is to serve this notice, and that it must be in writing.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. How long does it take to go from the coast of Alaska to the interior parts in which mines are found?

Mr. MYERS. I do not know; but I take it that it is possible, and it would seem to me it would be very reasonable, that the Secretary of the Interior would designate one of the United States district attorneys for the District of Alaska—there are several districts there—to serve the notice.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Just a moment.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I desire to make a suggestion in answer to the Senator from Georgia. The Senator from Oregon [Mr. LANE], who has had large personal experience in Alaska, has stated that in inclement weather it will frequently take from two to three months to pass from one gulch to another, a distance of 50 miles.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. That being the case——

Mr. MYERS. Let me answer that. Then the delay would take place in the serving of the notice and not after the notice. If you get your notice served, then the suit will be instituted in 90 days.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Then, I will ask the Senator if we would not fail to obtain any benefit from the notice? Would we not cut the Government off from the opportunity to find out whether the lessee accepted the criticism as just and sought to comply with the requirements of the department? Would not the effect be, if a special agent reported to the Interior Department a violation by a lessee of the rules of the department, and a notice was sent on by the Secretary of the Interior that the lessee must desist, that you would have to sue at once, and you could not get any of the benefit of the result of a notice by sending a notice to the lessee to comply without litigation?

Mr. MYERS. That might occur in some instances; but the United States Government could not lose a thing on earth, because within 90 days after the service of the notice the Government could file its suit, and then could let it lie, without pushing the matter any further, until it learned whether or not the negotiations had resulted in anything.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Would it not be necessary for the Secretary of the Interior to direct that a suit be brought? Would you allow the district attorney out there to bring this suit against those people without the papers being first carefully passed on by the Interior Department?

Mr. MYERS. I would suppose that if the United States district attorney were on the ground, and had the means of obtaining the facts, consulting the witnesses, and if he were a competent attorney, he ought to be able to file a complaint that would be impervious to demurrer.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. But does the Senator not think it would be objectionable for the client, who is the Secretary of the Interior, not to have the right to pass on these matters and determine them before a suit should be instituted?

Mr. MYERS. Does the Senator from Georgia mean the Secretary of the Interior should have a right to pass on that matter?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. MYERS. I do not think the Secretary of the Interior would bother himself with a multitude of suits and a mass of litigation thousands of miles away. I think he would leave that to the duly constituted representatives, the United States district attorneys for the various districts of Alaska.

Mr. O'GORMAN. May I ask the Senator from Montana another question?

Mr. MYERS. I yield with pleasure for that purpose.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I notice that the proviso to section 14, which is the subject of this contention, states that the possession of the lands covered by the lease "shall not be interfered with by the Secretary of the Interior except after an appropriate proceeding in the district court of Alaska." Does the Senator think under that language, if the right is not reserved elsewhere, that the Government, as the landlord, has the right to go upon those premises?

Mr. MYERS. It is stated in the bill that the Secretary of the Interior may send agents to examine the property.

Mr. O'GORMAN. That is specifically stated?

Mr. MYERS. Yes, sir.

Mr. O'GORMAN. If the Senator will pardon me, I merely want to add one word to what I have already stated.

I do not favor this provision of the bill, and, unless my view changes, I shall probably vote for the rejection of the report.

I do not think, however, that the point of order has any merit. This amendment seems to me, so far as the authority of the conferees is concerned, quite within their jurisdiction. There was a dispute with regard to the settlement of controversies in the United States court in Alaska. Even if the objection went only to the phraseology employed, there was in any event a subject of dispute between the conferees; and in the composition of their differences, in my judgment, the conferees had a perfect right to formulate this change. It was not an arbitrary action on their part, because it would finally have to receive the sanction of the Senate, where it now is. So, with respect to the point of order, if it is to be left to the Senate, I shall vote against it, although my views against the proposition itself are very strong, and I am inclined, as I have stated, to vote for a resubmission of the entire dispute to the conferees.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President——

Mr. MYERS. I yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. JONES. I think the question I am about to ask was put to the Senator a moment ago, but I do not remember what his answer was. I want to ask the Senator whether or not he thinks this notice must be given before suit can be commenced? I will state to the Senator that my impression is that under this proviso the United States can begin its suit at any time at which it desires to do so, if it has the grounds on which to do it; but if it sees fit to notify the lessee beforehand, then it must bring its suit within 90 days from the notice. I should like to know what is the view of the Senator from Montana about that.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, that may be a correct interpretation of the section. My impression is that the conferees had the idea that the notice ought to be first given.

Mr. JONES. Of course, that may have been the idea of the conferees, but their idea will be determined by the court from the language of this section. I want to get the Senator's judgment now, since we have had this discussion, as to what his view really is with reference to that matter—whether it does require notice or whether the suit can be begun without it.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I should like to suggest this view to my colleague: The provision says that a court proceeding shall be instituted within 90 days after notice. It can not be instituted within 90 days after notice unless notice has been given.

Mr. JONES. If the Senator from Montana will permit me for just a moment, I understand the Senator's contention is that notice must be given before proceedings can be instituted.

Mr. POINDEXTER. It seems to me that this is the necessary inference from the provision.

Mr. JONES. But the first part of the provision reads:

That the possession of any lessee of any lands covered by his lease and the operation of the mines and other works thereon or the title of the products thereof shall not be interfered with by the Secretary of the Interior except after an appropriate proceeding in the District Court of Alaska instituted for the purpose of securing a forfeiture or termination of such lease—

And so forth.

The law provides a way by which a suit can be instituted in the courts of Alaska. I take it the Secretary of the Interior would be governed by that law in these proceedings; so that it does seem to me that he can elect which course he will take—whether he will give the lessee the notice beforehand that he has complaint against him, or whether, if he has reason to believe that the lessee is violating the terms of the lease, he will begin his suit, just as the United States can begin suit against anybody who it thinks is violating the law, without giving him previous notice.

It seems to me, therefore, that it would be a reasonable construction of the language found here that the Secretary can follow two methods. He can either institute suit according to the law and the proceedings in the District Court of Alaska against anyone who he thinks is violating the law, or he can give him notice that he is violating the law, and then he must begin suit within 90 days after that time.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I think that possibly there might be some controversy about the way that provisicn should be construed, but I do not think it makes much difference which way it is construed. I do not think it is substantial. I will say, in passing, however, that I am scarcely able to agree with my colleague, for the reason that the provision says that the Secretary of the Interior shall not interfere with the possession of the lands by the lessee until after appropriate proceedings in court; and there can not be appropriate proceedings in court until after notice.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, it does not say that there can not be appropriate proceedings in court until after notice. That is the very point that I ha e in mind. It does not require the giving of notice before the Secretary of the Interior can begin suit. He can give notice by the service of process in the regular way. If we had not said anything in the bill about notice, he would begin suit in the regular way in the courts. We do not say that he can not begin suit until after he has given notice. I agree with my colleague that it is not of very much importance, but I thought I would get the impression of the Senator from Montana as to his construction of the language used. That was all that I wanted to get at, because it does seem to me that it leaves the Secretary two courses to follow, and leaves the matter entirely to his discretion. I am inclined to think it is a wise thing to do, so far as that is concerned.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, just a word.

Mr. MYERS. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, there are some things in this particular provision that are discretionary and may be avoided, but there is to my mind one piece of dynamite in it, and that is the last seven words in the clause which I quote:

Provided further, That such court proceedings must be instituted within 90 days after notice to the lessee of the facts constituting such cause of action, or the same shall be forever barred.

If that notice is given, and, subsequently, through oversight of the department, or, perhaps, through misapprehension on the part of a clerk, the Government fails to institute suit within 90 days, that clause is forever prohibitive of any action thereafter being maintained upon that particular cause of action. I can conceive of a cause of action arising out of a combine between lessees that would be of vast importance, and the cause of action itself would be of great moment to the Government, but that is the only thing in that clause that may not be avoided. Once the notice is given and there is an oversight whereby the suit is not brought within the 90 days, then the balance of the clause is clear, concise, and positive as to the result.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I will say what I have to say in a very few moments, and I ask not to be interrupted any further. I have been on the floor practically all day, but, owing to interruptions, I do not believe all the time I have actually consumed would amount to 20 minutes. Therefore I shall try to finish very briefly, and then let my associates dynamite the report all they want to.

As to the question asked by the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES], I agree with the view taken by his colleague, the junior Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER], that the provision contemplates that notice must be given.

I was very glad to have the very clear and explicit views of the Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN] to the effect that the point of order is not well taken. I have explained in great detail several times, I think, just how the changes came to be made in the conference report. I do not believe we have changed the substance and intent of the bill. The conference report, however, makes some little changes in the method of procedure, because one section providing a method of procedure had to be stricken out and we substituted parts of two sections providing other methods of procedure slightly different. I agree with the Senator from New York that such a slight departure is not a violation of the duties of the conferees, and I am glad to have heard him so express himself.

On the point of order which is before the Senate I desire to read one precedent found on page 268 of Gilfry's Precedents, decided in 1907. It is a la e precedent, and if it is a good one the Senate will vote down the point of order. In that instance the conditions were the reverse of what they are in this case. The Senate passed a bill, which went to the House. The House struck out all the Senate bill after the enacting clause and inserted a new bill of its own. Then the bill went to conference, and the conferees took the House bill as a basis for constructing their report. They made some slight changes in it and reported it to the two Houses. The same point was raised in the Senate as has been raised to-day. Here is what Gilfry's Precedents say on the question:

The Senate proceeded to consider the said report; and
On motion by Mr. Bacon,
Ordered, That the report be printed so as to indicate the proposed changes in existing law.

On February 14, when the report came up for consideration, Mr. TILLMAN directed attention to the following provision in the new text reported by the managers:

"Provided further, That whenever the President shall be satisfied that passports issued by any foreign Government to its citizens to go to any country other than the United States or to any insular possession of the United States or to the Canal Zone are being used for the purpose of enabling the holders to come to the continental territory of the United States to the detriment of labor conditions therein, the President may refuse to permit such citizens of the country issuing such passports to enter the continental territory of the United States from such other country or from such insular possessions or from the Canal Zone."

Mr. TILLMAN then said: "I make the point of order, Mr. President, that this is entirely new and extraneous matter; that it was never considered by either House; that it does not appear in either bill as it was passed by the Senate or by the House; that the conferees have exceeded their authority, and that they are entirely outside of their jurisdiction in having brought into this Senate a matter which has no business here."

Mr. LODGE said: "In this case the Senate bill was stricken out by the House and a single amendment was made in the nature of a substitute—a long act covering every section of the existing immigration law. Therefore both bills in their entirety were open to the conferees and were subject to any modification which they might choose to make. Technically there can be no doubt that in a situation like that the powers of the conferees are very large, if not unlimited. In the second place, Mr. President, this amendment is not out of order in itself. It is a mere modification of a section which provides for certain exceptions in regard to admission to this country and for collection of a head tax. It is merely the application of the exceptions, such as are stated previously in the bill as to persons coming from Canada or from Mexico. It is a simple extension to meet another case in which entry to this country must necessarily be defined. Mr. President, I do not desire to consume the time of the Chair or of the Senate on that point. It was held, formally decided by the Senate, no longer ago than last session, that a point of order did not lie against a conference report. I contended for the House view and for the House position, which is that a point of order may be made against a conference report and the report, without a vote, be thrown out on the point of order. It was held by the Chair—correctly, as I now believe, in view of the precedents in the Senate—and sustained by the Senate, that, under the rules and practice of the Senate, a point of order did not lie against a conference report; that the only vote possible was on the acceptance of the report—it could be either accepted or rejected—and that there was nothing else open to the Senate."

After further debate the Vice President [Charles W. Fairbanks] held: "The Chair has heretofore had occasion to rule on a point of order raising precisely the same question in principle that is now raised by the point of order made by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN]. The Chair, when the subject was first presented to his attention, examined with some considerable care the practice of the Senate in the premises. He came to the conclusion then that the practice of the Senate for some time past, at least, differed somewhat from the practice which obtained in the House. The Chair is of the opinion that the objections made to the report and challenged by the point of order are entirely proper for the Senate itself to consider when voting upon the question of agreeing to the report. On the 11th of last June the Chair ruled as follows: 'The Chair is of the opinion, as he has previously held, that under the usual practice of the Senate a point of order will not lie against a conference report. The matter in the report challenged by the point of order interposed by the Senator from Texas may be considered by the Senate itself when it comes to consider the question of agreeing to the report. The only question under the usual practice of the Senate, in the opinion of the Chair, is, Will the Senate agree to the conference report?' The Chair holds that the point of order is not well taken, and therefore overrules the point of order."

On February 15, 1907, the consideration of the report being continued, Mr. CULBERSON, of Texas, said: "Mr. President, I ask the Chair to submit to the Senate the point of order made by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] to the provision of section 1 of the bill, which I will read: 'Provided further, That whenever the President shall be satisfied that passports issued by any foreign Government to its citizens to go to any country other than the United States or to any insular possession of the United States or to the Canal Zone are being used for the purpose of enabling the holders to come to the continental territory of the United States to the detriment of labor conditions therein the President may refuse to permit such citizens of the country issuing such passports to enter the continental territory of the United States from such other country, or from such insular possessions or from the Canal Zone.' The Senator from South Carolina has made the point of order that this provision is new matter, incorporated without authority, and in violation of the rules of the Senate, not having been considered or passed upon by either House of Congress, and that it is therefore subject to the point of order. I ask the Chair to submit that question to the Senate for its determination. I will read the rule of the Senate as announced by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], although it has been read once or twice. It will, however, bear repetition: 'The Presiding Officer [Mr. LODGE in the chair] referred with approval to the foregoing decision of Vice President Hobart, and stated that when a point of order is made on a conference report on the ground that new matter has been inserted the Chair should submit the question to the Senate instead of deciding it himself, as has been the custom in the House.'"

The Vice President said: "The Chair has hitherto shown that a point of order will not lie against a conference report. If such point of order were to be sustained, it would have the effect of amending the report. This, under the well-settled practice of the Senate, can not be done. This is in entire harmony with the decision of Vice President Hobart, to which reference is made. As the Chair has hitherto shown, he is clearly of the opinion that the objectionable matter, if such there is, may be considered by the Senate when it comes to vote upon the question of agreeing to the report. The Chair is clearly of the opinion that the request of the Senator from Texas is not sanctioned by either the rules or practice of the Senate, and can not be entertained by the Chair."

On February 16 Mr. CULBERSON proposed the following resolution, to which Mr. LODGE made a point of order: "Resolved, That the conferees on the part of the Senate on the bill S. 4403 be instructed to present to the conferees an amendment providing for the exclusion of Japanese laborers and coolies from the United States and their Territories and insular possessions and the District of Columbia, to be effective January 1, 1908."

The Vice President held: "The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] made the point of order that nothing can take precedence of the question of concurrence in the conference report. The Chair sustains the point of order."

Mr. Carmack, of Tennessee, having appealed from the decision of the Chair, the appeal was laid on the table—yeas 45, nays 24.

The conference report was then agreed to.

Mr. President, that is a reasonably late decision. I understand the question has been submitted to the Senate whether or not the point of order is well taken. Under this decision the point of order is not well taken. I do not believe the point of order is well taken. I believe it should be voted down, and the question should arise on agreeing to or rejecting the report.

I will simply say in conclusion, as I said in a measure once before—there may be some Senators here now who were not here then—that this is the only conference report that could be gotten. I do not believe any rules have been seriously transgressed. If there had not been this conference report there would not have been any; and if this conference report is not adopted there will be no bill at all passed at this session, because two of the House conferees have gone away to return no more during this session, and the entire subject will go over until the December session.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President, does the Senator believe that if two of the House conferees are absent the Speaker can not appoint other conferees in their places to proceed with the conference?

Mr. MYERS. I presume, upon reflection, in answer to that question, that he can. It occurred to me, however, that he would naturally leave it to the same set of conferees; and the anticipated length of this session now being so short, in the general estimation of the Members, I doubt if anything further will be done. I do not believe anything further would be done.

I read into the RECORD a while ago, although I do not think all the Senators who are here now heard it, a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, Mr. Lane, praising this report in the very highest terms, giving it his unmeasured commendation and approval, saying that it suits his views entirely, and that he has no objection to it. While that may only be considered for what it is worth in this body, I believe Secretary Lane, after the long study he has given Alaskan questions, covering a period of time ever since his induction into office, and after the long hearings he has held and that have been conducted in connection with his department, is probably equally as well versed in Alaskan conditions and what should be contained in this bill as any Member of this body, and I think more so than most of us—I know more so than I am.

I therefore think that the point of order ought to be overruled, and that we should consider the report on its merits.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Oregon [Mr. LANE] has raised the question of order that the proviso contained in section 14 is wholly new matter; that it was never, in word or in substance, considered in either House; that it does not appear in the bill either as it passed the House or as it passed the Senate, and that by including it in their report the conferees have exceeded their authority.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I understood that the matter had been submitted to the Senate, and I simply want to discuss it before the Senate comes to a vote; that is all.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Washington is in order.

Mr. JONES. I did not want to interrupt the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair thought the discussion had ended. That is the reason why the Chair was stating the question.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, it is rather amusing to me, in view of some of the statements that have been made in the papers and also from higher sources with reference to the character of the bill that the Senate passed, to hear some of the criticisms that have been made to-day on this conference report.

It has been charged that the Senate bill contained several provisions of special benefit to certain interests that have been known to be in Alaska. The public has been warned against the provisions of that bill, and it has almost been charged that the Senate put those provisions in purposely and knowingly. It has also been stated in high places that the bill as reported by the conferees is exactly right, that it is all it should be, that the interests that have been referred to have nothing to gain from any of the terms of this bill, and that the public has been protected from these plunderers of the people's resources, of which they may have been deprived by the Senate bill.

As I say, in view of those statements, it is rather interesting to me to hear some of the statements that have been made on the floor of the Senate to-day with reference to the particular provisions now in controversy, which it is now charged will favor those very interests. I simply want to say practically what the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] said—that there is no question about the sincerity and the honesty of the conferees in bringing in this conference report and in adopting the provisions that are in it, and there is no question about the honesty and the sincerity of the Senate in adopting the provisions of its bill. We are all endeavoring to adopt a bill that will be in the interest of the public and will promote the general welfare; and if any different results follow, they are not such as were intended, either by the Senate or by the conferees, and it is uncalled for to suggest otherwise.

I have no criticism to make of the conferees with reference to this report and the provisions that have been brought in. I know that they have been acting from the highest motives, and that they believe what they have brought in here will be for the public welfare and the best interests of the Government and the people of the country.

I believe, however, that the conference committee has exceeded its authority under our rules; but, as has been already said, that is not a new thing. Very frequently conference committees bring in matters beyond their real authority. I think the Senator from Georgia suggested, a while ago, the excuse they have for doing that. It has been the custom of the Senate on important measures to strike out all the House bill and insert an entirely new bill, or to adopt amendments in a sort of perfunctory way, with the idea that they will go to conference and be worked out there. So that I think the conference acted at least within the custom of the Senate, and that they are not subject to criticism. I do not understand that anybody has criticized the conferees, for that matter. The mere fact that we may think they have exceeded their authority is not a criticism of their action or of their intentions at all, and should not be taken as a reflection on them.

While I believe the conferees have put in new matter, while I think there was not any substantial difference between section 11 of the House bill and section 14 of the Senate bill, that there was nothing in controversy between the two Houses on those sections, that there was nothing in the bill that really warranted putting in this proviso, and especially nothing to warrant putting it in as a proviso to section 14, I do not feel justified in voting against the report on that account. It may be that if the conferees had stricken out section 15, as they did, and put in, in lieu of what they struck out, in the place of that section, what they have put in as a proviso to section 14, there would not have been so much question as to what they had done and as to their authority with reference to it. This proviso, if it is inserted in place of section 15, is out of place in section 14. It was not necessary to put something in in lieu of section 15 at all. It could go out and section 14 be retained as it passed both the House and Senate. The conferees had no right to omit something agreed to by both Houses even if they did insert something new.

I want to say, however, that this measure is of such very great importance to the people of our State, as my colleague [Mr. POINDEXTER] has said, and to the people of the Northwest that I do not feel that this provision should prevent me from voting for the adoption of the conference report, especially in view of the statement made by the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS] with reference to the situation that actually confronts us. I think it is a very unfortunate one, and yet I have no doubt that he states the fact when he says that if this conference report is rejected or sent back to the conferees it means no bill, at least at this session. He says that two of the House conferees are away, that it is not known where they are, and that a further conference can not be had. Legislation should not be forced through that way. It ought not to be a difficult matter, of course, to fill their places in the House, as we filled a vacancy in the conferees on the part of the Senate; but it might be that the House would not be willing to substitute new conferees. It looks to me as if we were simply in this position——

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I should like to make a suggestion there, if the Senator will permit me to do so.

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. MYERS. If two new conferees were substituted, that would mean an entire rethrashing and readjudication of the whole matter, and we might arrive at entirely different conclusions.

Mr. JONES. I do not think that suggests any very great difficulty. The discussion, at least thus far, has shown very little criticism of the report of the conferees except as to this proviso in section 14; so that, even if new conferees were appointed and they went to consider the proposition, I think the conferees would very naturally take the work of the present conferees except as to this provision in section 14, and they would consider that and bring in their report.

I do not think there would be very much difficulty about that; but I am afraid, knowing things in the House as I do and knowing the situation there as I think I do, there would be difficulty in getting a new conference and in getting the matter taken up. Much as I dislike to be placed in that position, I feel that I shall have to vote for this conference report and against sending it back to conference. Legislation should be had, and we can not afford to prevent it, except for the gravest reasons, which I do not think exist.

I think there is much force in the suggestion of my colleague with reference to the power in this new proviso and with reference to what injury may come from it. I can imagine some rather serious injuries or damages that might result within 90 days, but I do not think these are very likely to happen. As he suggested a moment ago, if the notice should be given and no suit is brought within the 90 days, then the violations about which the notice has been given must cease or else new proceedings can be instituted. So they only go 90 days, at any rate; and if action is barred for things done for which the notice is given and these acts continue, a new cause of action arises, and the same result is not likely to occur twice in succession.

Mr. WEST. Is it 90 days from the date of the notice or the occurrence?

Mr. JONES. From the date of the notice.

Provided, That such court proceedings must be instituted within 90 days after notice.

Mr. MYERS. That is, the service of the notice?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. No; that is not the language.

Mr. JONES. It does not say that.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. There is nothing said about serving the notice at all.

Mr. MYERS. You can not get the notice until it is served. There is no other way of getting notice.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The lessee would be quite likely to claim that he received notice when an inspector suggested some defect in the mine; and the 90 days might have expired before the Secretary of the Interior would know about it, and the Government would be estopped from bringing suit.

Mr. MYERS. The Secretary of the Interior may make all needful rules and regulations.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. There is nothing providing that the Secretary of the Interior must do it.

Mr. MYERS. It is in section 17.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. This is not a rule or a regulation. This is a notice that is provided for in ambiguous language, and it will be for the court to decide. It is throwing the matter into court. Suppose, for instance, that an inspector visits one of those mines and finds some vital defect there endangering life and he notifies the proprietor of the mine about it. Then he sends his report to the Secretary of the Interior, and before the Secretary of the Interior takes proceedings against him three or four months have elapsed. Meanwhile, before the Secretary knows anything about it this lessee of the mine can come into court and say: "It is too late; I am entitled to be sued within 90 days after I received notice of this." Then he testifies that he was served with the notice 90 days prior to that time. It is one of those ambiguities which just opens the door to litigation and gives the lessees every opportunity to escape.

Mr. MYERS. The Senator from Washington has the floor, and I will let him answer.

Mr. JONES. I was just going to refer to that very situation. I have not any doubt but under this provision here an inspector who went out there inspecting a mine and who found something wrong and said to the lessee, "This is wrong; you should cease doing this," and then, afterwards, suit was brought, the lessee would come in and say, "Notice was given to me 6 months ago; more than 90 days have elapsed, and you can not maintain this action." I am inclined to think his defense would be good. I think the bill is very loosely drawn. I think it ought to specify, and there would be no difficulty in specifying, that this notice must be in writing from somebody or made by somebody.

The Senator from Montana suggests that the Secretary of the Interior can make rules and regulations with reference to the service of notice and who shall do it. I suppose he can do that, and yet I would question the right and the power of the Secretary under this to impose a duty—in other words, to legislate to impose duties—upon United States marshals or Government officials, requiring them to do things they were not required to do by law. But it may be he can do that, and if he can do it I have not any doubt that he will do it. There is no excuse, however, for leaving such matters uncertain. It would have been easy to specify by whom and how the notice should be given. Provision could have been made in the lease as to how such notice should be given.

Nevertheless, that situation, as the Senator from Nebraska suggests, can arise, I think; but I do not see any very great harm to result from it. If it is found that notice of this kind had been given, and that by reason of the time it was brought to the attention of the Secretary of the Interior or the Attorney General's office suit had not been commenced within the time,

I think the Secretary would provide some remedy to prevent its recurrence. Of course, we might have some mine disaster by reason of the lessee failing to comply with some of the requirements and notice having been given to correct the conditions from which it resulted and the time expired without suit. That might happen; but it could happen even after the suit was brought to correct these things, so far as that is concerned.

I do not feel that I would be justified in voting against the adoption of this measure, it being of such great importance to Alaska and to the Northwest, because of possibilities that may happen, but which I am sure will be guarded against as fully as possible.

My colleague pointed out several of the very important provisions of this measure, with all of which I am heartily in accord, and most of which were in the bill as it passed through the Senate. I think one great defect is that we have not made provision under which the President can exercise the power that we have given to him in this bill. If the President finds that it would be desirable and necessary in order to accomplish the purpose set out here for the Government to go into the mining of coal in Alaska, we have made no provision for it, and he would have to come to Congress and await an appropriation before it could be done. We should have made that appropriation. I offered an amendment, but it was voted down, I suppose, in the interest of economy. In my judgment, the conditions are such in Alaska that it will be inevitable that the Government will have to go into the mining of coal in that Territory, just like it has had to go into the building of railroads. The conditions there are so different from anywhere else that I doubt very much if anything will be done under the leasing provisions of this bill.

As I said when the measure was up, I want to have it passed. It is the only thing we can pass, and nothing else can be done until it has been demonstrated to be a success or a failure. After we have passed it, if it is a failure, then we shall come back to Congress for other and additional legislation, and we will probably get it.

Mr. President, there are some other things in connection with this report I think probably I may as well say now as to wait until the point of order has been disposed of and do it afterwards. I think I will take a few minutes to do that.

In addition to the provisions my colleague has referred to as desirable in this bill there is another change that the conferees have made that I think improves the bill. When the measure was before the Senate I suggested that the limitation upon the power of the Secretary with reference to the royalty was rather an unwise provision. The Senate committee reported that the royalty should be within the limits of 2 cents and 5 cents per ton. The House had a provision for a minimum royalty of 2 cents a ton, allowing anything greater than that to be determined by competitive bids. It was my impression that that was the better provision. It was stated on the floor of the Senate by some of the Senators in charge of the bill that it was not the purpose of this measure to put money into the Treasury, that this royalty was only nominal and for the purpose of defraying the expenses of administering the law only.

I confess there are arguments in favor of that proposition and there are arguments against it. Some have contended that the provision that the Senate made was in the interest of monopolies and certain great interests that are often referred to when we are discussing Alaskan matters, and that the great benefit from this low royalty and this arbitrary fixing of the maximum amount of 5 cents a ton would result to their benefit. There are those who seem to think that the only way to benefit the people is to tax what they have to buy; that the only way to benefit the consumer is to add to the cost of what he consumes; that the only way to regulate prices is to increase the burdens of production.

I am inclined to think, as I suggested when the bill was under discussion, that the royalty on coal mined in Alaska will be paid very largely by those who mine the coal, and will not be taken into account in fixing the selling price; that will be fixed and determined by competition. If they bring the Alaskan coal, for instance, into the State of Washington they will have to compete with Washington coal, with coal from Australia, and with coal from British Columbia, and the price, no matter what the royalty is, will be what they can get in the market, and that will be determined by the price for local coal, and the royalty will have nothing to do with it. In Alaska, if there is no competition, of course they can put the royalty on, but if there is no competition they can charge whatever the traffic will bear, royalty or no royalty. So if we get a larger royalty we get more revenue to the Government without any special burden upon the consumer. If we held to the low royalty fixed by the Senate bill, they would sell the coal and get the benefit. If there were any way by which we could fix the price at which the consumer shall buy the coal, then, of course, the lower the royalty the better it would be, because then we could make the price lower.

But the Senate refused to put on a provision in this bill under which the price of coal could be regulated. On the other hand, if these leases are let to the highest bidder, then the strongest purse will very likely get the lease, and they will then very likely get the very desirable coal leases and the very desirable locations, and but few mines will be operated.

So in that way and from that standpoint the House provision might work to the advantage of the very interest that we are warned against. But, on the whole, I believe that the House provision, under all the circumstances, is the more desirable and the bill has been improved to that extent.

Mr. President, there was a provision put in the bill in the Senate that I regret very much has been taken out. The Senate bill in section 3 provided that the tracts shall be leased—

> Subject to any prior valid existing rights, which said rights may be perfected under the laws in force at the time the same were initiated, and under the rules, regulations, and practices of the Land Department relative to the acquisition of such rights, as interpreted and applied by the department at the time of the initiation of such rights.

It has been suggested that that provision would open up all the coal claims in Alaska that have been disposed of. No one can make any such contention as that upon the language of the law. There is absolutely no justification for any such conclusion as that. All that language does is simply to make the legislative declaration for the guidance of the Land Department, that whatever claims are now pending shall be adjudicated in accordance with the practice and rules of the department when the claims were initiated. No claim disposed of has any standing under that provision at all.

You may ask why such a provision is necessary; would not the department do that now? We would naturally assume so. Everybody will say that they ought to do it. I do not believe that there is anyone who will contend that where a man has initiated his rights to the public domain in accordance with the rules, regulations, and practice of the department existing when he initiates those rights and the law as then interpreted, and who has complied with those rules, regulations, and practice, should not have his claim adjudicated in accordance with the practice, rules, and regulations of the department.

So what was the necessity for that provision? The only necessity for it, Mr. President, was simply this, that from 1873 until 1906 the department had been following certain rules and regulations and practices and interpretation of law with reference to the initiation of mining claims and mining rights in Alaska; that during that time and while those rules and regulations and practices were in force many claims were initiated, and the claimants insist that they had complied with the law and the rules and regulations and practices of the department, but their claims have not been finally passed on. In 1907 the department inaugurated a different practice, a different rule, a different interpretation of law, and if followed in these cases it would reject all the claims that were not disposed of.

Now, it is within the power of the department to follow the rules, regulations, and practices at the time the claims were initiated. This provision is not, in fact, really necessary, but it is simply a legislative declaration of the idea of Congress as to the course that the department should take. It is very likely that public sentiment would have very much to do with the department, and no doubt it has had much to do with the department in its action with reference to these matters. Public sentiment has become very strong regarding certain conditions in Alaska. Whether just or unjust, it exists. I am satisfied, however, that there is no public sentiment and there are no people in this country who desire a rank injustice done to honest men, to men who have complied honestly and fully with the law in force at the time their rights were initiated. No one will begrudge these men, if these claims are shown to be honest and in good faith, the fruits of their toil, hardships, and pioneering.

So the real purpose I had in offering this amendment, as far as I was concerned, was to give the department the backing of a legislative declaration that, in our judgment, we thought they should adhere, as far as the decision in these cases was concerned, to the rules, regulations, and practice at the time these claims were initiated. Of course any claim found to be fraudulent they should reject, but they should not do an injustice; they should not deprive innocent men, men who have complied in good faith with the law, of the rights that they initiated, believing that the Government of the United States would recognize their claims when they had complied with the law.

I should like to see that provision in this conference report. It ought to be there. I know, however, that, so far as this provision is concerned, no different result would follow from another conference. I have satisfied myself that the Senate conferees did the best they could, and therefore I do not feel justified in voting against the conference report, and for the additional reason, as I suggested a moment ago, that the department itself can follow the rule laid down in this bill. Although I have not talked with the conferees, I have no doubt but that the conferees took that situation in mind in eliminating this language. I ask the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS] if he cares to state on the floor of the Senate whether the fact that the department can carry out and follow the rules and practices and former interpretation at the initiation of these entries had any influence with the conferees in omitting this provision?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ASHURST in the chair). The Senator from Washington addresses the Senator from Montana.

Mr. MYERS. What is it? My attention was diverted.

Mr. JONES. I made the statement that I have an idea the fact that the department can now decide these cases that are pending there in accordance with the rules, regulations, and practice at the time they were initiated had very much to do with the decision of the conferees to leave that language out of the bill; but I asked the Senator, if he cared to state it and felt free to state it, whether or not it is the fact?

Mr. MYERS. It did. The conferees simply proposed to leave it to the Department of the Interior, that it might view and construe the rule unhampered by any legislative declaration.

Mr. JONES. I thought that was true. Now, the decisions are uniform and overwhelming that not only in the courts but in the Interior Department and in the construction of the law given by the department that the department is not at liberty even to depart from the rules, regulations, and practice in force at the time the rights were initiated, and by such departure to defeat and destroy those rights, and if the department does it such action is subject to review in the courts.

While the impression among many of these claimants seems to be that they will not have the right to go into court and have their rights under the law determined, I am satisfied that they have such right. Of course I recognize that the department can so find the facts as to exclude these parties from the court, but I can not assume that the department will intentionally misjudge the facts or misrepresent the facts or decide the facts wrongfully. Assuming that the department will decide the facts in these cases as the evidence warrants, then, if the claimants find that upon such facts their rights are precluded by reason of a different interpretation of the law or a wrong interpretation of the law, there is no question but that they have the right to go into court and have such decision examined, and I am sure it would be reversed.

I want to put in the RECORD, so that the matter will be available, extracts from some of the decisions of the courts. I find in Eighty-ninth Federal Reporter, page 811, in the case of Germania Iron Co. against James and others, a decision that bears very directly upon this question, which also cites a great many cases in point. The syllabus reads:

PUBLIC LANDS—RULES OF PROCEDURE IN LAND DEPARTMENT.

The Land Department of the United States (including in that term the Secretary of the Interior, the Commissioner of the General Land Office, and their subordinate officers) constitutes a special tribunal vested with judicial power to hear and determine the claims of all parties to the public lands which it is authorized to dispose of, and it is essential to the impartial exercise of such power that rules and regulations should be adopted and steadily maintained establishing a uniform practice and method of procedure. The legislation of Congress gives ample power for the establishment of such rules, and when promulgated they become a law of property and can not be ignored by the department, to the subversion of rights acquired under them.

Then paragraph 3 of the syllabus is to the same effect. I ask leave to insert that in the RECORD, without reading, and also that the part that I have marked in the decision by pencil marks be so inserted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the absence of objection, that order will be made.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Same.—Review of decision of Land Department by courts—Error in law.

Neither the Secretary of the Interior nor the Commissioner of the General Land Office has power to make a retroactive decision abrogating rules of the Land Department; and such a decision, giving preference to an application made in violation of the rules in force when it was made, over an entry made in accordance with such rules, is an error in law reviewable by the courts.

Sandborn, Circuit Judge (after stating the facts): "The Land Department of the United States (including in that term the Secretary of the Interior, the Commissioner of the General Land Office, and their subordinate officers) constitutes a special tribunal, vested with the judicial power to hear and determine the claims of all parties to the public lands which it is authorized to dispose of." (9 Stat., 395, ch. 108, par. 3; Rev. Stat., pp. 441, 453; U. S. v. Winona & St. P. R. Co., 15 C. C. A., 96, 103; 67 Fed., 948, 955; 32 U. S. App., 272, 283). It is a part of the daily business of that tribunal to hear evidence and argument and to decide who has, by purchase, by preemption, by the location of script or land warrants, or by any other recognized mode, established a right to any part of the public domain. It has determined thousands of such controversies, and the title to millions of acres of land rests upon its decisions. Every judicial tribunal upon which the duty of determining many and varied contested rights is imposed finds it necessary to establish and to steadily maintain a uniform practice and method of procedure for the commencement and conduct of contests before it.

The case therefore stands in this way, under the bill and the demurrer to it: When the decision of February 18, 1889, was filed in the Secretary's office at Washington, there was a rule and a settled practice of the Land Department that no application to enter or to appropriate land withdrawn from disposal by a prior entry which was adjudged void by such a decision could be accepted until after the decision had been officially made known to the local land officers, and they had noted a cancellation of the former entry on their books. The register and receiver followed the rule and practice, and accepted the first legal application which was made after the decision was received. Notwithstanding these facts, the Secretary of the Interior held on December 21, 1894, five years afterwards, that a prior application to enter the land, made on February 19, 1889, in violation of the rule and practice of the department, was superior in right to that of the first applicant after the receipt of the decision, caused the entry of Hartman to be canceled, and patented the land to another, when he would have caused it to be patented to him if he had not so held. This ruling was clearly an error in law, and it entitles the appellant to the relief it seeks. (Bogan v. Mortage Co., 11 C. C. A., 128, 130; 63 Fed., 192, 195; 27 U. S. App., 346, 350; and cases there cited.) The reasonable and established rules and practice of judicial tribunals become as much a part of the law of the land as the statutes under which they act. Witness the innumerable reversals of the trial courts for errors of law in deciding questions of practice which crowd the reports of the appellate courts. Moreover, the rule and practice here under consideration stand upon far higher ground than the ordinary rules for the mere conduct of proceedings in courts. They condition the inception, the foundation, the very existence, of all rights and title to this land. Rights initiated in accordance with them became vested interests in property, and attempts to establish rights in violation of them were as though they had not been. They had become an established rule of property, upon which men relied and had the right to rely. The maxim, "Stare decisis, et non quieta movere," applies nowhere more universally, or with more salutary effect, than to those rules and that practice under which property is acquired or secured. It is often far more important that these should be certain and changeless than that they should be right. Men engage in business occupations, buy, sell, and contract, in reliance upon them. Lawyers advise their clients and enforce and protect their rights with constant reference to them, and while all interests will readily adjust themselves to, and protect themselves under, erroneous rules, there is neither protection nor safety for any interest under shifting rules. (Shreve v. Cheesman, 16 C. C. A., 413, 419; 69 Fed., 785, 791; and 32 U. S. App., 676, 687; Seale v. Mitchell, 5 Cal., 401, 403; Bates v. Relyea, 23 Wend., 336, 341; Goodell v. Smith, 20 Johns., 693, 722.)

Nor was it within the supervisory power of the Secretary or of the commissioner to set aside or annul rights acquired under this rule and practice, or to deprive Hartman of his title to this land, by a retroactive decision, made five years after his right to it had vested, to the effect that the established rule or practice when he made his entry was either inconvenient or erroneous. They might undoubtedly have made and promulgated a new rule which would have governed cases arising after a new rule of practice had been made and had become known, but Hartman and the other applicants who crowded the offices of the register and receiver of the land office at Duluth at 9 o'clock in the forenoon of February 23, 1889, at the earliest moment when this land could be entered, according to the then established and known rule and practice of the department, had the right to the determination of their claims according to the practice as it then existed. Retroactive decisions of judicial tribunals are as vicious and ineffectual as retroactive laws. (Shreve v. Cheesman, 16 C. C. A., 413, 419; 69 Fed., 785, 792; and 32 U. S. App., 676, 689.) System, order, and the uniform application of the laws, the rules, and the practice to all litigants alike are as essential to the administration of justice in the Land Department as in the courts. Doubtless every applicant for this land but one relied upon the settled practice of the department, and presented his application for it at 9 o'clock in the forenoon on February 23, 1889; yet that one who violated the rule and practice, and made application to the officers out of office hours and before the land was open for entry under the practice of the department, has defeated all the others. He who came in by some other way has defeated every applicant who came "by the door." What a farce the attempt to secure rights in any judicial tribunal must become if its rules and practice are ignored or applied at the arbitrary will of the judge who presides over the court. Under such an administration of the Land Department the rights and titles which the law attempts to protect and secure would become naught but privileges dependent upon the gracious favor of its officers. The power to degrade them to this rank can not be found in the supervisory authority of the Secretary or of the commissioner. Their power of supervision is not unlimited or arbitrary. "It can not be exercised so as to deprive any person of land lawfully entered and paid for. By such entry and payment the purchaser secures a vested interest in the property and a right to a patent therefor, and can no more be deprived of it by order of the commissioner than he can be deprived by such order of any other lawfully acquired property. Any attempted deprivation in that way of such interest will be corrected whenever the matter is presented so that the judiciary can act upon it." (Cornelius v. Kessel, 128 U. S., 456, 461; 9 Sup. Ct., 122; Bogan v. Mortgage Co., supra.) The decree below must be reversed, and the case must be remanded to the court below for further proceedings not inconsistent with the views expressed in this opinion.

Mr. JONES. Then in One hundred and seventh Federal Reporter is another case, at page 597, James and others against Germania Iron Co.

Paragraph 4 of the syllabus reads as follows:

4. Equitable title not divested by subsequent rules or decisions of department.

That seems to apply squarely to the cases that I have in mind in Alaska. These people claim to have complied fully with the law; they claim to have complied fully with the rules and regulations and practice of the department existing at the time their rights were initiated; they claim that their rights are likely to be divested only by an interpretation of the law different from that in force when they initiated their claims, so that their equitable rights have become fixed under this paragraph and decision:

4. Equitable title not divested by subsequent rules or decisions of department.

The equitable title to land acquired by a lawful entry can not be divested or affected by subsequent decisions of the Land Department or subsequent rules or modification of rules of practice therein.

Then, Mr. President, I ask leave to insert, without reading, the extracts from this decision that I have marked by pencil.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There being no objection, that order will be made.

The matter referred to is as follows:

The Land Department of the United States is a quasi judicial tribunal, invested with authority to hear and determine claims to the public lands subject to its disposition, and its decisions of the issues presented at such hearings are impervious to collateral attack, and presumptively right. A patent to land of the disposition of which the department has jurisdiction is both the judgment of that tribunal and a conveyance of the legal title to the land. (9 Stat., 395, ch. 108, par. 3; Rev. St., 441, 453; U. S. v. Winona & St. P. R. Co., 67 Fed., 948, 955; 15 C. C. A., 96, 103; 32 U. S. App., 272, 283.) But the judgment and conveyance of the department do not conclude the rights of the claimants to the land. They rest on established principles of law and fixed rules of procedure, which condition their initiation and prosecution, the application of which to the facts of each case determines its right decision; and if the officers of the Land Department are induced to issue a patent to the wrong party by an erroneous view of the law, or by a gross or fraudulent mistake of the facts, the rightful claimant is not remediless. He may avoid this decision and charge the legal title derived from the patent which they issue with his equitable right to it on either of two grounds: (1) That upon the facts found, conceded, or established without dispute at the hearing before the department its officers fell into an error in the construction of the law applicable to the case which caused them to refuse to issue the patent to him and to give it to another. (Bogan v. Mortgage Co., 63 Fed., 192, 195; 11 C. C. A., 128, 130; 27 U. S. App., 346, 350; U. S. v. Winona & St. P. R. R. Co., 67 Fed., 948, 958; 15 C. C. A., 96, 106; 32 U. S. App., 272, 288; U. S. v. Northern Pacific R. Co., 95 Fed., 864, 870; 37 C. C. A., 290, 296; Cunningham v. Ashley, 14 How., 377; 14 L. Ed., 462; Barnard's Heirs v. Asheley's Heirs, 18 How., 43; 15 L. Ed., 285; Garland v. Wynn, 20 How., 6; 15 L. Ed., 801; Lytle v. Arkansas, 22 How., 193; 16 L. Ed., 306; Lindsey v. Hawes, 2 Black, 554, 562; 17 L. Ed., 265; Johnson v. Towsley, 13 Wall., 72, 85; 20 L. Ed., 485; Moore v. Robbins, 96 U. S., 530, 538; 24 L. Ed., 848; Bernier v. Bernier, 147 U. S., 242; 13 Sup. Ct., 244; 37 L. Ed., 152.)

Mr. JONES. I have also another case, in One hundred and ninetieth Federal Reporter, page 738, Howe and others against Parker and others. Paragraph 3 of the syllabus reads:

Public lands. (Par. 97) Land Department—Jurisdiction may be exercised in accordance with law and established rules, and not otherwise.

The Land Department has jurisdiction, upon legal notice, to divest entrymen of their equitable titles to lands within its power for fraud before the final order for the patent in accordance with the settled rules, practice, and decisions of the department.

But the equitable title to land acquired by a lawful entry can not be divested or affected by subsequent decisions of the Land Department or subsequent rules of practice therein contrary to a long line of decisions or an established rule or a settled practice at the time.

Neither the general nor the supervisory jurisdiction of the commissioner or the Secretary is so arbitrary or unlimited as to permit such a course of action.

Mr. President, I also ask leave to insert, without reading, some other paragraphs which I have marked in this decision.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There being no objection, that order will be made.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Henry Howe died on June 17, 1893, and his right to his homestead was then granted to his eight heirs by section 2291 of the Revised Statutes. Burton's case against Howe had been tried and was pending before the Secretary, and on February 13, 1894, he decided it in favor of Howe, and on October 22, 1894, he denied Burton's motion for a review and a rehearing and closed the case. Howe and his daughter had lived upon and occupied the tract more than five years when this motion was denied. Conceding the general jurisdiction of the Land Department over the disposition of the tract in question thereafter until patent, and that the successor of Secretary SMITH had the same power to review and rehear Burton's case that his predecessor had, nevertheless the equitable title of these heirs to this land had then vested in them by reason of their father's adjudicated entry and the requisite occupation and improvement thereof for five years. The officers of the Land Department had jurisdiction to divest that equitable title for fraud by proceedings and decisions according to law after legal notice to all the heirs and an opportunity for them to be heard upon the charges made against them, and not otherwise. Neither the general jurisdiction nor the supervisory power of the commissioner or of the Secretary is arbitrary or unlimited. The effective exercise of each is conditioned by established rules of law. The settled rules and practice and the uniform decisions of the department constitute both rules of law and property, and equitable titles in entrymen can not be destroyed by the Land Department in violation of them. System, order, and the uniform application of the established rules and practice of the department to all litigants alike are as essential to the administration of justice in the Land Department as in the courts. What a farce the attempt to secure or protect rights in any judicial or quasi judicial tribunal must become if its rules and decisions are ignored or applied to each case as it arises at the arbitrary will of the officer who presides. Equitable titles of claimants to lands under the acts of Congress may not be annulled by the Land Department in violation of its settled practice, or of a rule of law and of property established by a long line of decisions of its officers, nor without legal notice to the parties in interest and an opportunity to be heard. (Germania Iron Co. v. James, 89 Fed., 811, 817, 818; 32 C. C. A., 348, 354, 355; James v. Germania Iron Co., 107 Fed., 597, 602; 46 C. C. A., 476, 481; Shreve v. Cheesman, 69 Fed., 785, 792; 16 C. C. A., 413, 419; Cornelius v. Kissel, 128 U. S., 456, 461; 9 Sup. St., 122; 32 L. Ed., 482; Love v. Flahive, 205 U. S., 195, 199; 27 Sup. Ct., 486; 51 L. Ed., 768.)

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, it was not the intention of the bill or of any provision in the bill to open up any claims that have been settled and adjudicated by the department. No one had any such thought, and any suggestion of that kind simply comes from a desire to muddle the situation and prejudice the question. No one in the Senate had any such idea; no one in the other House had any such idea; no one in the conference committee had any such idea; but as the conferees have provided—and I am glad of it—the cases that are now pending shall not be affected in any way by this legislation. I think that is better than the provision that the Senate adopted, under which I think it was provided that these lands, even though claimed by others, could be made subject to lease. I am glad they have eliminated that part of the bill, so that these people can have their rights adjudicated. I am glad the conferees have retained the provision which requires a decision of these claims within one year. There can be no excuse for not deciding these cases one way or another.

While I regret, Mr. President, that the provision to which I have referred was not put into the bill, I am glad that the situation is open, so that these people, in my judgment, will have a right to get into court. I believe the department, after we pass this legislation, will recognize the justice of their contention and the long line of judicial decisions and decide the cases in accordance with the rules, practice, and regulations of the department and its interpretation of the law at the time these rights were initiated.

Now, I see the Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN] is on his feet, and I take it that he wishes to move for an adjournment or a recess.

Mr. KERN. I want to make a motion for an executive session.

Mr. JONES. I will yield to the Senator for that purpose. I do not think that I shall have anything more to say on this conference report; but I have rather hurried, because I saw the anxiety to get through, and I may take a little time to-morrow morning.

ESTIMATES OF REVENUE UNDER EMERGENCY REVENUE BILL.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. KERN. For what purpose?

Mr. OLIVER. In the first place, I wish to offer an amendment to the revenue bill for printing and reference, and I have a resolution I desire to offer, calling for some information from the Secretary of the Treasury. I shall not be here to-morrow, and consequently can not then offer it. It is important, I think, that this resolution should be passed. I should like at least to offer it. If the Senator wishes to object to it, I shall not press it. I ask leave to offer the resolution which I send to the desk, and I ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution submitted by the Senator from Pennsylvania will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 466), as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to furnish the Senate at the earliest practicable date an estimate of the amount of revenue that will be raised by H. R. 18891, as amended by the Senate Committee on Finance and reported to the Senate on October 8, 1914, and that said report include an estimate in detail upon various items of the bill.

Mr. OLIVER. I will state, Mr. President, that my reason for offering the resolution is that the House committee report furnishes an estimate of the amount of revenue to be raised by the House bill, but the Senate committee report gives no estimate of the amount to be raised under the bill as amended by the Senate committee. I have no doubt that that is due to the way in which the chairman of the committee has been overworked. I do not see that there can be any objection to asking the Secretary of the Treasury to furnish this information for the use of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to.

DIPLOMATIC AND CONSULAR SERVICE.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. KERN. For what purpose?

Mr. O'GORMAN. Some days since the Foreign Relations Committee reported favorably Senate bill 5614, suggested by the State Department, for the improvement of the foreign service. The department is anxious to have the bill acted upon by Congress as speedily as possible, for this reason: Heretofore secretaries of embassies were appointed to particular embassies, and wherever the State Department deemed it desirable to make a change it became necessary to secure the approval of the Senate. Under this bill the appointments in the first place are made to the office of secretary of embassy, the department having the right thereafter to transfer secretaries from one embassy to another as occasion may require. At the present time it is said there ought to be about six assistants sent to our embassy in Great Britain. The State Department will be embarrassed very much in its work until this bill is passed.

This bill contains another provision of interest. It prohibits, by section 7, any and every person in the Diplomatic Service or the Consular Service from engaging in any trade, occupation, or profession where he is rendering service. This bill has the unanimous approval of the Foreign Relations Committee, and I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

Mr. OVERMAN. Does the bill affect consular officers, or only those in the Diplomatic Service?

Mr. O'GORMAN. It affects the secretaries to embassies, as well as officers of the Consular Service. I will say to the Senator that secretaries of embassies and officers of the Consular Service are classified into several different grades. For instance, in the Consular Service there is one class with a salary of $8,000, the idea being that the initial appointment must have the approval of the Senate, and that once an appointment is made to that class the State Department, if necessary, can transfer the person appointed to another consular office of the same rank.

Mr. OVERMAN. By putting the Consular Service into the so-called civil service Congress has abdicated its functions in that particular; but I think all such nominations should be sent to the Senate.

Mr. O'GORMAN. When the initial appointment is made it must, of course, secure the approval of the Senate; but under this bill the approval of the Senate will not be required for transfers from post to post within the same class.

Mr. OVERMAN. A person appointed consul general, say, at Ottawa under the bill could be transferred to Liverpool?

Mr. O'GORMAN. He could be transferred to any post in the same grade.

Mr. OVERMAN. Without the consent of the Senate he could be transferred as consul general at Liverpool. I object to the present consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection being made, the bill goes over.

THE COTTON INDUSTRY.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. KERN. Yes.

Mr. HOLLIS. On October 2 there was printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, at page 16069, a letter from the Hon. ROBERT L. HENRY to Secretary McAdoo. I desire to place in the RECORD, without reading, an answer to that letter.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Hampshire presents a certain letter, which he asks to be incorporated in the RECORD without reading.

Mr. SMOOT. I did not understand the request of the Senator. What is the letter to which he refers and by whom was it written?

Mr. HOLLIS. It is an answer to a letter printed in the RECORD a week ago, written by Representative HENRY to Secretary McAdoo relative to the cotton situation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from New Hampshire? The Chair hears none, and the order is made.

The letter referred to is as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, October 9, 1914.

MY DEAR MR. HENRY: I have your letter of the 2d instant.

You say that "the Secretary of the Treasury can announce that within one week he will deposit in the national banks throughout the South several hundred million dollars. * * * You have this indisputable right under section 5153, Revised Statutes, which gives you plenary powers."

You are entirely mistaken. The Secretary of the Treasury can not do this, because—

(1) The Government hasn't got "several hundred million dollars" in the Treasury; and

(2) If it had, the Secretary of the Treasury has no "indisputable right" to deposit them exclusively in the South. The Secretary of the Treasury is explicitly required by section 5153, Revised Statutes, to which you refer, when making deposits of Government funds to distribute such funds as far as practicable "equitably between the different States and sections."

If the Government had "several hundred million dollars" in the Treasury, the Congress would not be engaged now in passing a new tax bill to repair the loss in revenues occasioned by the European war.

Your further suggestion that "the Secretary of the Treasury shift the Government deposits, now about $74,000,000, to the South" is utterly impracticable, because—

(1) Section 5153, Revised Statutes, to which you refer, makes it unlawful; and

(2) The transaction of the Government's business, as well as the just needs of the other sections of the country, make it essential that Government deposits shall be kept in banks in all of the States of the Union. When the Federal reserve banks begin business these deposits may by law be transferred to them.

(3) Already $27,402,500 of the $74,000,000 to which you refer is on deposit in national banks in the Southern States.

You say, "Sell $200,000,000 Panama Canal bonds * * * and utilize our cotton as security for the Government loans," and you suggest the issuance, in addition, of $200,000,000 "of United States notes" to be loaned on cotton.

Your proposition is, in essence, to issue $400,000,000 of Government bonds, $200,000,000 of which are to be deferred obligations bearing 3 per cent interest and $200,000,000 are to be demand obligations, or greenbacks, and to deposit the proceeds in the cotton States exclusively, to be loaned on cotton exclusively, through some method too vaguely outlined in your letter to admit of judgment.

It is extremely doubtful if so large an amount of 3 per cent Government bonds could be sold at par in the present condition of the money market. The rate of interest would in all probability have to be increased. Moreover, the Secretary of the Treasury has no power under existing law to do this. You admit his want of power, because you suggest that if he needs "a little more legal authority" he can get it from Congress.

I can not believe that this is true. You have been a Member of Congress for 17 years; you are the head of its powerful Committee on Rules, which determines what legislation may be specially considered and advanced by the House of Representatives. If you think the necessary "legal authority" can be had, why do you not prevail upon Congress to give it?

Is it not because the Congress itself thinks the constitutionality of such legislation is open to the gravest doubt and the policy of it even more questionable? Is it wise to issue $400,000,000 of Government bonds and greenbacks merely to lend on cotton? Tobacco, naval stores, copper, silver, lumber, and other things have been hurt by the European war. All have applied to the Treasury for relief. If we disregard every suffering interest except cotton and make it the sole beneficiary of Government favor, what becomes of the Democratic principle, "Equal rights for all, special privileges to none"? If we enter upon the course you suggest, we must help every distressed industry impartially. To do that would necessitate the issue of many more than $400,000,000 in bonds and greenbacks and dangerously involve the credit of the Government. It would be a hopeless undertaking, in defiance of every sound principle of finance and economics, with certain disaster at the end.

What I have said is for the purpose of pointing out to you how impracticable are the remedies proposed in your letter. We are all most anxious to do any sound or practicable thing within our lawful powers to help the cotton producers and the people of the South. We feel the deepest sympathy for them, and I think I may say without exaggeration that, while there has been a vast amount of talk about the cotton situation, the National Government, through the Treasury Department, stands alone in having extended substantial and practical aid; all the rest has been talk.

On the 7th of August a conference of leading shipping men and bankers was called to meet at the Treasury Department on the 14th of August to devise means for shipping of grain and cotton to Europe and for restoring the market for foreign bills of exchange, so that our exports of these great commodities, then practically stopped by the European war, could be resumed. This conference was productive of excellent results

On the 24th of August a special conference of representative men in the different sections of the country interested in the production, manufacturing, and financing of cotton assembled in Washington upon invitation of the Secretary of the Treasury. At the conclusion of that conference the Secretary of the Treasury announced that he would accept from national banks through currency associations notes secured by warehouse receipts for cotton, tobacco, and naval stores at 75 per cent of their face value. This left the bankers free to lend such amount as they thought safe upon the security of cotton and made it possible for them to convert 75 per cent of the notes so received into national-bank currency. Since the 1st of August there has been issued to national banks in the Southern States, including Missouri and Maryland, $68,000,000 of additional national-bank currency. The national banks in these same States may, by complying with the law, receive $151,443,000 of additional national-bank currency.

The national banks of the State of Texas alone have received $15,164,000 of additional currency and may draw $40,000,000 more upon compliance with the law.

There is held by the national banks of the same Southern States $16,065,000 of regular Government deposits and, since August 1, 1914, $11,337,500 of crop-moving deposits, making a total of $27,402,500.

You will therefore see that the Treasury Department has issued to national banks in the Southern States since the outbreak of the European war—

Additional national-bank notes	$68,000,000
It has deposited with national banks in the Southern States during the same period crop-moving funds aggregating	11,337,000
It has on regular deposit with national banks in the Southern States	16,065,000
Total	95,402,000
And there is available to the national banks in the Southern States, upon their compliance with the law, additional national-bank currency amounting in the aggregate to	151,000,000
Making a total of	246,845,000

Aside from the foregoing, I may say that the Secretary of the Treasury has authorized the issuance, since the outbreak of the European war, to national banks throughout the country of additional national-bank circulation aggregating $348,795,210. A large part of this currency has found its way to the South. Recently the Comptroller of the Currency, at my request, called on the national banks of New York City for a statement of the amount of loans which they had made to banks in the Southern States from August 1, 1914, to date. These reports show that the New York City national banks are lending to southern banks more than $40,000,000.

Moreover, existing law authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury, in his discretion, to issue more than $1,000,000,000 of additional currency to national banks throughout the country. The banks, therefore, have ample opportunity to get more than enough currency to meet every conceivable demand. If more currency is, as many seem to think, the remedy for the cotton situation. I do not believe it is. I am firmly convinced that neither additional nor unlimited issues of paper money will help the cotton planter. I am equally convinced that the inevitable inflation which such issues would cause would hurt him and hurt the country. What is really wanted is a restored market for cotton at a profitable price. This is the real fact—the real truth in the situation. It is impossible by legislation to create a market for cotton or to establish a price for it. The value of cotton has been injured this year by the European war. This injury can not be retrieved nor the market restored by legislation any more than the injury to corn which was caused by the drought last year in the great corn States of the West could have been repaired by legislation.

Up to the present time there has been a disposition everywhere to look exclusively to and rely wholly upon the National Government for assistance. There are many things which the cotton States and the people of the South can do for themselves which the National Government can not do for them. The powers and resources of the Southern States should be employed for the benefit of their people, and the National Government should not be expected to do things which are beyond its power.

The Secretary of the Treasury has exercised, and will continue to exercise, all the lawful powers he possesses, consistent with sound economics and safe financing, for the assistance of the cotton producers of the South and all other industries which have been injured by the European war or which are entitled to assistance for any cause.

I am glad to state that the Federal reserve banks throughout the country are now practically organized, and that all of them should be ready to begin business within a few weeks. The resources of these banks will be available in the very near future for the further relief of the financial situation and for the benefit of all kinds of business.

Believe me, with kind regards,

Sincerely, yours,

W. G. MCADOO.

Hon. ROBERT L. HENRY,
House of Representatives.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 193) to authorize the President to grant leave of absence to two commissioned officers of the line of the Navy for the purpose of accepting an appointment under the Government of Brazil as instructors in naval strategy and tactics in the Naval War College of Brazil.

The message also announced that the House agrees to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 15657) to supplement existing laws against unlawful restraints and monopolies, and for other purposes.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills, and they were thereupon signed by the Vice President:

H. R. 11166. An act for the relief of Wilhelmina Rohe; and

H. R. 15657. An act to supplement existing laws against unlawful restraints and monopolies, and for other purposes.

ORION MATHEWS.

Mr. MYERS, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 3509) for the relief of Orion Mathews, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 815) thereon.

MEDIATION WITH MEXICO.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I am directed by the Committee on Foreign Relations, to which was referred the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 191) to convey appreciation of Congress to their excellencies Señor Domicio da Gama, Señor Rómulo S. Naón, and Señor Eduardo Suárez for their generous and distinguished services as mediators in the controversy between the Government of the United States and the leaders of the warring parties in Mexico, to report it without amendment. Inasmuch as provision is made therein for the expenditure of $3,000, I presume it will be necessary to have the joint resolution referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate; and I ask that it be so referred.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I wish to suggest to the Senator from New York that this being a joint resolution I take it that it will not be necessary to have it referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, but that it should be acted upon at once.

Mr. O'GORMAN. That is correct. If it were simply a Senate resolution, it would be necessary to have it referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate. I withdraw the request that the joint resolution be so referred, and I ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from New York?

Mr. BORAH. I do not propose to object, but I did not catch the title of the joint resolution. Will the Senator from New York state its object?

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President, in a word, the joint resolution proposes to extend the thanks of Congress to the three mediators who recently participated in the conference looking to an adjustment of the Mexican situation. There is also a provision appropriating $3,000 to be expended for the purpose of procuring testimonials of their services.

Mr. BORAH. Does the joint resolution purport to state what the result has been?

Mr. O'GORMAN. No; it simply tenders appreciation for their services. I might say, in passing, that it will be generally regarded as a very gracious acknowledgment of the good offices of Brazil, Argentina, and Chile in endeavoring to remove the causes of misunderstanding.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution. It proposes to extend the thanks of Congress to their excellencies Señor Domicio da Gama, Señor Rómulo S. Naón, and Señor Eduardo Suárez for their generous services as mediators in the controversy between the Government of the United States of America and the leaders of the warring parties in the Republic of Mexico; authorizes and requests the President of the United States to cause to be made and presented to their excellencies Señor Domicio da Gama, Señor Rómulo S. Naón, and Señor Eduardo Suárez suitable gold medals, appropriately inscribed, which shall express the high estimation in which Congress holds the services of these distinguished statesmen, and the Republics which they represent, in the promotion of peace and order in the American Continent; and appropriates $3,000 for the purchase or manufacture of the medals.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. BRISTOW:

A bill (S. 6616) for the relief of John Ogden (with accompanying papers);

A bill (S. 6617) granting an increase of pension to John H. Beatty (with accompanying papers);

A bill (S. 6618) granting a pension to Oscar O. Lee (with accompanying papers);

A bill (S. 6619) granting an increase of pension to Noah Poorman (with accompanying papers); and

A bill (S. 6620) granting an increase of pension to James E. Pennick (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. CHAMBERLAIN:

A bill (S. 6621) granting a pension to Lawrence F. Hickey; and

A bill (S. 6622) granting a pension to Alice G. Hudson (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

EMERGENCY REVENUE LEGISLATION.

Mr. OLIVER submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 18891) to increase the internal revenue, and for other purposes, which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. KERN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 15 minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

ASSAY OFFICE, NEW YORK CITY.

Mr. SWANSON. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 13296) for the enlargement, and so forth, of the Wall Street front of the assay office in the city of New York.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ASHURST in the chair). Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President, the junior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. VARDAMAN] is temporarily absent from the Chamber, I believe, on official business. I am authorized to say in his behalf, inasmuch as this bill does not provide for a new appropriation, and only provides for the use of an appropriation made some time ago—I think, two or three years ago—he has no objection to the consideration of the bill at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the bill for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

RECESS.

Mr. KERN. I move that the Senate take a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow forenoon.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m. Friday, October 9, 1914) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Saturday, October 10, 1914, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, October 9, 1914.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

We bless Thee, Infinite Spirit, our heavenly Father, that Thou dost speak to Thy children through the light of the sun, moon, and stars, in an universal language which has gone out through all the earth, through the still small voice which is ever insistent in its demands upon us for right thinking and right living; through the progress of the race from its beginning; through the prophets of old; through the eternal principles enunciated by the Master; through His incomparable life and sublime death upon Calvary. Help us, O we beseech Thee, to listen, hear, and obey, that our lives and conduct may be in accordance with Thy commands; and we will praise and magnify Thy holy name forever. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I move that the Journal be approved.

The motion was agreed to.

CORBETT TUNNEL.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I call up Senate joint resolution 74, appropriating money for the payment of certain claims on account of labor, supplies, materials, and cash furnished in the construction of the Corbett Tunnel.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to call up the joint resolution, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read the title of the joint resolution.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. BARTLETT. The gentleman from North Carolina wishes to send the bill to conference.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object, will the gentleman inform the House as to the nature of the Senate amendment which puts the matter in disagreement?

Mr. POU. The Senate amendment relates to the manner in which certain compensation is to be paid to one of the parties interested. I do not think there is going to be any trouble about it.

Mr. STAFFORD. When this bill was under consideration, as I recall, we had a distinct understanding that the bill as it passed the House should be insisted upon in conference.

Mr. POU. Speaking for myself, my purpose is to insist on the bill as it passed the House.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks that the House insist upon its amendments and agree to the conference asked for by the Senate. Is there objection?

There was no objection; and the Speaker announced as conferees on the part of the House Mr. POU, Mr. DIES, and Mr. MOTT.

DIVERSIFICATION OF CROPS IN THE SOUTH.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a letter from the Secretary of Agriculture with reference to the diversification of crops in the South to take the place of cotton.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing a letter from the Secretary of Agriculture on the diversification of crops in the South in connection with the cotton crop. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The letter referred to is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
Washington, October 7, 1914.

HOUSTON COTTON EXCHANGE,
Houston, Tex.

GENTLEMEN: I have received your communication urging this department to inaugurate and to direct a propaganda for a fixed reduction in cotton acreage next season, involving an effort on the part of this department to secure pledges from individual farmers to the effect that each will reduce his acreage as indicated, and also action on the part of this department to publish these pledges, and, so far as it can, to secure their fulfillment.

All the officers of the Department of Agriculture immediately concerned have given most earnest and prolonged consideration to the problems presented to the southern farmer by the breaking out of the European war. We are definitely of the opinion that there is no other feasible way of bringing about wise action on the part of southern farmers except through the proposal and adoption of a constructive plan. In the face of past experience and knowledge of the human element involved, it does not seem likely that an effort to induce southern farmers simply to restrict acreage will solve the problem. In the past such an effort has been made. It has been found that where agreements have been made to reduce acreage they have not been observed, and that instead of a reduction of acreage resulting there has been an increase and the production of a larger crop. Many individuals, thinking that others would reduce acreage, have increased theirs, and the result has been that which I have indicated.

The constructive plan which appeals to this department as wise and practicable is simply this: To bring home to the farmers the fact that in the next year or in the next few years the prices of all foodstuffs are likely to be high, and that it is the part of wisdom for the farmers of the country to make every effort to take advantage of the situation and to increase their products of foodstuffs, so far as possible. Even if the southern farmers should not think it wise to produce grains, such as wheat and corn, for foreign export or for interstate shipment in competition with the Middle West, it would seem to us that they should recognize the wisdom of producing enough of these commodities for home consumption and for the intercommunity market. Many of the Southern States import many millions of dollars' worth of grain each year. With the increasing prices of these products it is economically unsound for the South to rely so largely on other sections for them. It seems clear to this department that southern farmers should, at least, produce grains for home consumption as a means of cutting down the family expenses, and that they might increase their production of chickens, guineas, turkeys, and hogs to the point, at least, of supplying their own needs and the needs of their neighbors. With adequate attention to marketing, they can also profitably produce these things for interstate shipment. I am told that the number of poultry on the average Ohio farm is approximately 125, while the number on the average South Carolina farm is about 14. The same comparison would doubtless obtain with reference to most of the Southern States. This situation should be remedied, and can be remedied. The whole Nation is confronted with a problem of securing enough meat for its own consumption. Too exclusive attention in the past has been given to the production of the large animals, such as beef cattle, and to the production of these on the big ranch, which is, in a measure, disappearing. We are confronted with a decreasing meat supply and a rapidly increasing population. It is obvious to everybody who thinks that a much larger part of the meat consumption of the Nation might well be the consumption of poultry of a considerable variety, and of hogs. As a matter of fact, a very large percentage to-day of the meat consumed is of this kind. The production of these smaller animals can be very considerably increased if each individual farmer will give his attention to their production, and they can be increased, and quickly increased, without very great expense. They can be consumed at home, relieving the farmer of the expense of securing his meat from remote States, paying transportation and middleman's cost, and with the use of known methods of marketing they can be shipped beyond the community. If the southern farmer will give his attention next year and the year after to these things, and economize in production by saving manure, thereby reducing his fertilizer bill, and by planting winter cover crops, especially winter legumes, he can secure the surest relief for himself and for his community in this emergency and can bring about a wiser direction of his activities as a permanent part of the agricultural economy in the South. In this direction, it seems to me, lies the wise use of a much larger percentage of the southern farmer's labor and capital, and of his land. The department urges that the southern farmer follow this direction as the surest means of increasing his returns and of bringing about a better foundation for prosperity in the South. If he had done this in recent years, he would now have means of subsistence and would not be compelled in so many instances to part with his cotton immediately.

I recognize that there have been impediments placed in the way of the southern farmer in his attempt to diversify his agriculture by failure of banks and merchants to extend him credit on other things than cotton. It seems to me that this has been shortsighted on the part of banks and merchants. After all, the character of the individual is the foundation of credit; and again it is almost a truism that it is more important to guarantee that credit extended shall be wisely used than that it shall be extended at all. The bankers and merchants should cooperate with the farmers in ascertaining what is the wisest use of credit and in directing the application of capital and labor into the most fruitful channels.

The hearty cooperation of individuals in the South, of landowners and tenants, of all southern organizations, bankers and merchants, is needed to bring about a better direction of southern agricultural enterprise. If they should see fit at this time to follow such a constructive program as has been indicated, it would result, as a matter of course, that less labor and capital would go into cotton planting and that the output of this particular crop in another year would be proportionately reduced, or that, in any event, the South could live at home and utilize what cotton it did produce as a cash asset. The Department of Agriculture is proposing this constructive plan to southern farmers, bankers, and merchants, and is suggesting it not only through its demonstrators, but through circulars. It has issued at least 300,000 of these circulars, and will continue its efforts in this direction. A pretty general acceptance of such a plan known to the public, as a matter of course, would afford the South a guaranty of subsistence in the near future and would react on the present prices of cotton.

Very truly, yours,

D. F. HOUSTON, Secretary.

CURRENCY AND COTTON.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD for the purpose of printing a very brief bill of only five short sections dealing with the currency and cotton situation.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing a bill of five short sections on the subject of currency and cotton. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object——

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I object to that.

Mr. HENRY. Will the gentleman from New York withhold his objection for a moment?

Mr. PAYNE. I withhold it for a moment.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, this bill was prepared by a committee appointed last Wednesday evening by a cotton conference of all the southern Representatives, and on yesterday we met and were in session all day and prepared this bill as the bill to be presented by the southern Representatives. The members of that committee are HENRY, POU, MURRAY, MCKELLAR, HEFLIN, FERRIS, SAUNDERS, HUGHES of Georgia, CARAWAY, ASWELL, RUSSELL, BARKLEY, FINLEY, and STEPHENS of Mississippi. We met again last night and practically all of the southern Members were there. There were more than 80 Members present, and with practical unanimity we indorsed this bill. I want it to be printed in the RECORD for the benefit of the Members on both sides.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I think the bill will have to take the usual course. I object to printing it in the RECORD.

Mr. HENRY. The bills are pending before the Committee on Banking and Currency——

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Speaker, the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] objects.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. Evidently there is not.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will lock the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The SPEAKER. On this call 292 Members have answered to their names—a quorum is present.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to, and the doors were opened.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for one minute in regard to the RECORD of yesterday.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to proceed for one minute in regard to yesterday's RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman if it is a correction of the RECORD?

Mr. RAKER. Well, in substance; it is not exactly a correction, but a statement.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman has a right to correct the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. It is not a case where he can correct the RECORD.

Mr. STAFFORD. But if it is for the purpose of laying the foundation for a speech I should object.

Mr. RAKER. Oh, no; it is not.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, on page 16344 of the RECORD, on the vote on the conference report, it appears that the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR], the gentleman from Utah [Mr. HOWELL], and I did not vote. The Committee on Mines and Mining designated the gentleman from Colorado, the gentleman from Utah, and myself to appear before the Secretary of the Interior to consider a very important bill in regard to the relief of miners in Alaska and in the West. The bells did not sound properly in the office and the clerk misunderstood them, and owing to that fact we did not get here in time to vote. Now, the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR] is for the conference report, I am for the conference report, and we wanted to vote for it. The gentleman from Utah [Mr. HOWELL] is against the conference report.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, some months ago I had unanimous consent, which has not been used up to this time, to print a statement in the RECORD in reference to the legislation that has been passed by Congress during the present administration. I have let some months run by and do not care now to print that statement under the leave to print obtained some months ago. I ask unanimous consent that I may have leave to print a statement in the RECORD in reference to legislation that has been passed by Congress during this administration.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

Mr. PAYNE. Reserving the right to object, I want to ask the gentleman if it is a duplication of the consent that he had some months ago?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It is; there was no limitation on it. I had general leave to print, but I do not care to use it after this lapse of time.

Mr. PAYNE. I do not want to take advantage of the gentleman's negligence.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. There was no negligence; I was not ready.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a request similar to that just made by the gentleman from Alabama, having had leave to print some time ago on the other side of the question.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Washington? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

COTTON.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to print in the RECORD an editorial on the cotton situation.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing an editorial on the cotton situation. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. I object.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Alabama rise?

Mr. HEFLIN. Last night, Mr. Speaker, the Members from the Southern States agreed on a cotton bill which they think will bring relief to the southern people in this time of great distress, and I ask unanimous consent that that bill may be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. PAYNE. I will object to that, Mr. Speaker, as I did a little while ago when the gentleman from Texas made the request.

Mr. HEFLIN. I trust that the gentleman will withhold his objection.

Mr. PAYNE. The gentleman's trust is misplaced; I objected to the same request, which was made by the gentleman from Texas who has been making a specialty of that thing.

Mr. HEFLIN. I did not expect anything else from the gentleman from New York, who objects to everything that is of benefit to the people of the South.

Mr. PAYNE. I will debate that subject with the gentleman when the time comes.

THE PHILIPPINE ISLANDS.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule the House will automatically resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD] in the chair.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. FLOOD of Virginia in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 18459, of which the Clerk will read the title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 18459) to declare the purpose of the people of the United States as to the future political status of the people of the Philippine Islands, and to provide a more autonomous government for those islands.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, when this bill was last up for consideration by the committee I had offered an amendment to the pending paragraph, which was passed without prejudice in order that we might perfect the phraseology of the amendment. I now desire to withdraw that amendment, and in lieu thereof offer one which I have sent to the desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent to withdraw his amendment. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "Provided," in line 1, page 8, insert: "That upon the approval of such an act by the Governor General it shall be by him forthwith transmitted to the President of the United States, and he shall approve or disapprove of the same within 90 days from and after its enactment and submission for his approval, and if not disapproved within such time it shall become a law the same as if it had been specifically approved: Provided further"——

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, one thought has occurred to me—is the expression "three months" still retained?

Mr. MILLER. No; I have changed that to 90 days. I recognize the inadvisability of using the term "three months." Mr. Chairman, I do not care to discuss the amendment further.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. MILLER) there were 75 ayes and no noes.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to call the attention of the committee seriously to the part of section 9 contained on page 8 of the bill, and in order that it may be clearly before the committee I want to read, in the hearing of those who have not the bill before them, the exact language. I really think this is a very vital and important matter, and therefore I hope it will receive the attention of the committee. The language to which I refer is as follows:

Provided, That where lands in the Philippine Islands have been or may be reserved for any public purpose of the United States, and, being no longer required for the purpose for which reserved, have been or may be, by order of the President, placed under the control of the government of said islands to be administered for the benefit of the inhabitants thereof, the order of the President shall be regarded as effectual to give the government of said islands full control and power to administer such lands for the benefit of the inhabitants of said islands.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, one moment. Is the gentleman asking unanimous consent to consider his amendment? I think we have passed section 9.

Mr. MILLER. I move to strike out the whole proviso. We have not passed the section.

Mr. JONES. My understanding is that we had passed this section when we adjourned.

Mr. MILLER. Oh, no; the committee was occupied at the close of the last session in considering an amendment which I had offered to that proviso, and the committee voted against the amendment, and there was left pending the amendment which I have just now brought up, and this additional amendment to which I now refer certainly is in order, because the paragraph has not been passed.

Mr. JONES. I recall that the gentleman offered an amendment to this proviso.

Mr. MILLER. I did; and it was voted down. That was the last thing that occupied the attention of the committee when we last considered the bill.

Mr. Chairman, the situation which is presented by this paragraph, it seems to me, is this: There are lands in the Philippine Islands to which it is expected this provision will apply; otherwise it would not be in the bill. What are the lands? Lands that have been heretofore set apart or used, at least set apart, for public purposes. Most of the lands that have been set apart for public purposes have been set apart for military reservations, and there are some quite extensive military reservations in the islands. There are several in Mindanao and several in Luzon, and several in other islands which might be mentioned.

Mr. GOULDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER. Yes.

Mr. GOULDEN. Are there any other reservations known to the gentleman than those for military or naval purposes?

Mr. MILLER. I presume there have been some withdrawals for civil purposes; as to that I am not advised, but I should presume there have been some reservations for the construction of civil buildings or possibly parks.

Mr. GOULDEN. I am inclined to believe that there are no other reservations except military and naval. I see no reason why there should be.

Mr. MILLER. I am willing to base the argument upon that proposition, that the only reservations to which this will apply will be military or naval reservations. What does the language of this paragraph do? It does not convey any title. These military reservations belong to the United States Government. The title in fee is in the United States Government, just as the title in fee to Fort Myer is in the United States Government. There is nothing in this paragraph that conveys away or alienates that title which the United States has.

The language of the paragraph is that when the President shall consider any of these lands are no longer needed for public purposes, then he shall turn them over to be administered by the Philippine Government for the benefit of the inhabitants of the islands, and his order shall be sufficient and effectual to give the Government of the said islands what? Title? No; full control and power—to do what? To administer such lands for the benefit of the inhabitants of said islands. Let us take a concrete case. I know there are lots of military reservations now in the Philippine Islands that in at least a few years more will no longer be needed for military reservations. They should properly be opened up for homestead development. Upon that there can be no difference of opinion. In the island of Luzon there is a military reservation known as Camp Stotsenburg. I presume there will be need for that for some time, yet let us assume that there will not be, and that it is desired that it be opened up for homestead settlement; the President of the United States will make a finding that that military reservation, a very desirable area in the island of Luzon——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, the President will make a finding that this is no longer needed, and he will turn it over to the Philippine Government. The entity to which it will go for control unquestionably will be the legislature of the islands with the cooperation of the Executive. There has been no transfer of title, please understand. What can the Government of the Philippine Islands want with it? They will not want it for a military reservation. They will naturally want to open it up for occupation by the people, that it may be settled on and developed nd made productive. They have homestead laws in the islands to-day. Suppose a settler goes on that land, acquires a homestead, and develops it, has he any title to it? No. The United States retains the title to it, but it has parted with the capacity to give the title to the Filipino homestead settler. The Philippine Government is a trustee, it seems to me, by this language, and only a trustee, in the administering of these public lands. Therefore, when the Philippine Legislature should attempt, or the Philippine Government should attempt, to alienate those islands, to convey title to individuals, to sell the timber on them and develop the water power on them, open up the mines in them, it could not do so, because it has not the legal title to convey.

Mr. QUEZON. Is it not true that the language used in this paragraph is the same as the language in the first paragraph of this section, whereby the whole public domain of the Philippine Islands is placed under the control of the Philippine Governmen for the benefit of the inhabitants thereof?

Mr. MILLER. The language is not the same.

Mr. JONES. The language is precisely the same, Mr. Chairman; not in the previous section, but in this very section; and I was going to call the attention of the gentleman to that.

Mr. MILLER. I now understand that to which the gentleman refers. It is true the language is the same, and the objection which I make to this is equally good to the other portions of the paragraph.

Mr. JONES. The gentleman knows, I think, that a considerable part of this section is an exact copy of the organic law. The organic law provides that the public lands, sixty-odd million acres, shall be placed under the control of the Philippine Government, to be administered for the benefit of the Filipino people. The language employed in this proviso is exactly the same as that employed in the organic law under which the Philippine Government has been disposing of parts of the public domain for 12 years. If, then, the language used in the proviso which is intended to put the lands embraced in it under the control of the Philippine Government is not sufficient to enable that Government to dispose of them, then that used in the organic law, which is precisely the same, does not authorize the disposal of the lands which are now being disposed of by the Philippine Government. If, therefore, there is need for amending the language of the proviso, there is still greater need of amending that used as to the great bulk of the lands.

Mr. MILLER. Of course the gentleman would at once recognize there is a very wide difference between the general lands in the Philippine Islands and lands which we hold for public purposes?

Mr. JONES. Oh, Mr. Chairman, this is a part of the land acquired from Spain, the remainder of which was placed under the control of the Philippine Government. Now, we propose to put these pieces under the control of the Philippine Government for the benefit of the Philippine people, to be disposed of precisely as the other lands are now disposed of.

Mr. TOWNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. TOWNER. If the gentleman will allow me to say to the chairman, I do not think there is any controversy that the chairman suggests, at least there is not in my mind, in regard to his position; I agree with him entirely; but now, in order that it may be really for the benefit of the Filipino people, we should convey the title to them. Do not give them only the power of control.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has again expired.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I ask for time.

Mr. JONES. The gentleman from Iowa asks to be recognized in his own right.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Iowa on the assumption that the pro forma amendment is withdrawn.

Mr. MILLER. I moved to strike out the proviso.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, this is the situation as I understand it: I think the gentleman from Minnesota has called attention to a defect in the wording of the section. The United States can not divest itself of the title by saying that the use of these lands shall be granted to the Philippine Government. The Philippine Government can not acquire title to the land because title is not conveyed to them, only use is conveyed, only perhaps a trusteeship to their government to control the lands for the benefit of the Philippine Islands. My idea would be that this section ought to be rewritten so that whenever these lands are transferred they shall be transferred to the Philippine Government absolutely, so that they can convey the title if they desire, so that it will be not only for the use of the Filipino people, but they will have actually the title to the land, to use it if they choose, to convey it if they so desire.

Mr. HELM. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. QUEZON. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. TOWNER. I will yield first to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. HELM. Has it not been the contention of the gentleman from Iowa, as well as the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER], that the defect in this proviso was that your apprehension was that Congress was undertaking to transfer to the Filipino people some naval and military reservations—for instance, Corregidor—and your position has always been in opposition to what you are now asking should be done?

Mr. TOWNER. No; I think there is no inconsistency in the position, I will say to the gentleman from Kentucky. I think we ought not to put it within the power of the President to convey away land that really ought to belong to the United States; but I do think there are circumstances, as the chairman has well said, where lands have been acquired which are no longer useful to the United States, where they ought to be turned over to the Philippine Government, and in such cases I would favor not merely the transferring the control to the Philippine Government, but I would transfer the title, so that they would have it entirely within their control. As I conceive it, there is no inconsistency in being careful what we give away and at the same time when we do make a grant to make it valuable. In the first place, we ought to limit the power to grant so as to protect the Government of the United States; but in cases where it would be safe to grant the power, then it ought to be an absolute power and not a limited power. I now yield to the gentleman from the Philippines.

Mr. QUEZON. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that the question which has been raised here is a very important one, and I would like to get some more information thereon. May I ask the gentleman if it is his opinion that there is a difference between the title of the United States with regard to the public domain in the Philippine Islands and the title of the United States with regard to those lands which have been selected for military purposes?

Mr. TOWNER. I will say to the gentleman I think not.

Mr. QUEZON. That there is no difference?

Mr. TOWNER. I will not say that there is no difference.

Mr. QUEZON. If there is no difference, then the language of the bill will have the same effect; but if there is a difference, then the language of the section ought to be different in one case from the other.

Mr. TOWNER. Well, I would say, in my judgment, there can not be any transference by the Philippine Government of the title under the language that is contained in the bill.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] has expired.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I ask for recognition in my own right. I do not know whether I clearly got the thought of the gentleman or not. Do I understand that it is his contention that a title to public lands granted under an act of the Philippine Assembly would not be good?

Mr. TOWNER. Oh, no, sir. The gentleman, who is a fine lawyer, can appreciate the point, I think, without any difficulty. Here is the language of the section. It says, "shall be, by order of the President, placed under the control of the government of said islands to be administered for the benefit of the inhabitants thereof." To be "placed under control" would not, as the gentleman knows, convey title or the right to grant title, and therefore in these cases where such lands as the committee has specified, where the tracts of land are no longer needed, the lands of the United States ought to be disposed of by the Philippine Government for their own use or for some other. The absolute right to convey title ought to be granted to the Philippine Government.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. If the gentleman will permit, here is my construction of that language, namely, that they will be placed by the Executive order of the President of the United States—those lands that have been reserved—in precisely the same situation that the other public lands are in at this time.

Mr. TOWNER. I hardly think so, because——

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. And if that be true, then there can not be any question about the matter of title being good.

Mr. TOWNER. If the gentleman is correct about that, that proposition would probably be true.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I thought that was the intention of the matter.

Mr. TOWNER. I do not think the gentleman is hardly justified in doing that, if he will pardon me for saying so. Of course, this matter is really very important in some of its aspects.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. It is.

Mr. TOWNER. And I suggest, if the gentleman has no objections, that right be given to bring this matter up again, or that action be withheld on it until some subsequent time, when we can have made further investigation. So far as I am concerned, I am not absolutely certain regarding the proposition, and I think perhaps other gentlemen are not certain regarding it. Perhaps we ought to pass it for the present.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. If I can proceed for two or three minutes, I want to state my view of it, and then I shall have no objection, if it is regarded really important, to have the matter passed over.

By the treaty of Paris, the treaty of peace between the United States and Spain, the United States acquired title to about 60,000,000 acres of land known as Crown lands belonging to the Crown of Spain, I presume, in the Philippine Islands. At any rate, they were public lands, and the Government of the United States acquired title to them. Now, in the organic act of 1902 it was expressly provided that those lands should be placed in the control of the government of the Philippine Islands, created by that act of 1902, to be administered for the benefit of the people thereof, and elaborate legislation was had in the organic act of 1902 fixing in general the terms upon which mineral rights and timber rights could be granted, and to the Philippine Government then created, first the executive council, and later, beginning in 1905 or 1907, when the assembly became a part of the government, it gave general laws by which that subject could be disposed of.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent for five minues more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. It was subject to the limitations fixed in the organic act of 1902. Now, I take it that no gentleman will question the power of the Philippine Government at this time, subject to the limitations of the organic act of 1902, to grant good title to public lands in the Philippine Islands. The purpose of the proviso in this bill is simply to enable the President of the United States by Executive order to grant to the government of the Philippine Islands jurisdiction over such lands as have been reserved or may be reserved for military, naval, or other purposes, as was provided in the organic act of 1902, and put them on exactly the same plane as are the general public lands that have not been reserved.

Mr. MILLER. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I will.

Mr. MILLER. Suppose Congress had not enacted any law authorizing the Philippine Government to transfer title to timber, homestead, and so on, then under the general language which the gentleman states, in the organic act of 1902, does the gentleman think the Philippine Legislature would have had the power to transfer title? In other words——

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. If Congress had not given the power?

Mr. MILLER. If Congress had not by supplemental legislation specifically provided a manner to authorize the Philippine Government, which is in the nature of a trustee, to convey title, does the gentleman think the Philippine Government could have done so?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I do not think so.

Mr. MILLER. That being true—and I agree with the gentleman—this is not enacted subject to prior laws affecting the public domain. This is not enacted supplemental or in addition to previous laws relating to the public domain. Here is simply a transfer of the control of lands from the Government of the United States to the Philippine Legislature. Now, if in addition to this you add "and the Philippine Government shall have full authority to administer such lands in accordance with the laws heretofore passed by Congress," or any other phraseology you want to use, so as to bring these lands expressly within the operation of the laws affecting the general public domain, there is no question about the result, and the gentleman is right; but without that I can not see how the Philippine Government can do anything on earth but administer these in a public way. For instance, that is the exact language we use when we transfer to a municipality or to a State an area of ground to be used as a park or to be used for some other public purpose. It seems to me this is the exact language that we do use when we are conveying the control of a piece of ground to a municipality for public-park purposes or public purposes generally, and the municipality can use them for no other purpose.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will permit, it is my thought that that comes under section 29 of this bill, which expressly provides—a somewhat unusual provision to put into a bill, by the way—

That all laws or parts of laws applicable to the Philippines not in conflict with any of the provisions of this act are hereby continued in force and effect.

That was put in, as the gentleman knows, being a member of the committee, as a matter of precaution, in order to insure the continuance of laws without any question of additional laws being made concerning them. It was and is my idea, under that provision, that certainly the general laws regarding public lands would be applicable to that which was originally reserved but which may hereafter be placed under the administration of the Philippine Government.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. HAMMOND). The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Tennessee have five additional minutes. I would like to ask him another question.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. MILLER. Now, I would like to ask the gentleman this question: Those laws to which section 29 refers are laws heretofore passed, relating to lands heretofore in the possession of the Government, as well as relating to other things. Here are some lands which we are transferring control of from the Government of the United States to the Philippine Government. Does the gentleman think that by the language we have here employed we are going to make these lands subject to the homestead laws and the timber laws that we have heretofore enacted applicable to the public domain? There is nothing here to say that the lands thus restored become a part of the public domain. There is nothing here to say that the laws previously enacted with reference to the public domain shall be applicable here. We are transferring control of lands in the Philippines to be administered by the government of the Philippine Islands for the benefit of the inhabitants.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. This language is where lands in the Philippines have been or may be reserved. All those lands were public lands.

Mr. MILLER. To the extent that they were part of the Crown lands?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Yes. They belonged to the Crown lands. They were all public lands. Now, it having been found that some tracts were unnecessary for the purposes reserved, it is desired to retrocede them. That word "retrocede" is not an exactly accurate legal expression, but it conveys the idea I have in mind. It will simply put them back into the status quo, back where they would have been had they never been reserved.

Mr. MILLER. What is the objection to putting in language to the effect that the lands will be conveyed to the Philippine Government?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. That is further than we have gone, as a matter of fact, in regard to public lands generally. Not at any time, either in the organic act of 1902 or in this bill, have we said that we conveyed title to the Philippine Government. Not at all.

Mr. HELM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Certainly; I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HELM. Do I understand from the gentleman from Tennessee that the fee to what you denominate the Crown lands is now in the so-called Philippine Government?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I do not think so.

Mr. HELM. The fee to the public lands is not in the Philippine Government?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. No.

Mr. HELM. Where does it rest now?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The fee rests in the United States Government. But through its legislative arm it did, as it had the right to do, confer upon the Philippine Government the power to give title and administer the trust.

Mr. HELM. Well, as I understand that, if that is correct, then the Philippine Government must necessarily have a limited fee. But a fee is absolute unconditional ownership.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has again expired.

Mr. HELM. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. HELM] moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. HELM. Mr. Chairman, my understanding, and what I thought was true, was that the fee to these public or so-called Crown lands now rested in the so-called Philippine Government, and unless the fee does rest there the title or ownership of the Philippine Government to these lands is not a complete ownership, and the United States still has some kind of interest remaining in these so-called Crown lands. I have thought that the fee to these so-called Crown lands was in the Philippine Government, and that the fee to these military and naval reservations, or lands that had been reserved for that purpose—the fee to these lands and those that are undertaken to be described or mentioned in this proviso—was in the United States. I can not comprehend how this Government would have expended large sums of money, as it has done, in improving and erecting fortifications of unusual dimensions and proportions upon land to which it had only a limited title.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The United States Government had absolute title to that land. I will say to the gentleman.

Mr. HELM. Well, absolute title is fee-simple title.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Undoubtedly.

Mr. HELM. The meaning of "title in fee" is absolute title.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HELM. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I call the attention of the gentleman to section 12 of the organic act of 1902, which says:

That all the property and rights which may have been acquired in the Philippine Islands by the United States under the treaty of peace with Spain, signed December 10, 1898, except such lands or other property as shall be designated by the President of the United States for military or other reservations of the Government of the United States, are hereby placed under the control of the government of said islands to be administered for the benefit of the inhabitants thereof, except as provided in this act.

Mr. HELM. It is not a fee.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. It is not a fee. I said in my answer to the gentleman a few moments ago that the fee to these lands did not rest in the Philippine Government, but it had been transferred by the Government of the United States to the Philippine Government; that there has been given to the Philippine Government by this Government the power under certain limitations to dispose of and make title to individuals to those lands.

Now I want to make my thought clear, if the gentleman will yield a moment further. We acquired absolute title, fee simple, to 60,000,000 acres of public Crown lands by the treaty of Paris.

Mr. SLAYDEN. By the treaty of Paris?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Yes; by the treaty of Paris. The fee passed absolutely to the Government of the United States.

Mr. HELM. Right there, Mr. Chairman, I believe I have the floor.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Yes; I yield.

Mr. HELM. I had thought that title of equal dignity had been passed by this Government to the so-called Philippine Government to these particular lands—to these 60,000,000 acres of land.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. No. The gentleman will see from the language I have just read that it has not been done.

Mr. SAUNDERS. How can the Government pass fee that it does not have?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. It is empowered by the act of Congress to pass the fee, subject to the limitations of the organic act.

Mr. SLAYDEN. It does not include the friar lands, though?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. No.

Mr. HELM. Let me see if I understand the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The Government of the United States acquired this title to this 60,000,000 acres of public land.

Mr. HELM. Sixty million acres?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Yes; 60,000,000 acres, by the terms of that treaty.

Mr. HELM. What became of that fee? That is what I want to know.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. That fee still rests in the Government of the United States.

Mr. HELM. The gentleman does not undertake to say that this language conveys the fee?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. No; I do not; but by the terms of the organic act of 1902, although the Government of the United States retained the fee, it did, as was felicitously suggested by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS], pass to the government of the Philippine Islands, as it had the right and the power to do——

Mr. HELM. The fee?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Not the fee, but the authority to convey the fee to the individuals.

Mr. HELM. Where is that language?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. In section 12 of the organic act of 1902, which I just read a moment ago, and sections following.

Mr. HELM. I disagree with the gentleman on that.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. And in section 13 and others which follow.

Mr. HELM. You would have a stream rising higher than its source.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I do not think so.

Mr. CLINE. I will ask the gentleman whether it is his position that section 12 of the act of 1902, in conjunction with the language used in this proviso, that the order of the President shall be regarded as effectual to give the government of said islands full authority and power to administer such lands for the benefit of the inhabitants of said islands, is sufficient to give the absolute title in those lands to the Filipino people or the Philippine Legislature.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Oh, no; I do not think so. I like the expression of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS]. The power to pass title to the public lands in the Philippine Islands was conferred upon the Philippine Government.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to address the committee on this subject for five minutes. I have been trying to get recognition to address the committee, and have not been able to get it.

Mr. MILLER. If the gentleman prefers, I have an amendment which I can offer, and then the gentleman can address himself to that.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. JONES] asks unanimous consent to address the committee for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, it would be much better to discuss a subject of this importance upon some genuine amendment rather than upon a mere pro forma amendment.

Mr. MILLER. If the gentleman will yield, I will offer an amendment.

Mr. JONES. The whole proceeding is irregular. But, Mr. Chairman——

Mr. TOWNER. Would not the gentleman rather address his remarks to the amendment of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER], which he is willing to offer?

Mr. JONES. Not now. Mr. Chairman, I think more importance has been attached to this subject than it deserves. The gentleman who first raised this question seems to have changed his position——

Mr. MILLER. Not at all.

Mr. JONES. Yes; I think the gentleman has. In the first place, he objected to the language of the proviso. He offered no objection to similar language in the section placing the entire public domain, some 68,000,000 acres of land, under the control of the Philippine Government, to be administered for the benefit of its people.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will allow me——

Mr. JONES. If the gentleman will not interrupt me for a minute, I would like to say what I started out to say upon this subject. To my mind it is not important to determine whether the Philippine Government has an actual fee-simple interest in these lands or merely that control over them expressly conferred in the organic law. That law was prepared by two gentlemen who are recognized, I think, as among the ablest lawyers in this country—ex-Secretary ROOT and ex-President Taft.

Under that law the Philippine Government has been disposing of these lands for the past 12 years. It has disposed of one tract of some 56,000 acres to a corporation engaged in the production of sugar. This large tract, however, was a part of the friar lands acquired by purchase from certain religious orders.

Mr. Chairman, if it be admitted that the United States still holds the fee simple title to the lands acquired from Spain, it must, I think, be at least conceded that the power to dispose of them has been conferred upon the Philippine Government. If I, as the owner of a tract of land in the Philippines, were to give to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER] a power of attorney to sell it, any conveyance of it which he might execute would be just as valid and binding upon me as if executed by myself.

Mr. MILLER. Absolutely, but this is not a power of attorney.

Mr. JONES. The authority given to the Philippine Government by the Congress of the United States to control and dispose of these lands is in effect the same as a power of attorney given by a private individual to dispose of lands held by him in fee simple. I can not therefore believe that it is necessary to add anything to the language of this bill. It is precisely the same as that in the organic law, and I do not think any question has ever before been raised as to the right of the Philippine Government to sell and dispose of the public lands as prescribed in the provisions of that law. I am willing, however, to agree to the suggestion of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] that the section be passed by until we can have an opportunity to look more carefully into the subject.

Mr. MILLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES. I wish first to state briefly what the situation is. The United States Government acquired all the public lands in the Philippines, including those that come within the terms of this proviso, from Spain under the treaty of Paris. Under the act of Congress of July, 1902, these lands, with the exception of certain reserved parts, which included those affected by this proviso, were placed under the control of the Philippine Government, to be administered for the benefit of the Philippine people—in other words, to be disposed of for their use and benefit.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Virginia has expired.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Virginia be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. JONES. As I have said, all of these lands, with certain exceptions, were placed under the control of the Philippine Government, to be administered for the benefit of the inhabitants of the islands. It is now proposed also to place a part of those public lands not heretofore so placed under the control of the Philippine Government. If this shall be done, the Philippine Government will hold them in precisely the same manner that it holds the great bulk of the public lands, because the language employed in this proviso is the same as that employed in the organic law.

Some gentlemen seem to think that because the United States did not turn these small pieces of land over to the Philippine Government at the same time that it turned over the bulk of the public domain—although the same language is employed in both cases—it will be held by the Philippine Government in a manner different from that under which it holds that first acquired. This can not be true.

If the Philippine Government now possesses the right to dispose of the public lands placed under its control 12 years ago, of course, subject always to the restrictions and limitations prescribed in the act of 1912, it will possess the same right to dispose of the small pieces which it is now proposed to place under its control. There can, I think, be no question as to the correctness of this proposition.

Mr. MILLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES. Yes; I will yield for a question, but I do not want the gentleman to ask it and then discuss it, as he did in the time of the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. MILLER. Does not the gentleman think that it is necessary, in order that the lands contemplated by the proviso shall be in the same position as the big bulk heretofore conveyed, that the language specifically state that these lands in this proviso shall be subject to the provisions of acts of Congress heretofore passed?

Mr. JONES. I do not. I think that section 29, to which my colleague [Mr. GARRETT] called attention, makes it clear that these lands are to be held and disposed of subject to the provisions of the organic act. But there is also another section which makes this clear, to my mind; it is section 6. It reads as follows:

> That the laws now in force in the Philippines shall continue in force and effect, except as altered, amended, or modified herein, until altered, amended, or repealed by the legislative authority herein provided or by act of Congress of the United States.

These two sections continue in force and effect the provisions of the organic law in relation to the sale and disposition of the public lands under the control of the Philippine Government. I do not think there can be room for much doubt as to this.

There is still another provision of this bill which, in my judgment, has some bearing upon this point. It is the proviso in section 12, which declares that until the legislature provided for in this bill is organized the existing legislature shall exercise all legislative authority conferred upon that legislature, and so forth.

Mr. MILLER. Will the gentleman yield for one more question?

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. MILLER. Suppose I had two pieces of land; that I owned them myself. I convey one to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. JONES] as trustee, to administer for the benefit of somebody else. After a while I say that in administering them he can convey title to certain individuals and certain classes of people. Subsequent to that I convey to him some other land in trust, but say nothing about the authority to convey. Does the gentleman think that he would have authority to convey the lands mentioned in the latter conveyance?

Mr. JONES. Oh, the gentleman states a case that is not at all parallel to the one we are considering. The case here is this: The United States 12 years ago placed sixty-odd millions of acres of land, which it acquired from Spain, under the control of the Philippine Government, to be disposed of by it under certain restrictions and limitations. They still possess a few acres of the land acquired from Spain, for which they have no use and which it is proposed also to place under the control of the Philippine Government. It is my opinion that if this is done, this land can only be disposed of in the manner in which similar lands now held by the Philippine Government are disposed of. I may be mistaken about this, of course, and therefore I am willing that section 9 be passed by, to be returned to after we have had full opportunity to examine fully into the subject. My wish is, of course, to remove all the doubt there may be about this matter.

Mr. MILLER. That request of the gentleman applies to the whole section?

Mr. JONES. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendments by the gentleman from Minnesota and the gentleman from Kentucky are withdrawn. Has the gentleman from Virginia a request to make?

Mr. JONES. No.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, this section has been passed by unanimous consent, and no amendment can be offered to it.

Mr. MONDELL. When was it passed by unanimous consent?

Mr. JONES. At this moment.

Mr. MONDELL. Not at all.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming has risen to offer an amendment. The Chair asked the gentleman from Virginia if he had a request to make, and the Chair understood him to say that he had not.

Mr. JONES. I thought, Mr. Chairman, that the Chair meant if I had any additional request. I had already made a request.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend, on page 7, line 20, after the word "administered," by inserting the words "or disposed of," and on page 8, line 10, after the word "administer" insert the words "and dispose of."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 7, line 20, after the word "administered," insert the words "or disposed of."

On page 8, line 10, after the word "administer," insert the words "and disposed of."

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I want to say that while we do not think this language is necessary, the gentlemen on the other side do, and we are willing to accept it.

Mr. MILLER. I am not willing to accept as sufficient, Mr. Chairman, the language which the gentleman proposes. I think it would be sufficient if he would add after his language "under the provisions of sections 63 and 64 of the act approved July 1, 1902," and then there can be no question about it.

Mr. JONES. Oh, those sections apply to the friars' lands and not to the public lands.

Mr. MILLER. I may be mistaken in the sections.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I could not accept the suggestion of the gentleman from Minnesota. I do not think he would offer it if he stopped to think about it. All we need to do to strengthen this language is to make it clear, to add to the authority we have given to the Philippine Legislature. This is not a grant of land to the Philippine Legislature. It is a grant of authority to administer. We say we grant them authority to administer. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. JONES] says that a grant of authority to administer has been held to be a grant of authority to dispose of, and if that continues to be held to be the interpretation of that language, it would be all right, and there would be no necessity for this amendment; but I can readily understand how somewhere, some time, some one might say, and say with a good deal of force, that a grant of authority to administer is not a grant of authority to dispose of, and if what these people are to be given authority to do is to administer and dispose of, my two amendments make clear in simple words exactly what it is desired to give them authority to do. I agree with the gentleman from Virginia that the main part of the section and the proviso are entirely harmonious, and that if no amendment is needed to one, none is needed to the other; but while it is true, as the gentleman from Virginia says, that no one has questioned but that the right to administer is a right to dispose of, some one may question it, and it would be a very serious situation if it were questioned. What we mean is to grant authority to administer and dispose of, and it seems to me it is proper that we should say so clearly.

Mr. HELM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. HELM. A lease of 99 years is a disposal of the land for that length of time, is it not? The criticism that I have to make of the gentleman's amendment is this, that the words "and disposed of" are not words of conveyance. What this Government wants to do is to convey.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will permit, the gentleman is going into an entirely different question. The gentleman objects to the whole tenor and purpose of this section, and I do not.

Mr. HELM. Does not the gentleman want to pass title from the United States to the Philippine Government?

Mr. MONDELL. No; I am willing to leave it just as the committee left it, and it did not attempt to pass title. They have not passed title; they have granted authority. The title remains just where it was. The authority to administer these lands is granted here, and it is granted in proper language, providing you add the words "and dispose of" to the word "administer." I do not think there is any necessity for changing the language so as to make it a grant and cession. All that the Philippine Legislature needs now is authority to administer and dispose of this land under laws that they provide and which are approved. They can do that under the section as it stands, without any change, unless some one should raise the question—and it would be a serious one if raised—as to whether a grant of authority to administer is a grant of authority to sell.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I want to call the attention of the gentleman to section 15 of the organic act of 1902, which is continued in force:

SEC. 15. That the Government of the Philippine Islands is hereby authorized and empowered, on such terms as it may prescribe, by general legislation to provide for the granting or sale and conveyance to actual occupants and settlers and other citizens of said islands such parts and portions of the public domain other than timber and mineral lands of the United States in said islands as it may deem wise not exceeding 16 hectares to any one person and for the sale and conveyance of not more than 1,024 hectares to any corporation or association of persons.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wyoming has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to be permitted to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I would like to inquire whether the distinguished gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] has lost either his voice or his nerve? I want to suggest the absence of a quorum, but I shall withhold it until the gentleman from Wyoming has proceeded for five minutes.

Mr. CLINE. Oh, I think the gentleman from Texas has not lost either one, but he is simply down getting a little lunch.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wyoming?

There was no objection.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, in answer to the suggestion contained in the statement of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT], I would say that the section he read is clearly a grant of authority to dispose of, but here is a subsequent enactment which contains only a grant of authority to administer. It is a question what that means. That has been interpreted, the gentleman from Virginia assures us, and of course he knows as to the facts, as a grant of authority to dispose of; but that is a pretty broad interpretation and definition of the word "administer."

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will permit, I think if he had before him and would go over it carefully the organic act touching these matters, he would say at once that really these amendments are not necessary. Section 9 of the bill before us is substantially a repetition of section 12 of the organic act of 1902. It carries the language "to be administered for the benefit of the inhabitants thereof." This section 9 in the proposed bill repeats that language.

Mr. MONDELL. But it does not repeat the other language.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. It does not; but section 15 of the original act is continued, not in express words, but by express provisions of other sections of the bill we are considering. It was not deemed desirable to repeat that. The only reason that section 12 of the act was repeated at all was because the conditions rendered it desirable to provide for this retrocession. That is really the only necessity for repeating in this act section 12 of the act of 1902.

Mr. MONDELL. I think it is possible, by diving deeply enough into the various provisions of legislation, that the interpretation heretofore placed upon this language might be placed upon it in the future, but what the gentleman from Tennessee said throws a new light on the interpretation which the gentleman from Virginia has told us has heretofore been placed on this provision.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I ought not to have used the word "retrocession." That is not at all an accurate expression, because the land never technically belonged to the Philippine Government.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, the organic act not only contains the language I seek to add to, but also contains other language definitely granting the right to dispose of. We are now in this act, I assume, including all of the powers we grant to the Philippine Legislature and the Philippine Government. It may be said that where we fail to grant authority it can be found by reference to an old law, and while that might be true, yet so long as we are granting authority upon this subject, our grant of authority should be clear and specific and all inclusive. And it can not be unless in saying that we grant authority to administer, intending to grant authority to dispose of, we do grant that authority in clear terms.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I call for a vote on the amendment.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I move to pass the paragraph for the purpose of perfecting its text.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. With the amendment pending?

Mr. MILLER. With the amendment pending.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent to pass this paragraph. Is there objection?

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I object.

Mr. CLINE. Mr. Chairman, I object; there is no better time than now to dispose of the paragraph.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to the amendment.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Chairman, inasmuch as the gentleman from Texas is incapacitated from performing his patriotic duty, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Chairman, in view of the fact that the gentleman from Texas is now on the floor, I trust the gentleman from Washington will withdraw his point of order.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the point of order if the gentleman from Texas will permit, and he can make the point of order for himself. [Laughter.]

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend the amendment of the gentleman from Wyoming by striking out the words "dispose of" and inserting the word "convey."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend the amendment of the gentleman from Wyoming by striking out the words "dispose of" and inserting the word "convey."

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Chairman, I offer this amendment not because I think the committee will adopt it but in order to secure time to express in a plain way my views about this question. My notion is that if the Congress of the United States intended in its organic act or intends in this act to place the disposition of the public domain in the Philippine Islands in the Philippine Government, that we ought to say so directly, and not use language so involved and ambiguous that no two lawyers in this House can agree upon a correct and proper construction of it. There is no doubt that each of the distinguished gentlemen who have been discussing this question can frame language which every lawyer will understand is intended to pass title or would authorize the Philippine Government to pass title. Why should we sit here wasting time and quibbling about whether or not the power granted to the Philippine Government to "administer" the public domain for the benefit of the people of the Philippine Islands carries with it authority to pass title?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield for an inquiry?

Mr. RUCKER. Yes, sir.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Did the gentleman hear read a few moments ago section 15 of the organic act?

Mr. RUCKER. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. There is not any doubt of the clearness and explicity of that.

Mr. RUCKER. Then why not use that language in this bill?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Because it is unnecessary to repeat it.

Mr. RUCKER. If it is unnecessary to use clear, explicit, and definite language, then it is unnecessary to legislate at all, it seems to me.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. It is made a part of the bill by the section, and, if the gentleman will permit me——

Mr. RUCKER. I will.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The organic act of 1902 has page after page of detail about the measurement of mineral lands and timberlands, and the gentleman would not want to repeat in express terms all of this organic act when it is wholly unnecessary. All of those sections are continued by the general expression.

Mr. RUCKER. I would like to ask the gentleman, if he will permit me, why it is that the committee stands so firmly for the use of the word "administer"? Why not use some other word which would more clearly and aptly express the power to convey, if we intend to confer that power upon the Philippine Government?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. It is the ordinary word as applied to this act, and because it is the exact word in the organic act under which we have been operating for 12 years, and it is a good word.

Mr. RUCKER. I do not think there is a lawyer in the universe who will construe the word "administer" as meaning to confer power to convey. It might under some circumstances, under the doctrine of estoppel or some other theory, be held sufficient to pass title, but my judgment is that in writing a law we ought to use words which clearly express the intention of Congress and not leave the congressional purpose and intention so obscure as to subject it to construction by everybody who may be called upon to deal with it, realizing and knowing that lawyers are apt to differ in construing it.

Mr. JONES. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. RUCKER. Yes.

Mr. JONES. Does not it occur to the gentleman that if we were to change this language that there might be some question raised in the minds of thousands, and perhaps tens of thousands, of people who have acquired title to lands?

Mr. RUCKER. I think so. That reminds me of another suggestion——

Mr. JONES. We do not want to suggest to anybody who has ever acquired land in all these years that there is any possible question as to title. I do not think there is, but the idea would go out that Congress suggests that here.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Chairman, the thought did occur to me that there is grave question as to the title of these homesteaders, if men have acquired a homestead right, and therefore it seems to me wise that this committee should insert in this bill a provision confirming and ratifying all grants of the Philippine Government in reference to the disposition of lands heretofore, because I doubt exceedingly whether the power to "administer" was a power to convey title to the individual, and for that reason I wanted to say what I have. I favor a direct way rather than an indirect way of saying and doing things.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to oppose the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri. I think the language used by the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wyoming is better, and for that reason I oppose the amendment to the amendment.

But I entirely agree with the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER] in what he said about this matter. I have little doubt but that the chairman of the committee is correct in saying that this language is as efficacious in and of itself to convey title as the language that has been previously used. But the circumstances and conditions surrounding the two transactions are vastly different. Then conditions were very different from those that now exist, and there are many additional provisions of the law, such as were read by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT], which interpreted the acts that have been passed under which title has been conveyed, but could not be used now to interpret this act. This act must stand or fall on the provisions of it.

Now, when it says that it does not convey title—and every lawyer knows that that is not true—there will be no question that the title will not be conveyed, and if it is our intention to convey title, and we can do it by the simple addition of the words "and disposed of," why should we not do it? It occurs to me that is the simple, frank, and manly thing to do, and thereby confer what is of the greatest benefit to the Philippine Islands.

Mr. JONES. If the gentleman will permit me, I will say that whilst I do not believe the gentleman's amendment is at all necessary, I realize that it can do no harm, and therefore I shall not oppose it.

Mr. TOWNER. I think the gentleman is acting wisely.

Mr. JONES. I shall, however, oppose the amendment to this amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER].

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Chairman, in view of the hostile attitude of the chairman toward the amendment I offered, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw it.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is now on the second amendment offered by the gentleman from Wyoming.

Mr. JONES. There was only one amendment.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The gentleman from Wyoming offered the same amendment in two places.

Mr. JONES. The one amendment applies to two places.

The CHAIRMAN. That is right. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 10. That while the Philippine Government shall have the authority to enact a tariff law, the trade relations between the islands and the United States shall continue to be governed exclusively by laws of the Congress of the United States: Provided, That tariff acts or acts amendatory to the tariff of the Philippine Islands shall not become law until they shall receive the approval of the President of the United States, nor shall any act of the Philippine Legislature affecting the currency or coinage laws of the Philippines become a law until it has been approved by the President of the United States.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I do this for the purpose of asking the chairman of the committee a question, if he will permit it. A moment ago in the discussion I heard some gentleman say that some corporation had recently acquired title to a tract of some 56,000 acres of land in the Philippines. I want to ask if that was an American corporation?

Mr. JONES. I did not mean to convey the idea that it was recently done, but a corporation——

Mr. RUCKER. It was done since the organic act was passed?

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. RUCKER. I understood the organic act limited the area of land that any citizen or corporation could acquire.

Mr. JONES. It would take some little time for me to explain that transaction. I have always questioned its legality—always.

Mr. RUCKER. You do not question the title they got, of course?

Mr. JONES. I have always questioned the legality of it. I may say that those lands were a part of some 420,000 acres of friar lands purchased by the Philippine Government for the sum of $7,000,000. The Philippine Government held that this limitation of 1,024 hectares, about 2,500 acres, did not apply to the friar lands but did apply to the public lands. My contention was that it applied to all the lands—the friar lands as well as the public lands. What I wish to say is that the attorneys of this corporation never doubted that the title of the Philippine Government to these lands was good No one has contended that the Government of the Philippines could not give a good title to all the public lands, no matter how acquired, subject, of course, to the limitations imposed by Congress upon their disposition.

Mr. RUCKER. I understood the gentleman's contention about that, and I simply wanted to know if it was the practice over there to allow corporations to acquire large areas of land.

Mr. JONES. I will say to the gentleman that there has been no transaction of this kind since that time.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, on page 8, by inserting, after the word "while," in line 12, the following: "This act provides that."

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I will say to the gentleman that that is merely an amendment to perfect the language of the text. I do not care to say anything about it. It seems to me it is necessary.

Mr. JONES. I have no objection to the insertion of the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to amend the section by striking out the proviso.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, section 10, by striking out the proviso beginning after the word "States," in line 16, and ending with the word "States," in line 22.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I desire unanimous consent to continue my remarks for 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent to be permitted to continue for 10 minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to present this matter to the committee, and I would like to have the attention of the committee, because I believe it is a very serious question which I raise in this amendment and which ought to be considered in an entirely nonpartisan way and for the ultimate benefit, as I believe, both of the people of the Philippine Islands and the people of the United States. It will be observed that the language of this section as it now reads is that "while this act provides that the Philippine Government shall have the authority to enact a tariff law, the trade relations between the islands and the United States shall continue to be governed exclusively by laws of the Congress of the United States." I have no fault to find with such provision. It is proper that the trade relations existing between the islands and the United States should remain subject to the control of the United States, at least for the present.

Then follows the provision, the first part of which is as follows:

Provided, That tariff acts or acts amendatory to the tariff of the Philippine Islands shall not become law until they receive the approval of the President of the United States.

If we strike out this proviso it will allow the Philippine Government to make its own tariff laws, subject, of course, to the fact that the United States Congress can pass a law at any time annulling or repealing any law that the Philippine Legislature may pass.

Let it be remembered that we have retained, by the provision which I first read, the control as between ourselves and the islands. My amendment presents the question. Will it be better for their interests and our own if we shall make the passage of a tariff law by the Philippine Legislature subject to the approval of the President of the United States rather than of the governor of the Philippine Islands? I argue that it will be better for us and for them if we allow them to make their own tariff laws, subject to our ultimate right of appeal, and I do that for these reasons: In the first place, the people of the United States can hardly understand the conditions in the Philippine Islands. They are located in the Tropics. The circumstances of their people and the conditions which surround them are so different from our own, their productions are so different from our own, the character of their citizenship is so different from our own—all these things make it almost impossible for our people to thoroughly understand the conditions that now exist in the Philippine Islands. To such an extent is this true that many argue from that fact that we ought not to attempt to govern them at all.

More than that, there is no one other question about which there is so much partisanship as about the tariff question. It is almost impossible for the people of the United States to consider the question of tariff aside from its influence on party, and the President of the United States is the leader of his party. The President represents his party. The President, in passing upon every tariff law passed by the Philippine Legislature, will not only think how it will affect the Philippine people, but what will be the effect upon his party in the United States. If it shall be a Democratic President, and there is a provision for a high tariff, the President will be loth to approve of such a bill, because it will be in contradiction to his party platform. If, on the other hand, there shall be a Republican President, and a provision shall be passed by the Philippine Legislature making a low tariff, he might be influenced to take an unfavorable view. In short, no President can view any tariff law passed by the Philippine Legislature uninfluenced by his party's views and existing political conditions. For that reason it will be exceedingly unwise for us to inject into the government of the Philippines questions of United States politics. Let us keep them out of there, because they do not belong there.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Chairman, may I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. TOWNER. Certainly.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Would or would it not be essential to the foreign relations of our Government that we should in a measure determine or supervise the tariff policy of the Philippine Islands until we finally relinquish them? In other words, is it not necessary for us to hold a string, so to speak, on a tariff policy of the Philippines, in order to preserve the integrity of our own foreign relations?

Mr. TOWNER. I was just going to come to the proposition suggested by the gentleman from Virginia. Let it be observed that we still have the power—the United States still have the power—by act of Congress to repeal any law which the Philippine Legislature may enact. We have that power whether we strike out this provision or not. We still have an absolute control of the situation, and if any law is passed by the Philippine Legislature which is not approved by us we can repeal it.

Now, I want to make this further observation: There has been very little difficulty of that kind with regard to the self-governing colonies of Great Britain. Canada makes its own tariff. Australia makes it own tariff. Other Commonwealths which are part of the British Empire make their own tariffs. It is true that there was a protest made when Canada made a preferential tariff in favor of Great Britain. Germany protested very vigorously, and imposed upon Canadian products their maximum rates under their maximum and minimum system of rates of duty. Canada, to meet that, put up her maximum rate on German products, and after negotiations between Canada and Germany it was finally adjusted by each one of them granting the other its minimum rates. But it never was suggested that Canada did not have the power to make its own rates. England made no effort to interfere, and the matter was fought out between Canada and Germany.

I want to make the Philippines a great self-governing Commonwealth, such as Canada is, such as Australia is. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I ask that I be permitted to have the same amount of time that was given to the gentleman from Iowa—10 minutes—in which to reply to him.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. FLOOD of Virginia). The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I very heartily indorse a great deal that has been said by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER]. He has spoken very truly as to the difficulty of governing a colony 10,000 miles away from the seat of the Government. Does not the gentleman think, however, that every word he has said as to the difficulty of our making laws for the government of the Philippine Islands tends to show that the sooner we grant them their complete independence and allow them to legislate for themselves the better it will be for them and for us? It seems to me that this is the logical conclusion to be drawn from his remarks—a conclusion from which the gentleman can not easily escape.

The gentleman moves to strike out of this section that part of it which requires the approval of the President to all legislation affecting the tariff, the coinage, and the currency. The same requirement as to the disposition of lands, timber, and mining rights is contained in a section of the bill which has been passed. When that section was reached the gentleman moved to strike it out, but the committee refused to do so. I opposed striking out the requirement as to lands and timber, and I am opposed to striking out that which relates to tariff legislation. There is much more reason for requiring the approval of the President to legislation relating to the tariff than there is for requiring it as to sales of the public lands. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] has gone so far as to say, in respect to sales of land, that the prior consent of the Congress ought to be obtained. This shows how widely gentlemen differ upon this subject.

A strong reason for requiring in advance the approval of the President as to tariff legislation is that such legislation might involve the United States in complications with foreign countries. So, Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that this is a wise provision. I think the same is true as to legislation affecting the coinage and currency laws. The Congress of the United States has provided a currency system for the Philippine Islands. I believe it to be a most satisfactory one, and so long as we retain sovereignty over the islands I do not think the Philippine Legislature should be permitted to change that law without first having secured the approval of the President of the United States. I know this bill provides that all laws passed by the Philippine Islands may be annulled by Congress, but I can imagine circumstances under which it might be most desirable to have the President approve a tariff bill in advance of its passage by the Philippine Legislature. Surely, as I have said, if it be wise to require in advance the approval of the President to acts relating to the sales of land and timber, it would be the part of wisdom to require his prior approval of a tariff act which may affect all the commercial nations of the world.

Mr. MOORE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MOORE. If this proviso remains, the Congress of the United States will still exercise some supervision over any tariff act passed by the Philippine Legislature?

Mr. JONES. The Congress of the United States will have the absolute right to revoke it. In the first place, the Governor General has the right to veto it, and if the legislature should pass it over his veto by a two-thirds vote, then the President of the United States is given an absolute veto. But even if the President of the United States did not veto it, the Congress of the United States would have the power to annul it.

Mr. MOORE. Would that hold with respect to tariffs by the Philippine Legislature made with other countries than the United States?

Mr. JONES. It applies only to tariffs made with respect to other countries than the United States. In this bill we reserve the absolute right of the United States to regulate our trade relations with the Philippines. They have no authority to pass any law affecting their trade relations with the United States.

Mr. MOORE. That is to say, if the Philippine Legislature wanted to come to a tariff agreement with Germany, or with France, or with any other nation, it would still have to submit that act to the Congress of the United States?

Mr. JONES. No; it would submit it to the President for his approval; and if he gave his approval and the legislature enacted the law, the Congress of the United States could then annul it if it desired to do so; so that it is absolutely safeguarded. The gentleman from Iowa thinks there is too much safeguarding.

Mr. MOORE. There have been instances in recent administrations when agreements have been made with foreign nations to which Congress has not been a party. I think during the Roosevelt administration there were a number of agreements made, especially with Germany, about which there was a great deal of complaint. In my judgment, all matters of that kind should have come to the Congress of the United States. If we are still to exercise authority over the Philippines, I would not like to see the Philippine Legislature have the power to make a tariff agreement with any foreign country unless we had some knowledge of it in the Congress of the United States.

Mr. JONES. It seems to me that the tariff arrangements which the gentleman says were entered into by the Roosevelt administration might have been revoked by the Congress if it had had the mind or the nerve to do so.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend by striking out, after the word "States," in line 19, page 8, the remainder of the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 8, by striking out, after the word "States" in line 19, the remainder of the paragraph.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that we have really gone a very long distance in handicapping the Philippine Legislature in demonstrating its capacity to act as a legislative body. I am frank to say that there are some things in this bill that I think go too far. There are some things that I think are premature; but I do think if we are going to create a legislative body in the Philippine Islands we ought to give that body an opportunity to legislate on some of the important as well as unimportant things that must very nearly concern their welfare,

We have restricted their capacity to legislate, in the first instance, respecting public lands, timber, mines, tariffs, and trade relations. That pretty nearly covers the whole field of national legislation of prime importance. It is proposed by this third paragraph further to restrict their capacity to legislate, by removing from them authority to legislate respecting their currency and coinage systems. Now it is pretty nearly tweedledee and tweedledum in one sense to say that there is any additional safeguard in requiring their laws to be signed by the President of the United States before they shall become operative over giving him the right of veto subsequent to enactment. At best it seems to me that we have become hypercritical. We have become suspicious. We are lacking in good faith and generous treatment of the Filipinos by hedging them in and surrounding them by such a complete network as will restrict them very measurably in their activities. It seems to me it is going too far to say that the Philippine Legislature has not sense enough, has not the judgment, has not the patriotism, has not the experience to legislate respecting its currency and coinage. If it has not capacity to do that, Mr. Chairman, if it has not capacity to legislate concerning those subjects, what subjects has it the capacity to legislate about anyhow?

But the gentleman says that the Congress has enacted a law giving currency legislation to the islands. That is true. That law is continued in effect by this bill. In order for that law to be changed it will be necessary for the bill passing the Philippine Legislature to receive the sanction of the Governor General, and if his veto be overridden, then to receive the sanction of the President of the United States.

Would not it be more consonant with the desire to let the Filipino people demonstrate their capacity to legislate and govern themselves, to give them full, free, and unrestricted opportunity to legislate at least respecting some of the things of national primal importance? Therefore I think we ought to remove the restrictions from this kind of legislation. I can see a decent reason why we should require the sanction of the President before a tariff law should become operative, because a tariff law has to do with international relations.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I have another amendment which I wish to offer, similar to the one I offered at the top of page 8, in the preceding paragraph. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] suggested that instead of having the amendments which require the President to exercise the veto within a certain length of time inserted in each paragraph, that we put it in one paragraph and make it operative over all. I think that is much the better way. If it is understood that we shall have an opportunity to make that amendment later, I will not offer this.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, the suggestion I made was merely my own individual suggestion. It did not come from the committee or from the chairman. I do not know whether the chairman would feel that the amendment proposed ought to prevail at this point or not. Personally I see no objection to it.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman is speaking of an amendment fixing a time within which the President must approve or disapprove acts relating to the tariff, currency, and coinage acts.

Mr. MILLER. Yes.

Mr. JONES. I assented to the amendment which was adopted fixing such a time as to lands, and I gave my reasons for so doing; but I do not believe that the time in which the President is required to approve or disapprove a tariff, a currency, or a coinage act ought to be limited to so short a time as 90 days, and therefore I am not willing to accept this amendment.

Mr. MILLER. Then, Mr. Chairman, I will offer the amendment at this place.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "States," in line 22, page 8, strike out the period and insert a colon, together with the following: "Provided further, That the President shall approve or disapprove any act mentioned in the foregoing proviso within 90 days from and after its enactment and submission for his approval, and if not approved within such time it shall become a law, the same as if it had been specifically approved."

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I really can not see how the gentleman from Virginia can possibly have objection to that amendment as applied to this paragraph if he accepted the amendment to the preceding paragraph, and he did. It seems to me that every argument in favor of the amendment to the preceding paragraph is just as applicable to this. It seems to me that we are going to get the legislation in the islands into a great degree of chaos unless such an amendment be adopted. I am very much in earnest about this. I have only one desire, and that is to perfect the bill so that it will result in the least possible confusion and for the greatest benefit to the people of those islands.

Now, let us see the proviso to which it applies. It says that unless the President shall express his veto within three months after the time the bill is submitted to him the act shall become a law nevertheless. Now, that must have been all passed upon by the Governor General of the islands. This is but an additional safeguard.

Mr. BOOHER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER. Yes.

Mr. BOOHER. Does the gentleman's amendment provide that it shall be approved within 90 days after it is submitted to the President?

Mr. MILLER. It does.

Mr. BOOHER. Ought not that provision to apply to all of the provisions in the bill?

Mr. MILLER. I hope so, because I am going to offer it at every place where the President has the right of veto.

Mr. BOOHER. I think it ought to be offered as an amendment to apply to the whole bill.

Mr. MILLER. I intended that it should; but the gentleman from Virginia did not want it to apply to all the provisions of the bill.

Mr. BOOHER. If the time were made a little longer, perhaps there would be an agreement to let it apply to the whole bill.

Mr. MILLER. I think the gentleman from Missouri will appreciate the fact that from the time the bill is passed by the Philippine Legislature it will take 30 days for it to reach the President of the United States, and he thereafter has 90 days. If the President within that period of time is not able to make up his mind whether he will approve or disapprove it, he never will make it up. It would not be safe to have such a law on the statute books operating with the President's veto likely to come, and I do not think it would be consistent with good government to require that the President should exercise his approval of a tariff act before it shall become a law, for he might perhaps hold it for four years.

Mr. BOOHER. That is where the trouble lies, if you do not limit the time. He might hold the bill up during his entire term of office.

Mr. MILLER. Yes; he might hold it up for four years, or even eight years.

Mr. BOOHER. Under the gentleman's amendment he would have four months.

Mr. MILLER. Yes; but, carrying out the suggestion of the gentleman from Missouri, suppose that the bill is submitted in a Republican administration and the Republican President is opposed to it, but does not make up his mind to veto it; he lets it stay there. Then the Democratic administration comes in.

A Democratic President makes up his mind that he would like it, and he could approve it. Possibly it was a good bill at the time it was passed, but perhaps eight years have intervened, during which conditions have all changed, and the tariff laws ought to be entirely rewritten. In that instance can anybody say that that is a proper condition in which to place the Philippine Islands? Certainly it is only in consonance with sound sense to say that the President should have a time restriction within which he must express his approval or disapproval.

Mr. CLINE. Does not this bill provide that Congress shall have the right to modify or repeal that regardless of what the President does?

Mr. MILLER. That is true; but suppose the President would wait six or eight years; it would never come before Congress.

Mr. CLINE. Congress does not have to wait on the President.

Mr. MILLER. It would not be a law and submitted to Congress until after the President has approved it in this case. What the gentleman says would apply to the situation in the previous paragraph, but not in this. The suggested legislation is absolutely suspended in the air, somewhere above the earth.

Mr. RUCKER. There is a limitation upon the President with reference to acts of Congress.

Mr. MILLER. Certainly; but we restrict him to 10 days, and I propose to give him three months in a Philippine case.

Mr. RUCKER. That is long enough for a Democratic President; and as that is the only kind we are ever going to have hereafter, I am with the gentleman.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to take up the time of the committee in discussing this proposition. It has been discussed over and over again. I simply wish to say that I think this case is not exactly parallel to that before the House a day or two ago. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER] then proposed that the President be given six months within which to approve or disapprove. I myself suggested to the gentleman that I thought the time should be reduced to three months. I said then that there were other sections of this bill to be reached later in which there was the same requirement as to presidential approval before the legislation which was the subject of those sections could be enacted. I intimated that whilst I was willing to put a time limit upon the action of the President in regard to lands, timber, and mining rights, I might not be willing to do so as to some other legislation. Tariff measures require much time for their preparation. There is no more intricate and difficult legislation than that which relates to the tariff. If the President, therefore, is to be required to approve or disapprove a tariff measure, he should be given ample time in which to examine its many features and almost numberless items. If this is not done and the President should find that he could not master the many provisions of the measure in the time permitted him, there would be nothing left to him but to disapprove it. I therefore doubt the wisdom of putting a short time limit upon his action.

Mr. Chairman, I congratulate my friend from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER] upon having become so progressive and liberal in his views as to Philippine legislation. I may say to him, however, that the provisions of this bill are far more liberal than those they are intended to supersede and which represent the ideas of his party. The gentleman thinks that we are placing too many handicaps on the Filipinos. I wish to remind the gentleman that the Philippine Legislature to-day can not enact any law upon the subject of the tariff, can not enact any law upon the subject of the currency, and can not enact any law relating to coinage. This bill permits the legislature to do all of these things, but requires that the affirmative approval of the President of the United States shall first be had. It is a great advance over the present organic law, and yet the gentleman from Minnesota would have us believe that he thinks it does not go far enough in the direction of conferring self-government upon the Filipinos. I congratulate him upon this progress.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, under Republican law they have progressed until now they are capable of doing things that they could not possibly have done 10 years ago.

Mr. JONES. I regret that during all of the time the gentleman has been here, during all the time that has elapsed since he returned from his visit to the Philippine Islands, he has not introduced a bill of his own carrying into effect the liberal and progressive views to which he is now giving utterance.

Mr. MILLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES. A bill that would give the Filipinos a more liberal form of government than is provided for in this measure.

Mr. MILLER. I had one outlined, but I was informed that the gentleman from Virginia was preparing one that provided for immediate independence, so what was the use of mine? After he had submitted his to some of the other members of his party, however, immediate independence died. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say to the gentleman that the remark which he has just injected into my speech is about as far from the truth as a good many of his other statements.

Mr. MILLER. Will the gentleman deny that the draft of the bill he prepared last winter did not contain a proviso for independence?

Mr. JONES. I have prepared no bill during this session of Congress which either provided for immediate independence for the Filipinos or that fixed a definite time at which they should have independence.

Y.

THE PHILIPPINE ISLANDS.

The committee resumed its session.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I understand the Commissioner from the Philippine Islands desires to be heard.

The CHAIRMAN. The time for debate is exhausted.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the Commissioner from the Philippine Islands be permitted to address the House for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. QUEZON. Mr. Chairman, it is with a great deal of diffidence that I decide to place myself in opposition to the chairman of the Insular Committee, for whom I have not only respect but love. Whether it is necessary or not to put a time limit to the President's approval on legislation affecting our currency or coinage laws, there is a very good reason why this limit should be required in the case of our tariff acts. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] well said, when he discussed his amendment to this section, that tariff bills are essentially partisan issues in the United States. While the arguments of the gentleman from Iowa appealed to me strongly as justifying the elimination of the whole proviso, I did not feel at liberty to support his contention, because I see the force of the proposition that tariff acts affect necessarily foreign relations, and as long as the Philippines are under the sovereignty of the United States we can not quite expect from you the granting of such powers as may, even with the remotest possibility, cause you annoyance in your international relations. But surely the amendment of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER] does not involve this danger. Our tariff laws can not become a law, under the terms of the amendment, unless approved by the President of the United States, except that he must act within three months or else the act shall become law. There is no one, I am sure, who would care to contend that if our tariff law had any item that may jeopardize the interests of the American people or provoke any conflict with a foreign power that the President would not at once disapprove it; so that on this score the adoption of the amendment will do no harm. On the other hand, when the act is not particularly objectionable, but it is not the pleasure or the convenience of the President to approve it, he may let the bill become a law without signing it, if this amendment is adopted.

Mr. HELM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. QUEZON. Yes.

Mr. HELM. Is there anything in this provision that would prevent the President of the United States upon receiving information that a tariff bill had been passed, either by cable or otherwise, from cabling back his approval?

Mr. QUEZON. Oh, no.

Mr. HELM. Could not that be done?

Mr. QUEZON. It can, but the point I want to make is this: I can conceive a case when a President of the United States may prefer not to approve a tariff bill of ours and yet let it become a law. A Republican President, for instance, in all likelihood would not want to approve a free-trade tariff bill in the Philippine Islands and a Democratic President would prefer not to approve a protective tariff bill.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman is aware of the fact that if there were a Republican President who did not desire to approve a measure passed by a Democratic Congress he would have the right to veto it, anyway.

Mr. QUEZON. Yes, sir; undoubtedly; but I am referring to the case when the President does not want to veto the bill, and yet because it is not in accord with his tariff ideas he would not wish to give it his approval. Let me explain to the committee what I mean. I take it that the President of the United States wishes to allow the Philippine Legislature to enact the best tariff law for the Philippines. Suppose that conditions in the islands demanded a protective tariff and the legislature enacted such kind of a tariff; let us suppose also that there is in the White House a Democratic President. He does not believe in protection, his party does not believe in it, and if he is consistent and he must approve affirmatively the bill, the reasonable assumption is that he never will approve it. If, on the other hand, he could allow the bill to become law without his approval and he was satisfied that there is no harm that may come to the United States from the operations of the bill, he might decide to leave the responsibility of adopting a protective policy to the legislature, without by his signature approving of that policy. The same thing may be said if the islands needed low tariff or free trade and the President were a Republican. Mr. Chairman, I deem it very important that this law should give the President of the United States an opportunity to let Filipinos enact such laws as they consider best, but which the President, because of his political principles, may not approve of. I hope therefore that the committee will adopt the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 11. That no export duties shall be levied or collected on exports from the Philippine Islands, but taxes and assessments on property and license fees for franchises and privileges, and internal taxes, direct or indirect, may be imposed for the purposes of the Philippine Government and the provincial and municipal governments thereof, respectively, as may be provided and defined by acts of the Philippine Legislature, and, where necessary to anticipate taxes and revenues, bonds and other obligations may be issued by the Philippine Government or any provincial or municipal government therein, as may be provided by law and to protect the public credit: Provided, however, That the entire indebtedness of the Philippine Government created by the authority conferred herein shall not exceed at any one time the sum of $10,000,000, exclusive of those obligations known as friar-land bonds, nor that of any Province or municipality a sum in excess of 7 per cent of the aggregate tax valuation of its property at any one time.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend by inserting in line 5, following the word "legislature," the words "hereinafter enacted."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 9, by inserting after the word "legislature," in line 5, the words "hereinafter enacted."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment. On page 9, line 14, strike out the word "seven" and insert the word "five."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 9, line 14, by striking out the word "seven" and inserting the word "five."

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of introducing this amendment is to prevent the excessive indebtedness of municipalities in the Philippine Islands. In the State of Illinois, one of the wealthiest States in the Union, none of the municipalities are permitted to have a bonded indebtedness in excess of 5 per cent of their assessed valuation of property, and I think that if in such a community as the State of Illinois it is thought wise to limit the bonded debt to 5 per cent of the taxable valuation of the property, such a provision in this bill would also be wise. Seven per cent is a great deal more bonded debt than any community should be allowed to incur. It is more than they can maintain, and ought not to be permitted in this bill.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I hope the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois will not be adopted. The municipalities in the Philippine Islands are very much in need of money, and the amount which they will be able to borrow under this provision is small when compared to their needs. I think the gentleman probably may not be aware of the fact that personal property is not taxed at all in the Philippine Islands. Real estate, too, can not bear a high rate of taxation, and is not assessed very high.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. JONES. I will.

Mr. MADDEN. Does not the gentleman believe that the poorer the community is the more conservative they ought to be in the creation of indebtedness?

Mr. JONES. That may be true, Mr. Chairman, but I am trying to point out to the gentleman that the Philippine municipalities will not be able to incur any very large indebtedness under the provision of this bill which he would amend.

Mr. MADDEN. I understand that.

Mr. JONES. If it were true that the value of personal property in the Philippines is more than equal to that of the real estate, the 7 per cent limit fixed in this bill would be equal to 14 per cent in this country; but, of course, that can not be.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. JONES. I will.

Mr. MADDEN. There is nothing in this bill to prevent the Philippine Legislature from taxing personal property, is there?

Mr. JONES. No.

Mr. MADDEN. Is there any assurance on the part of the gentleman that they will not tax personal property?

Mr. JONES. No; I can only say to the gentleman——

Mr. MADDEN. But if they do tax personal property is there anybody on earth who can say that the personal property will be equal in value with real estate? Where personal property is taxed it only amounts to about 10 per cent of the real estate, because the personal property is taxed so high that the people who have it do not report it.

Mr. JONES. Well, while that is true, Mr. Chairman, the fact remains that in contracting this indebtedness it can not be based upon the value of personal property, and real estate is assessed so low that 7 per cent would enable the Philippine municipalities, outside of a few cities, to contract a very large indebtedness. I think the limitation fixed in the bill is low enough.

Mr. MADDEN. I just want to say, if the gentleman will permit me, that the smaller amount you permit to be raised by bonded indebtedness the better it will be for the communities. The way for every community to do, if they want to prosper, is to pay as they go, to levy their tax levy within their means. The tendency in every community is——

Mr. JONES. The gentleman is making a speech in my time, but I shall not object.

Mr. MADDEN (continuing). The tendency in every community is to issue bonds wherever they can do it and squander the money, and we ought not to give these people that opportunity.

Mr. JONES. But, Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I ask for two minutes more, since the gentleman has taken up most of my time.

Mr. MADDEN. I am perfectly willing the gentleman should have 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I subscribe very fully to the general remarks made by the gentleman from Illinois. I know what he says to be the tendency of many communities.

It is true, nevertheless, that the indebtedness which the municipalities could incur under this provision is very small, and that they absolutely need the money in order to build schoolhouses and to erect public buildings, and to make other necessary improvements.

Mr. PLATT. Will the gentleman yield to me just one moment?

Mr. JONES. I just wish to say to the gentleman that one of the things for which the party to which he belongs has always taken credit to itself is that it has spent a great deal of money in the Philippine Islands in building and improving roads and erecting schoolhouses. And I wish to say to him further that such improvements can not be carried on if it is to be done out of the current revenues raised by taxation alone.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman let me ask him one more question right there?

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. This item in the bill does not refer to the National Government at all?

Mr. JONES. Not at all.

Mr. MADDEN. This refers to municipalities?

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. And I apprehend that no money raised by taxation in any municipality will be used for building roads or making any other improvement outside the municipality?

Mr. JONES. That is true.

Mr. PLATT. I simply wanted to place over against the law of Illinois that of the State of New York, which allows 10 per cent of excess valuation and excludes from that bonds issued for water supply.

Mr. MADDEN. And they have more debts than the National Government.

Mr. PLATT. I live in a municipality that has more than 10 per cent most of the time, and it is growing like a weed.

Mr. MADDEN. I think 7 per cent is the amount that they have in the Territories.

Mr. TALCOTT of New York. I do not think the statement of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] is correct.

Mr. MADDEN. The city of New York has as much debt as the National Government.

Mr. TALCOTT of New York. But you said the State of New York.

Mr. MADDEN. I am talking about the city of New York.

Mr. TALCOTT of New York. You did not say so.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of making an inquiry of the chairman of the committee. Can he give us the total assessed valuation of the Philippine Islands?

Mr. JONES. I regret to say, Mr. Chairman, that I have not that information in my possession.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield so that I may ask a question of the gentleman from Virginia? Can the gentleman inform the committee whether there is any municipality that has bonded itself under the existing régime?

Mr. JONES. I am not certain as to this.

Mr. QUEZON. What is that question?

Mr. JONES. Whether any municipality has, under the present law, bonded itself?

Mr. QUEZON. No; with the exception of the city of Manila.

Mr. STAFFORD. To what extent has it done so?

Mr. QUEZON. To the extent of $4,000,000.

Mr. STAFFORD. What percentage is that of the total assessed value of the property?

Mr. QUEZON. I could not answer that question positively, because there are several millions worth of property belonging to the insular government, the churches of all denominations, hospitals, colleges, and so forth, which is not taxed; but the taxable property is about ₱19,500,000.

Mr. STAFFORD. Under existing practice, as I understand it, no municipality or Province has the authority to bond itself for public improvements.

Mr. QUEZON. No, sir. And the city of Manila has bonded herself through a special act of Congress.

Mr. STAFFORD. Then all the improvements that have taken place outside of Manila have been the result of appropriations by the National Legislature?

Mr. QUEZON. These improvements have been paid out of the municipal funds raised from local taxation. There are, however, improvements defrayed from the insular appropriations.

Mr. STAFFORD. Can the gentleman inform the committee also—which would be very interesting—as to the rate of taxation where these improvements have been made? I assume they have been made for the benefit of sewers and roads and schoolhouses.

Mr. QUEZON. I did not quite understand the gentleman's question.

Mr. STAFFORD. What improvements have been made in these localities to which the gentleman refers?

Mr. QUEZON. Municipal roads, streets, schoolhouses, markets, municipal buildings, and so forth.

Mr. STAFFORD. Where those improvements have been made, what has been the rate of taxation? How much on the dollar of valuation is the rate of taxation?

Mr. QUEZON. Outside of Manila it has been not over one half of 1 per cent, and in the city of Manila 1½ per cent.

Mr. MOORE. I would like to ask the chairman of the committee, the gentleman from Virginia, if he can tell us something about the issue of railroad bonds by the Philippine Government. What is the amount of that issue?

Mr. JONES. I have the exact figures somewhere here. I can not carry them in my mind. I will give the gentleman the exact amount.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. YOUNG] has expired.

Mr. TALCOTT of New York. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. TALCOTT] is recognized.

Mr. TALCOTT of New York. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE].

Mr. JONES. I have not been able to put my hand on the paper for which I have been looking, but I think the amount of railroad bonds outstanding for which the Philippine Government guarantees 4 per cent interest is a little over $16,000,000. The interest guaranteed amounts to about $625,000 annually.

Mr. MOORE. Is that contingent responsibility the responsibility of the United States?

Mr. JONES. No; the Philippine Islands. The United States has no responsibility whatever.

Mr. MOORE. Are we responsible for the payment of interest?

Mr. JONES. No. It is the Philippine Government that is responsible for 4 per cent interest for a period not to exceed 30 years. The United States Government is in no way responsible for this interest.

Mr. MOORE. In the event of the failure of the Philippine Government to pay the interest, does the gentleman declare that the United States Government is not responsible?

Mr. JONES. I do declare that the United States Government has no legal responsibility, although some gentleman may think that there is some moral obligation resting upon the United States, since they authorized the guaranty by the Philippine Government. There is certainly no legal obligation.

Mr. MOORE. I am very much pleased to have the gentleman make that statement, for I fear some of the investors in those bonds have a different opinion.

Mr. JONES. I think not.

Mr. MOORE. May I ask the gentleman what relation that $16,000,000 bond issue has to the $10,000,000 that it is proposed to permit the Philippine Government to issue under this bill?

Mr. JONES. None whatever. This is to enable the Government to obtain money to be expended for Government purposes—for the construction of public works.

Mr. MOORE. It would not be for such enterprises as the construction of railroads?

Mr. JONES. The railroads have been built by private interests; some of them without any Government guaranty of interest.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York [Mr. TALCOTT] has expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have five minutes.

Mr. TALCOTT of New York. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. TALCOTT] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. TALCOTT of New York. I wanted to ask the chairman of the committee whether, in addition to the indebtedness of the Philippine Government and the indebtedness of the municipality of Manila, any separate Provinces were owing any indebtedness at the present time?

Mr. QUEZON. No.

Mr. JONES. I think the gentleman from the Philippines answered that question a while ago. He said that none of them do.

If I may be permitted, Mr. Chairman, I have found the paper I was looking for, and I find that the total amount of railroad bonds upon which the Philippine Government is responsible for interest was, on the 31st day of December last, $15,628,000, and that the interest obligation, the contingent obligation, was $625,120.

Mr. MOORE. That is entirely independent of the $10,000,000?

Mr. JONES. Entirely.

Mr. CLINE. Mr. Chairman, I would like to be recognized in opposition to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. TALCOTT] for the purpose of asking a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Did the gentleman from New York offer an amendment?

Mr. CLINE. Yes; he moved to strike out the last word. I move to strike out the last two words.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana is recognized.

Mr. CLINE. I see in the last report, 1913, of the Commissioner of Education, Mr. Wright, that he stated that there had been 1,000 schools opened in the islands, and it was estimated that 100,000 additional pupils would be admitted to the schools last fall by virtue of the assignment of a large fund by the Governor General of the Philippines for educational purposes. What I wanted to inquire either of the Commissioner from the Philippine Islands or the chairman of the committee is whether the funds used to open up those schools were derived from the taxation of municipalities or whether those funds came from the general collection of taxes apportioned to the municipalities? I would like to ask the chairman of the committee.

Mr. JONES. I am not absolutely certain, Mr. Chairman, but I think the funds are derived from both sources, but mainly from the insular treasury. I think the insular funds are frequently supplemented by municipal funds where the schools are located in municipalities.

Mr. CLINE. Does the commissioner of internal revenue or the treasurer, or whoever operates in the Philippine Islands corresponding to our Federal Treasurer, have any authority over taxes raised by municipalities, to distribute them?

Mr. JONES. I should say that he did not have.

Mr. CLINE. The reason I asked the question was that I understood the gentleman from the Philippines to say that the municipalities themselves were taxed for additional schoolhouses.

Mr. JONES. Yes; additional schoolhouses, and probably better schoolhouses than the insular government was able to provide throughout the archipelago. Some of the municipalities are larger and richer than others, and they desire better schoolhouses.

Mr. CLINE. I desired to inquire about the general plan of collecting taxes and erecting schoolhouses.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLINE. Yes.

Mr. MILLER. If the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. JONES] will permit me, I can perhaps make a statement in addition to his. The gentleman's statement is practically correct. The funds expended by the municipalities are from two sources—from local contributions in one form and another, and also from the insular treasury. The executive secretary is the intermediary between the local municipality or the school district and the insular treasurer, and if it is desired by a local community, for instance, to build a schoolhouse, as that is the first essential in the procedure for establishing the school——

Mr. CLINE. Has the local authority the power to levy assessments in the municipalities?

Mr. MILLER. Yes. That is, a small amount. The greater amount is made up from the insular treasury, but the cooperation of the two is required. Exactly the same principle prevails in the erection of municipal markets. Schools and markets are being established as rapidly as they can get the funds.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend, in line 12, by striking out the figures "$10,000,000" and inserting "$15,000,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER].

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 9, line 12, by striking out "$10,000,000" and inserting "$15,000,000."

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, this provision has relation to the limitation upon the Philippine Government for creating indebtedness. The present limitation is $5,000,000. This bill increases the amount to $10,000,000. In my judgment, it is not yet as large as it should be. Such a limitation on a people of 8,000,000 or more population, in a country which is now, we may say, in the pioneer stage, is, in my judgment, too severe a limitation. In fact the limitation of $15,000,000, which I suggest, on the Philippine Government would be a very small limitation. I do not think that even if the maximum amount was incurred it would be a serious burden.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TOWNER. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Can the gentleman inform the committee as to the extent to which the $5,000,000 authorization has been availed of by the Philippine Government?

Mr. TOWNER. The limit has been reached, I will say to the gentleman, and was reached years ago.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TOWNER. Yes.

Mr. MILLER. Is it not a fact that the Filipino people or legislature have asked for just the amount that the gentleman has indicated in his amendment?

Mr. TOWNER. Yes; that is true. And I will say further that I have introduced a separate bill extending the limit of the indebtedness to $15,000,000, and it has the entire approval of the Philippine Government, and the most conservative men in the islands believe it ought to be put at that figure, so far as I can ascertain.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TOWNER. Certainly.

Mr. SLAYDEN. What is the necessity for giving that increase? Can they not get along well otherwise by the practice of economy?

Mr. TOWNER. The necessity is this, I will say to the gentleman: Their necessity is that of a nation not only in a pioneer stage such as we were in when we were building up our country, but in a pioneer stage such as we should have if now, in the midst of this Nation, a new State, where we would have to commence at the beginning to build a Commonwealth, were to be instituted. With the resources of an undeveloped community they demand the full measure of the requirements of a civilized state. In other words, the standards are the standards of to-day. The limitations are the limitations of 10 years ago, or, I might almost say, of 400 years ago, because only 14 years ago they were 400 years behind the standards of civilization that we now know in this country.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Another question, Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will permit. Is it not a fact that the Philippine Government is already equipped with many, if not all, of the public buildings that it will need?

Mr. TOWNER. Oh, by no means. They are building them just as fast as they can.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I do not mean for the provincial governments, but for the central government.

Mr. TOWNER. No; not by any means, because of the fact that there is just as much necessity for expenditures outside of the city of Manila in that country as there is for expenditures outside of the city of Washington in the United States. In fact, they have only begun on the necessary things that the Government requires in order to carry on its affairs.

Mr. SLAYDEN. It might wreck some political fortunes, but it would be wise if we had some limitation on buildings to be erected outside of the city of Washington.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, we ought to be very careful indeed about increasing the possibility of adding too much to the present bonded indebtedness in the Philippine Islands. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] said that there are 8,000,000 people over there. That is true; but that total includes women and children—not taxpayers—and the uncivilized tribes. There are not 8,000,000 taxpayers, persons who earn the money to pay the taxes.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER. Yes.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. The section discussed a few minutes ago, as it originally read, gave them permission to issue bonds up to 7 per cent of the assessed valuation for the Province or municipality.

Mr. COOPER. That is what we are discussing now.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Does not that mean that 7 per cent of bonds may be issued by the municipality and then 7 per cent by the Province, which would be 14 per cent, and then the proposal of the bill is to put $10,000,000 on top of that?

Mr. COOPER. No; I think not. The proviso on page 9, line 10, is:

Provided, however, That the entire indebtedness of the Philippine Government created by the authority conferred herein shall not exceed at any one time the sum of $10,000,000, exclusive of those obligations known as friar-land bonds, nor that of any Province or municipality a sum in excess of 7 per cent of the aggregate tax valuation of its property at any one time.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. I will renew my question. What is meant by the words "any Province or municipality"?

Mr. MADDEN. The Province would have the right to issue bonds, and the municipality would have the right to issue bonds, which would not be included in the $10,000,000.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. In the different States of the Nation usually the municipalities have the power to issue bonds and the States have also power to do so.

Mr. MADDEN. The words "Province or municipality" are equivalent to "State or city," and each of them would have the right under this proviso to issue bonds to the extent of 7 per cent of the assessed valuation; and then, in addition to that, $10,000,000 of bonds could be issued by the nation.

Mr. COOPER. No; I do not so understand it.

Mr. MADDEN. That is what it means.

Mr. COOPER. I do not so understand.

Mr. TALCOTT of New York. In other words, each is separate?

Mr. MADDEN. Certainly; national, provincial, and municipal.

Mr. TALCOTT of New York. The city of Manila is not included in this $10,000,000 limitation.

Mr. COOPER. Twelve years ago by the organic act we limited the amount of the possible bonded indebtedness to $5,000,000. This bill proposes to increase that to $10,000,000. Inasmuch as the people of the islands have prospered under the limitation of $5,000,000, I think this raising of the limit to $10,000,000 will prove ample for the present. In my judgment we ought not now to increase it to $15,000,000. I have heard nothing which requires or would justify the incurring by the islands of so great an addition to their existing bonded liability. For the present at least I believe this $10,000,000 ought to suffice. Now, when the people of the islands are the first to begin to tax themselves, it will do them no harm if they are compelled to practice reasonable economy.

Mr. MILLER. The gentleman has well stated that they have prospered, but is not the gentleman also aware of the fact that in the last two or three years they have been compelled practically to abandon or, rather, to discontinue a great many immediately desired public works because of this limitation?

Mr. COOPER. Will not this give them $5,000,000 more?

Mr. MILLER. Yes; and it will be a very great relief.

Mr. COOPER. Then, after they have expended this additional $5,000,000 they can, if they so desire, pass a resolution asking to have that limitation raised by Congress, and if, after a thorough hearing and discussion, the Congress shall decide that it ought to be raised to $15,000,000 it will so provide. But meanwhile let the Filipino people demonstrate that an increase of $5,000,000 is not ample to serve their needs.

Mr. MILLER. May I ask the gentleman one further question?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I would like to be recognized. I do not care to occupy five minutes of time in discussing this. I really had it in mind to ask one further question of the gentleman from Wisconsin, and I think that would have expressed about all I care to say. I think it is a fact—and if it is not a fact, I hope I may be corrected immediately—that the Philippine Legislature passed a resolution asking that the limit of indebtedness be increased from $5,000,000 to $15,000,000. That was the expression of the legislative body representing the people. Now, I have not refreshed my recollection lately, and I want to be corrected if I am wrong, but it is my understanding that that resolution was approved by the then Governor General. It was also approved by the Secretary of War and the Bureau of Insular Affairs and was recommended to Congress by those respective authorities, showing that the increase to $15,000,000 which is now proposed has been carefully thought out and has been recommended by every person conversant with the facts in the islands. Now, I ran against this constantly in various places.

Mr. COOPER. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. MILLER. Yes.

Mr. COOPER. Is it not a common thing for the Senate of the United States, for example, to raise something to about 500 per cent, knowing that when it goes into conference they will get what they want? Inasmuch as the people have asked for fifteen millions, does not the gentleman think that they would be satisfied with ten millions?

Mr. MILLER. They will like it better than the present situation. Let us address ourselves to whether they need the additional $10,000,000 more than they need the additional $5,000,000. They have been unable to construct proper harbors in the islands. That is an undisputed fact. They have now a very fine harbor in the city of Manila.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER. Yes.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Does not the bulk of commerce enter the harbor of Manila?

Mr. MILLER. That is entirely true, but I wish to make this statement, that while Manila is the metropolis and the very heart of the islands, yet there are three other cities hundreds of miles away that have gone ahead with leaps and bounds. One is Cebu, with 70,000 people, another is the city of Iloilo, and to these may be added Zamboanga.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Have not those harbors been improved?

Mr. MILLER. Cebu has had some improvement, but Iloilo requires extensive improvements before it is suitable. All the sugar that comes out of the sugar country comes out at Iloilo. While Manila is the center of Luzon, it happens that it is not the center of the region where the products come that they want to ship. If I can explain that a little more, I will try to. Down in the southeastern corner of Luzon, if there can be such a corner, Tabaco and Legaspi are the great ports for the two great commodities hemp and coconut. Coconut to-day is the greatest article of export from the islands, in the form of copra, and opportunities for the expansion of that kind of agriculture are simply immense.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. VOLLMER). The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks that the time of the gentleman from Minnesota be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I am going to ask now that all debate on this section and amendments thereto be closed in 10 minutes.

Mr. STAFFORD. I hope the gentleman will not apply it to the section. This is a very important subject and export duties have not been considered.

Mr. JONES. I am talking about the section that provides for bond issue.

Mr. STAFFORD. I know; but the question of export duties is involved. I have no objection to confining it to the amendment.

Mr. JONES. Well, Mr. Chairman, I will say 15 minutes.

Mr. MILLER. I hope consent will not be asked respecting the whole paragraph, but that the gentleman will confine his request to the amendment now pending and make it 10 minutes.

Mr. JONES. Very well, Mr. Chairman, I ask that all debate on the pending amendment close in 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent that all debate on the pending amendment close in 10 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MILLER. I made inquiry as to why these harbors had not been developed, and I found, of course, that they were not developed and improved because no funds were available. They had utilized all the funds they could secure for the improvement of Manila, which was the most important. Cebu Harbor has been receiving more attention than the others I have mentioned. I will say in passing that Cebu is the home of the speaker of the assembly, and therefore you can rest assured that that harbor has not been overlooked.

Mr. TOWNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER. Yes.

Mr. TOWNER. Is it not true that the interisland commerce, the commerce between the islands, and probably centering in Manila, has been the most remarkable of all the developments and improvements in the islands?

Mr. MILLER. I think that is unquestionably true.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Is not that interisland commerce done on boats of comparatively light draft?

Mr. MILLER. No; I have a photograph that I would like to show the gentleman, one that I took one morning when I happened down to the dock at Manila. At one spot it shows five boats that the gentleman or anybody else would pronounce to be magnificent boats, and they were engaged exclusively in interisland business.

Mr. SLAYDEN. They could come into the harbors?

Mr. MILLER. No; they stopped outside, and lightering was necessary. That results, of course, in increased cost of the marketing, an increase that ought not to be continued longer than is necessary. I would like not only to discuss these four harbors that I have, but also Zamboanga. That is a great port down in the southern islands in the heart of the Moro country. If you look at the map of the great trade routes, you will find that the trade routes from Japan and east China going to Australia go through there and vessels stop there. There are also lines of boats now sailing from Zamboanga to Singapore, and from there to India; and if they had good harbor facilities there I can see no reason why an important port could not be created. Then most of the road building in the island has to be taken care of out of the insular fund, and, in addition to that, much of the cost of the municipal markets, one of the most vital and essential features of health in the islands. A good part of the money for constructing sanitary markets, so that instead of people eating all kinds of diseased food they are eating pure, healthy food, comes also from the insular funds.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER. Yes.

Mr. TOWNER. Will the gentleman also not tell about the artesian wells?

Mr. MILLER. And that is of the utmost importance. One of the great sources of infection in the islands we have always known came from the water, most of which was surface water or shallow well water. We found about four years ago that artesian wells could be dug in many of the Provinces, and during this period of time more than 800 artesian wells have been dug; and, to the surprise of everybody, the moment the artesian well was put into operation the death rate in the particular locality fell 50 per cent. It kept that uniform rate throughout the Provinces where they were installed. They have now more requests by far for new artesian wells than they have the funds with which to dig them.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I very much hope that the amendment increasing this amount will not be adopted. So far as I know, there has not been—recently, at least—any representation that there was any demand for an increase of $10,000,000 in the bonded indebtedness of the Philippine Islands. I do not think that at any time there have been really earnest representations that that much was necessary. In the Sixty-first Congress, however, there was a suggestion offered to the Committee on Insular Affairs that it would be wise to increase the limit of bonded indebtedness, and the suggestion was that it be increased by $10,000,000. A bill was reported favorably from the committee. If I recall correctly, it was placed upon the Calendar for Unanimous Consent, and an effort was made to get it considered upon that calendar. It was objected to by the present Governor General of the Philippine Islands, Mr. Harrison, then a member of the House. In the subsequent Congress—the Sixty-second Congress—the bill was again presented, and I think a favorable report was made upon it at that time, carrying the authority to issue an increase of $10,000,000. That either did not come up for consideration in the House or was defeated.

Mr. JONES. It did not come up.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. It did not come up for consideration, my friend from Virginia [Mr. JONES] informs me. Recently when we came to frame this bill and gave the matter careful consideration there was no demand or suggestion from any source, so far as I know, that it was necessary to increase the amount more than $5,000,000 at this time. The original act—the organic act of 1902, when the Congress began to plan for the government of the islands by the people of this country—wisely limited the bonded indebtedness to $5,000,000, notwithstanding all of the great work that had to be performed at that time by a people not used to our system or the system that we were about to institute there. They have operated under that very wisely and well, so far as I am informed. The suggestion now is that there should be an increase, and I think it is proper there should be an increase to the extent provided in this bill, $5,000,000; but it seems to me that to double the amount that we have suggested is not right at this time, and I very much hope the amendment will not prevail.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I want to say that my observation of the mad rush of municipalities and States to create debt when they have a credit and the privilege of going into debt impels me to oppose any such amendment as has been suggested. I think it is a wise limitation. I do not believe it is necessary for us to develop all of the country at once. I think we had better crawl before we walk, and I think that is a good, sound doctrine to apply in the Philippine Islands.

The CHAIRMAN. All time has expired. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment to the same section, line 12, on page 9, by striking out the sum of "$10,000,000" and inserting in lieu thereof "4 per cent of the aggregate tax value of the Philippine Islands at any one time."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Dakota offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 9, line 12, by striking out the words "sum of $10,000,000" and inserting in lieu thereof "4 per cent of the aggregate tax valuation of the Philippine Islands at any one time."

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Mr. Chairman, the assessed valuation of the Philippine Islands, according to a statement handed to me by the commissioner from the islands, is $260,986,600. Four per cent on that sum would be $10,439,000, or about the amount mentioned in the bill at this time, $10,000,000, and I suggest this amendment for this reason, that I believe a constitutional limitation with respect to a matter of this kind should not be arbitrary. In other words, it may fit the islands to-day, but if we wait as long again to legislate for the Philippines as we have in the past, 10 or 12 years from now it might not be the case. The business of the islands and the value of the property in the islands are increasing rapidly, and a suit of clothes, so to speak, that will fit the islands to-day may not fit them five years from now. If this amendment is adopted, as the islands grow in wealth it will permit them to increase their bonded indebtedness.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I do not think the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Dakota should prevail. It makes the amount fluctuating. Tax values are not fixed values. I do not know precisely what system of valuation there is in the Philippine Islands for the purposes of taxation, or of fixing the amount of taxation, but if it is anything similar to the valuation systems with which I am familiar in this country, then it is a very fluctuating proposition. On the basis of 4 per cent they might one year be entitled to $10,500,000 of bonds and the next year they might on the same basis be entitled to $12,000,000 in bonds, and then the next year it might drop to $11,000,000, and then what is the legal status of the extra million dollars of bonds? It seems to me that the wise thing to do is to leave this as fixed in the bill—a fixed amount. The gentleman admits that if it is fixed on the 4 per cent figures on the valuation now in effect it amounts to about the same sum as is now in the bill—$10,000,000—and in view of the danger of fluctuation in tax values it seems to me the wise thing to do is to have it fixed at the arbitrary amount.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Does not the gentleman believe, inasmuch as 12 years have elapsed since we legislated generally on the subject of the Philippines, that it is too much to ask the Philippine Islands, which are now growing rapidly in trade, commerce, and property, to come back here again for legislation upon this subject when we can now just as well as not make it fixed upon a percentage basis?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. No; I will say to the gentleman I do not think so. I will say this frankly to the gentleman: There never was in this House a sympathy for the demand for the increase in this allowance of bonded indebtedness, because the House was never convinced that the necessity existed. If the House had been convinced of the necessity it would have been passed some years ago without difficulty. Now, a necessity may arise under some future condition that will render it essential for them to be able to have more than could be raised upon 4 per cent of the tax valuation. Whenever the exigency arises and it is so made to appear to the House, there will be no difficulty about getting proper legislation through. There has not been legislation allowing this increase heretofore, simply because the House did not believe it was really necessary.

Mr. PLATT. If the gentleman will permit, I suggest that the gentleman's argument, that in case the assessed valuation should fall below a certain figure it might invalidate part of the bonds, also applies to what you have got in the bill limiting municipal indebtedness, and if it is deemed good in one case it is good in the other.

Mr. JONES. If the gentleman will permit me, it would not be possible in this bill to fix the limit of indebtedness in the manner suggested. What would be a proper limit for one municipality would not be a proper one for many others. The bill provides the only practical method.

Mr. PLATT. I agree to that, but it certainly is not true that if the assessed valuation of the property of any municipality falls below a certain percentage it would invalidate any of the bonds already issued.

Mr. JONES. I do not think it would.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Mr. Chairman, I ask that I may have two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Dakota asks unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. I would like to ask the gentleman who was on his feet a few moments ago [Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee] whether as the section now reads it will permit a local municipality to issue bonds to the extent of 7 per cent and permit a Province to bond for 7 per cent, equal to 14 per cent, and will also permit $10,000,000 of bonds in excess of the friar-land bonds?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Yes; that is correct. What was it the gentleman wanted to ask?

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. I wanted to know whether that is the gentleman's interpretation of this bill.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Yes; that is what the bill says.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] expressed the opinion a few moments ago that it is only 7 per cent for the Province and the municipality together.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. No; it is both; that is my interpretation of it.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Dakota.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I really do not think the committee ought to pass a paragraph that prohibits in the future the imposition of export duties without just a word in reference to it. Now, I am not opposed to the prohibition. I do not believe there is anybody on the floor of the House who is opposed to it, but it really is of such importance in its effect on other matters that we certainly ought to notice what effect it will have on the Philippine Islands.

Mr. JONES. I would like to ask the gentleman a question. The gentleman is aware of the fact this is the law now, is he not?

Mr. MILLER. Certainly. I am not opposed to it; but that law has only been passed this last year.

Mr. JONES. Congress has passed an act prohibiting it.

Mr. MILLER. I understand that. I do not think it was ever a principle in American policy, at least, to impose an export tax, but when we acquired the islands we found that they were in the habit of having an export tax; and not then being in the position to completely readjust and change the source from which revenues were acquired to run the government, we retained the export duty, just the same as we retained and still retain the cedula tax, which is a poll tax. I do not believe the Filipino people ever objected to paying the export tax. If they did, I never heard of it——

Mr. QUEZON. They did.

Mr. MILLER. All right; if the gentleman says they did, then they did.

Mr. PAYNE. If the gentleman will permit, I want to say that when we imposed the export tax we did it on what was believed the sentiment of the Filipino people as represented by our Government there. They wanted an export tax, and that is the reason we put it in. It was abhorrent to me.

Mr. MILLER. I think the gentleman from New York correctly states the situation. Now, the gentleman from the Philippines [Mr. QUEZON] states there was some objection. I think that was incidental rather than universal, and as a doctrine, which the gentleman from New York correctly stated, it is very abhorrent to any American mind. Now, let us see just what has happened to the islands consequent upon the elimination of the export duty by the tariff act which became a law about a year ago.

I find that for the period of time ending June 30 and beginning January 1 there was a loss in revenue to the government from the export tax of ₱854,000. There was a slight increase in the import duties, and deducting that slight increase from this very large decrease resulted in a net decrease in the revenues of the islands in the sum of ₱557,000. During the remaining six months that sum will be easily doubled. The amount heretofore derived from the export tax has been about ₱2,000,000 to ₱2,200,000. So there will be lost each year to the insular government about ₱2,000,000 by reason of the elimination of the export tax. That has to be made up in some way; it will have to be compensated for. You can not take away sources of revenue without substituting others. Now, it may be said that we have extended the provisions of the income tax to the islands, and that that will very likely make up the deficit; but gentlemen who are thus inclined to think will change their minds when they find that the amount during that period of time received from the income tax was a little better than ₱90,000, which, of course, is a very small part of the large decrease.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MILLER. Now, the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. JONES], in opening the general debate on the bill before us, extended some remarks on that occasion to the effect that business was booming in the Philippine Islands. I have always thought that the gentleman from Virginia had a great deal of courage. My admiration for him in that respect was greatly increased by that remark. I think his voice is the only one in all the world that has been raised to make that statement. As a matter of fact, from and after the time of the inauguration of the present administration in the Philippine Islands there has been a sharp and a rapid decline in general business. That business depression has extended to pretty nearly every line of industry in the islands. Consequent upon that there has been a falling off in internal-revenue taxes. Now, an internal-revenue tax in the islands means a whole lot more to the islands than an internal-revenue tax in the United States means to the United States, for the reason that internal-revenue taxes there embrace a great variety of items that they do not embrace in the United States.

Mr. CLINE. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MILLER. Certainly.

Mr. CLINE. I understood you to say, in discussing another proposition a few minutes ago, that the hemp industry was one of the leading industries of the islands?

Mr. MILLER. I did.

Mr. CLINE. How has that industry been affected under present conditions?

Mr. MILLER. I can not advise the gentleman as to the hemp industry, but I will say this, that the sugar industry is the best this year it ever has been.

Mr. CLINE. Is it not a fact that the exports of hemp have been greater this last year than they have been at any other time in the history of the islands?

Mr. MILLER. I do not quite believe that to be true, but it may be true, and I would not be surprised if it were true; and I will tell the gentleman why. During the last few years very marked advance has been made in instructing the people as to the best methods of growing hemp, how to plant it, and where to plant it, and especially in stripping it in order to get the fiber. Likewise there has been a very enormous extension in the area devoted to coconut culture, and there ought to be a very large increase each year in the amount of business in the islands in that respect.

Now, let me here state that we went to the islands in 1899 and found them enjoying a total foreign commerce of $27,000,000, exports and imports. Within 10 years' time that has increased over 100 per cent, so that in 1909 we found the imports and exports had reached $58,000,000. During that year of 1909 industry in the islands received its greatest boom. Under the tariff laws enacted by this Congress in 1909 special benefit was given to sugar growing and to tobacco growing in the islands.

Mr. SLAYDEN. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. MILLER. Certainly.

Mr. SLAYDEN. How much of that increase in 10 years was due to the supplies sent out for the Army and Navy of the United States?

Mr. MILLER. Oh, but a very small amount, as the gentleman can determine for himself by inspecting the exports and imports of the various commodities sent out and in. Now, if the gentleman will permit, I would like to proceed with the statement I was making.

A very marked boom was given to the business in the islands in 1909, so that in three years, in 1912, the business had increased another 100 per cent, practically, ascending from $58,000,000 to $105,000,000, and the exact relationship that increase bore to the United States is found in the further fact that the business between the islands and the United States in that same three-year period of time increased from about $14,000,000 to $42,000,000.

Mr. CLINE. Just a word.

Mr. MILLER. Certainly.

Mr. CLINE. At the same time, in 1912, we only took about 9 per cent of their export business and sent them about 15 per cent of their import business.

Mr. MILLER. Oh, but the gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. CLINE. I think I am not mistaken.

Mr. MILLER. The business of export and import from and to the United States in 1912 is 42 per cent. I assume the gentleman has not that in mind or he would not make that statement.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it is seen that each year the business of the islands has materially increased over the year preceding, and in the period from 1909 to 1913 was a time of tremendous expansion and growth, and it would be most remarkable if any line of industry during the past year showed no improvement over the preceding year, and unless it did show a very marked increase it would not be in harmony with the developments that have been going on there for a number of years. As a matter of fact, the total business has fallen off. The total collection of internal revenue for the six-month period which I have indicated has fallen off very materially. In fact, on the 1st of June the decline in internal-revenue taxes had reached a point where it became a question of national calamity. Exceptional activities were displayed during the month of June in the collection of these taxes, and they did mighty well. Now, I do not propose to enter into a partisan discussion of the situation at this time, at least, but I do think we should bear in mind that while we have decreased their revenues by the legislation which has been enacted, we must in some way give additional legislation that will compensate for that loss.

We can propose legislation now to improve business conditions in the islands immediately, and we should not overlook the fact that to-day the revenues of the islands are on a decline, and unless some change is made bankruptcy stares the islands in the face. And it is a decline that started about 16 months ago and which has continued with little interruption ever since.

Now, I know the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. JONES] will say that the business in the islands in the month of June was the best of any month in many, many years; and if the gentleman so states he will state the truth, because it was—June of this year. If, however, an inspection of the situation is made, it will be found that the great increase during the month of June was in the export of sugar. There was a tremendous demand then for sugar throughout the world.

Beginning with 1909 sugar culture in the islands has continued to grow very rapidly. I believe I am stating the modest truth when I say that the Philippine Islands are capable of producing more sugar than can be produced in any other one area of the earth, and that the greatest future prosperity in the islands is dependent upon sugar culture. But sugar can not be cultivated in one season. It requires several years from the time you start to clean off the bosque and the cogon grass before you have the sugar cane ready to cut; and while great centrals have been built in several places in the islands during the past few years, some of them now are just getting into operation, and the increased acreage this year for about the first time came to be used. So as a consequence there has been, as a result of the past three years of development, an increase of the sugar business, and I hope the increase will continue. But we must not overlook the fact that the sugar in the islands was probably exhausted pretty generally, until the next crop is harvested, by the unusual exportation during the period I have indicated.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I do not care to enter upon any discussion as to business conditions in the Philippine Islands. That is a very interesting question and one that I should be glad to discuss if I believed it to be pertinent at this time. I wish, however, to address myself briefly—I was about to say to the proposition before the committee, but I do not think that the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER] has offered any amendment. He is simply discussing the general proposition as to whether or not the export taxes should be abolished in the Philippine Islands, without having introduced any amendment relating to the subject.

I wish to say a word as to the history of export taxes in the Philippine Islands. The gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE], who was at one time chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, may have been chairman—although I do not remember as to that—at the time the law of Congress was passed which imposed the export taxes; he was certainly a member of the committee.

Mr. PAYNE. The gentleman can figure it out. I was chairman for 12 years. That was in 1909.

Mr. JONES. Then the gentleman was chairman at that time. What I wish to say is this: Whatever may have been the representations made to his committee at that time, whatever may have been represented to his committee as to the necessity for this tax at the time it was imposed, I am quite sure that for some time past the demand for the repeal of the export tax upon hemp has been very general and very persistent.

Mr. PAYNE. The gentleman remembers that the Committee on Ways and Means had exclusive jurisdiction of that subject.

Mr. JONES. That is true. It is also true that the annual reports of the Philippine Commission for several years past have contained earnest recommendations for the abolition of this tax. I think the gentleman will bear me out in this statement. I wish to say, further, that this tax was always unpopular in the islands, and that many meetings have been held and many resolutions adopted there calling upon Congress to repeal it. In response to the request of the Philippine Commission and the appeals of the Filipino people, Congress finally abolished the tax, and there is therefore no such tax in existence at this time.

As the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER] has very correctly stated, the only reason on earth why anybody objected to the repeal of this law was that it produced approximately a million dollars a year revenue, and some of those who were responsible for the administration of the laws in the Philippine Islands doubted the expediency of the repeal of a law which produced such a large amount of revenue. But, notwithstanding that fact, the Governors General for the last five or six years have all urged Congress to repeal this law, and at last Congress, as I have said, repealed it.

Under these circumstances I do not believe that any gentleman on the other side of the aisle will offer an amendment striking out this provision forbidding the imposition of an export tax.

Mr. MILLER. I certainly would not do it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Virginia has expired.

Mr. JONES. The gentleman admits that he would not do it; and therefore, Mr. Chairman, as there is nothing before the committee, I ask that the Clerk proceed with the reading of the bill.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I would like to be heard for a moment. I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I think the last amendment of the tariff laws of the Philippine Islands was in 1909.

Mr. JONES. I think so.

Mr. PAYNE. That bill was prepared in the Philippine Islands, was sanctioned largely by the officers of the government, and written by the collector of customs there; and that bill provided for an export tax on hemp, among other things, and it was insisted that that should still remain in the bill. It was in the first bill that I reported to the House and conducted through the House, as it was in the last bill. I only consented to it myself because they wanted it and because it seemed to be necessary, as the gentleman says, for revenue. But they wanted that tax; I would not have consented to it otherwise. I have no objection to its being abolished. I was in favor of its abolition, but the truth of history ought to be stated here instead of so much imagination.

Mr. JONES. I will say to the gentleman that the public sentiment has changed in the islands since that time.

The CHAIRMAN. The pro forma amendment is withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 12. That all local legislative powers in the Philippines, except as herein otherwise provided, shall be vested in a legislature, which shall consist of two houses, one the senate and the other the house of representatives, and the two houses shall be designated "the Philippine Legislature": Provided, That until the Philippine Legislature as herein provided shall have been organized the existing Philippine Legislature shall have all legislative authority herein granted to the Government of the Philippine Islands, except such as may now be within the exclusive jurisdiction of the Philippine Commission, which is so continued until the organization of the legislature herein provided for the Philippines. When the Philippine Legislature shall have been organized, the exclusive legislative jurisdiction and authority exercised by the Philippine Commission shall thereafter be exercised by the Philippine Legislature.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend, in line 17, page 9, by striking out the words "all local" and inserting the word "general."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 9, line 17, strike out the words "all local" and insert the word "general."

Mr. TOWNER. The chairman of the committee [Mr. JONES] will remember that that was talked of, and I think he has no objection to it.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 13. That the members of the Senate of the Philippines, except as herein provided, shall be elected for terms of four years by the qualified electors of the Philippines. Each of the senatorial districts defined as hereinafter provided shall have the right to elect two senators. No person shall be an elective member of the Senate of the Philippines who is not a qualified elector and over 30 years of age, and who is not able to read and write either the Spanish or English language, and who has not been a resident of the Philippines for at least two consecutive years and an actual resident of the senatorial district from which chosen for a period of at least one year prior to his election, and who does not own in his individual right property, real or personal, situate in the Philippines.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I move to insert in line 11, page 10, following the word "Philippines," the words "one-half every two years."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 10, line 11, after the word "Philippines," insert the words "one-half every two years."

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I will ask the Clerk if he will kindly read that with the amendment?

The Clerk read as follows:

That the members of the Senate of the Philippines, except as herein provided, shall be elected for terms of four years by the qualified electors of the Philippines, one-half every two years.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I think the object of that amendment will be apparent to gentlemen on the floor. It is a great advantage, especially in the upper house of a legislative body, that it shall not change radically at the close of a term.

The term of senators in the Philippine Islands is four years. To have the members of the assembly and the members of the senate all go out at one time is an unwise provision of the law. Most of the States of the Union provide that the senators shall be elected at different periods, so that their terms shall not all expire at the same time. We have that provision also regarding the Senators of the United States. It is a proposition that

I do not think admits of very much debate that the business will be carried on very much better if there shall be at least one-half of the upper house who have served for two years previously and have had at least that much experience.

Mr. COOPER. Suppose they were going to elect an entirely new senate. If they elected one-half every two years, at the first election only one-half of the senators would be elected, and then they would have to wait two years before electing the other half.

Mr. TOWNER. Oh, no; that will have to be provided for by a subsequent amendment.

Mr. COOPER. I was going to say that you have got to make some provision so that you will have a whole senate when you get started. Otherwise under this provision you will have only half a senate elected at first.

Mr. TOWNER. Of course, the gentleman is correct about that, and provision will be made that one-half of the senators shall be elected for two years and one-half for four years at the first election.

Mr. BORLAND. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TOWNER. I yield.

Mr. BORLAND. I want to ask the gentleman from Iowa if he has taken into consideration the language on pages 12 and 13 giving the Philippine Assembly the power to prescribe rules and regulations governing these elections, and if he does not think it would be possible under that general language and the power there given for the assembly to provide the time and manner of the election of these senators?

Mr. TOWNER. I hardly think so. One reason has already been suggested by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER]. Unless we provide in this bill that at the first election half the senators shall be elected for two years and the other half for four years, and that thereafter the term shall be for four years, it occurs to me that at the first election there would be only half the senators elected. I hardly think it would be within the power of the Philippine Legislature, for the reason that while they might provide the manner and times, yet this bill provides that the whole senate shall be elected for four years at the beginning of the period, and certainly the Philippine Legislature would not have the right or power to change it.

Mr. BORLAND. I heartily concur with the gentleman's view that the upper house ought to be more or less of a continuing body, and there ought to be a certain number of hold-over members to preserve the continuity of the organization of that body, and that is one of the features of an upper house; but it seems to me that can very well be provided by the Philippine Assembly itself if it takes that view of the matter.

Mr. TOWNER. I do not believe that power would be in the Philippine Assembly. I would say further to the gentleman, if he will give me his attention——

Mr. BORLAND. I am listening.

Mr. TOWNER. This is always a constitutional provision, as the gentleman well knows. It is provided for in the Constitution of the United States. It is provided for in the constitution of every State. This bill, if it becomes a law, will become the constitution, the fundamental law of the Philippines. It should contain such provisions. Of course, the manner and form of the election may be subject to the legislature, but this is not within the terms "manner and form"; it is more of a fundamental, more of a constitutional requirement, and I think the provision ought to be fixed in this bill.

Mr. BORLAND. On further consideration, I think the gentleman is right about it. I see that in section 17, on page 13, the term of office of elective senators and representatives shall be four years from the 16th day of October following the election. Under that, this being the provision of the organic law, I doubt whether the Philippine Assembly could make a shorter term for part of the senators.

Mr. JONES. If the gentleman will permit me, I do not think that language would prevent it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that the time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. TOWNER. I will ask unanimous consent for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that his time be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. JONES. The sixteenth section, as the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] has said, states that authority is given the legislature to redistrict the Philippine Islands and to modify, amend, or repeal any provision of this section. Then comes section 17, which provides—

That the terms of office of elective senators and representatives shall be four years from the 16th of October following their election.

Suppose the legislature were to provide that half of the senators should be elected, for instance, on the 16th of October, 1917, and half on the 16th of October, 1919, all of them to be elected for the term of four years; that would not violate the provision referred to, but would simply be such a modification as, I think, is permissible under the terms of the bill. This, however, is but an offhand opinion, and I may, of course, be mistaken as to my conclusions.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I think it would be utterly impossible to do that under this language, because of the fact that the first senate elected would be elected necessarily under the terms of this act and not under the authority of any act of the Philippine Legislature. The Philippine Legislature is created by the very act which provides for its election. Under the terms of the bill as it is now all of the senators would have to be elected for four years. I do not think that it would be in the power of the legislature to make any change to take away from these senators any part of their term of office or extend it, because it is fixed in the fundamental law.

Mr. BOOHER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TOWNER. Yes.

Mr. BOOHER. I want to call your attention to section 17, which reads as follows:

The terms of office of elective senators and representatives shall be four years from the 16th of October following their election.

That fixes the term at four years from the 16th of October following the election, so that each one is elected for four years. I do not think the gentleman's amendment is broad enough to accomplish what he desires.

Mr. TOWNER. This is only a preliminary amendment, and when we come to subsequent sections we will provide that one half is to be elected for two years and the other half for four years.

Mr. BOOHER. I think it ought to come in where the gentleman has suggested. Suppose you offer an amendment something like this, that senatorial districts shall be numbered from 1 to 12, both inclusive, and in the even-numbered districts the senators shall be elected for two years and in the odd numbers for four years and thereafter all shall be elected for four years, and then you will have it covered.

Mr. TOWNER. I would have no objection to that.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has again expired.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Iowa be extended another five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota?

There was no objection.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I have no objection to that, and I suggest to the chairman of the committee that this section be passed in order that this amendment may be drawn so that it may embody the desire of the committee.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I was going to say to the House that whatever might be the construction placed on the language to which attention has been called by the gentleman from Missouri the purpose of the committee was to provide for a four-year term and that all the provisions of the bill are written with that idea in view. Of course, if this amendment is adopted it will necessitate the adoption of a number of consequential amendments. I would not like, therefore, to have this amendment adopted at this time. Its adoption would require a rewriting of other sections, which should be carefully done. For that reason I am opposed to the adoption of this amendment at this time, although I have no special objection to letting the matter go over.

Mr. COOPER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TOWNER. Yes.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask a question of the gentleman from Iowa and also of the gentleman from Virginia. There is no question about the advisability and absolute necessity of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa, provided it be the intention of the committee and desire of the House that the Senate of the Philippines shall be a continuing body.

Mr. JONES. That was not the intention of the committee, and therefore the bill was not written with that view.

Mr. COOPER. The gentleman wants the senate to be elected for four years and all the members to go out at the same time?

Mr. JONES. That was the intention of the committee.

Mr. COOPER. I think that particular phase ought to be discussed before we pass on the amendment.

Mr. TOWNER. I want to ask the gentleman from Virginia if he has any objection to my withdrawing the amendment I have offered at this time with the privilege of resubmitting it subsequently?

Mr. JONES. No.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent to withdraw his amendment with the understanding that it can be submitted at a later time. Is there objection?

Mr. MILLER. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman, that does not carry with it the passing of the paragraph so as to cut off other amendments? I have one or two that I want to offer.

Mr. JONES. Oh, no.

Mr. BOOHER. Mr. Chairman, do I understand that the gentleman from Iowa has withdrawn his amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. For the time being. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. CLINE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I want to congratulate the House on the advancement of this legislation that the Filipino people have so much wanted. I want to say that I am in harmony with some gentlemen on the other side of the House on the proposition that this particular provision of the bill is not a partisan feature. Extending to the people of the Philippines the right to elect the Senate of the Philippine Government is one of the most marked features of progressive legislation that we have made in this country for a long time. We established a democratic form of government and lived under it ourselves for more than a hundred years before we elected our United States Senators by a popular vote. I remember very well in 1908, when the Republican national convention assembled in Chicago. My genial friend the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] was a delegate in that convention. He had the courage, as a member of the committee on resolutions, in a minority report to bring a resolution into the Republican convention and submitted the proposition that the people elect the United States Senators to the greatest legislative body in the world. That Republican convention kicked Mr. COOPER and his resolution out of the back door of that convention by a vote of about 900 to 114.

So I say that we are living in progressive times, under a new freedom, and we are doing now what we ought to have done for ourselves long ago. We did in the act of 1905 for the Filipino something that we did not do for ourselves for more than 60 years after we had established this Republic. We had such confidence in the ability of the Filipino that we gave to representatives of the Philippine Assembly the right to represent 90,000 people in that legislature. A Member of this Congress did not represent that number of people in this body for more than 60 years.

I congratulate my Republican friends and the gentlemen on this floor for the advanced step they have taken in letting the Filipino people have the largest liberty that is possible under our form of government in transacting their own business.

Nothing has been said in this discussion that has more sound reason in it than that which was said by the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], that the greatest factor we can have in our relations with the Philippines is the friendly relationship that we establish now. It is not a question of whether we shall confer the right for a larger autonomy on the Philippines now. We must do that. Their ability is conceded. You can not harmonize these two propositions, namely, that you can teach the Filipino his right to civil and religious liberty with the proposition that you will then prevent him from exercising the functions that you have taught belong to him. It is not too much to assume that if we should refuse to permit the Filipino to occupy and use the largest possible liberty under autonomy that he is capable of the time will come very soon when he will ally himself with some other branch of the Malay race, and with them secure from us for themselves the sovereignty that we now exercise over them. I believe this legislation is productive of great good for us in the Philippines. I believe that this Congress has done more to bind the Filipino to us by those ties of friendship that will result in our supremacy, both with respect to civil liberty and commerce in the Philippines, than any other action we could take. I greet every opportunity presented to me to enlarge the rights and privileges of that struggling people in the Orient, who only seek to do as we do and to manage their own affairs within their own sovereignty. I congratulate the Congress on the step that it has taken in this direction. [Applause.]

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 10, line 11, strike out the word "four" and insert in lieu thereof the word "six."

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Minnesota yield?

Mr. MILLER. Yes.

Mr. BORLAND. I understood that there was an agreement here a few moments ago that this question of the term of senators would be passed over for the present.

Mr. MILLER. That was to perfect the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER], providing that only a portion of them should be elected at a time. The amendment that I offer is entirely independent of that, and I offer it now that I may present the matter to the committee, and, if possible, get an expression of opinion from the committee, in order that it may be considered later on.

Mr. BORLAND. I call the gentleman's attention to the fact that it is not independent, because this bill is drafted upon the theory of quadrennial elections. There is no provision for biennial elections, and consequently if the term of representatives and senators is not exactly the same, we would have to make new provision for election.

Mr. MILLER. The gentleman did not understand what I was saying. The proposition that I have here advanced would have to be affirmatively voted on to give it any connection whatever to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. BORLAND. Then the gentleman is merely presenting it?

Mr. MILLER. Yes. Mr. Chairman, I think there is one weakness in this bill, and I really believe that that is recognized by nearly every gentleman who has considered it. I am not going to be presumptious enough to say that this amendment which I suggest is going to correct the weakness, because I do not have that presumption, but I do offer the amendment that I may direct the attention of the committee to the defect of the bill, and I hope that it can be corrected. There is no reason on earth—gathered from the experience of humanity, gathered from the science of government, gathered from any theory of government—for having two bodies comprising one legislative entity if they are both to be composed of practically the same kind of people, elected in the same kind of way, and absolutely on an equal footing. When you have two legislative bodies elected for the same period of time by the same electorate, with the same qualifications, you simply have duplicated one institution. A thousand times better than that is a single legislative body. The House of Commons in England today stands as the best developed single legislative body the human race has yet produced. If we are going to have two legislative bodies with equal powers, composed practically of the same men, we are not stepping forward in constitutional institutions, but we are stepping away backward and forgetting the experience of humankind. This bill requires that the members of the senate shall serve for a period of four years, and it requires that the members of the house shall serve for a period of four years. What are the qualifications of a member of the senate? They are almost identical with those for membership in the house of representatives. There is no distinction between the two. They are both the same. If you are going to leave the bill in this way, cut out one body and save the expense. If you think a bicameral system of legislation is preferable, and I certainly do, then let one of those bodies have some characteristics distinct from the other. The framers of our Constitution reached the result by having our Senators in the United States serve for a period of six years and Members of the House serve for a period of two years. They also had the Members of the Senate elected by the State legislatures and the Members of the House elected by the people. As the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CLINE] has so well stated, we have made an advance in this bill by providing for popular election of the senators.

But we have not given the senator we propose popularly to elect one iota of power not possessed by every member of the other branch of the legislative body. But gentlemen may say they have the right of confirmation in some respects in the bill. That is true, but the right of confirmation under the scheme of government established by this bill does not in any sense compare with the situation that we have in the United States, where the right of confirmation is mighty important, in that we have international relations and a great variety of officials, confirmation of which makes the Senate of great importance. Now, it seems to me that we should take a little something from the lessons of experience, even if we have our eyes shut to the convincing logic of reason, and we should give to the members of the senate some characteristics not possessed by members of the house. [Applause on the Republican side.] And I believe, really and seriously, we can best reach that by having the members of the senate elected for six years.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I ask for five minutes. Now, I appreciate that I have asked for a great deal of time, and I want to make this confession, that I never would have asked for anything like this time if we could have had such opportunity for amendment in the committee as we have here. I appreciate the courtesy of the chairman and the committee, and I think it is right to have this discussion——

Mr. JONES. I would like to ask the gentleman if he did not have opportunity in the committee to offer amendments and if he ever offered any such amendment?

Mr. MILLER. I do not wish to criticize either the chairman or the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to put the request for consent first. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, of course we had opportunity to offer amendments, but the atmosphere which prevailed, as the gentleman well knows, did not yield to anything like serious consideration in respect to those amendments.

Mr. CLINE. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MILLER. Certainly.

Mr. CLINE. Will the election of members of the senate for six years result in constituting the senate a continuing body?

Mr. MILLER. I think that would be the effect, because it would be the steadying body, and I do think in the islands there should be a body more conservative than the other, more in the nature of a steadying body, and there is no other reason for the existence of an upper body unless it be in the nature of a steadying body.

Mr. GOULDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER. Certainly.

Mr. GOULDEN. Does not the gentleman think, feeling as he does upon this proposition, that it would be well to make the lower house a body elected for two years, coming fresh from the people?

Mr. MILLER. No; I very strongly approve of this provision electing members of the house for a period of four years, and I am frank to say here what I have said many times elsewhere—that I think one of the greatest mistakes our forefathers made was in having too frequent elections in the United States. [Applause.]

Mr. BORLAND. The gentleman would like to see the terms of Members of the House four years?

Mr. MILLER. I certainly would. I think if Members of the House of Representatives were elected for a period of four years instead of two it would result in a great saving to the American people and a decided improvement in the personnel of the House. [Applause.]

Mr. TOWNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER. Certainly.

Mr. TOWNER. This suggestion has been in my mind since the discussion commenced: In the Philippine Islands they are very averse to frequent elections, as the gentleman well knows, and prefer to have them occur once in four years instead of every two years. Might it not be a good idea to provide in this bill for an election, say, every three years—have the senate elected for a term of six years and the lower body for three years?

Mr. MILLER. I think that would be a very excellent suggestion—to have members of the house elected for three years and members of the senate for six years. I think that would be a most excellent plan. Now, no two places are alike, and if we are going to frame legislation, we should frame it so it will be most workable among the people who are to put it in operation. Having in mind the peculiar condition existing in the Philippine Islands, I believe that it would be common sense, and nearly every man who will stop to consider the fact would so decide, that the upper or conservative body should not be changed completely, as this bill does, every four years, should not be changed completely at any one time, and if you let the term of office be six years instead of four years it will be a decided improvement.

Mr. BORLAND. Let me ask the gentleman, if he will permit.

Mr. MILLER. Certainly.

Mr. BORLAND. Will he accompany this six-year term with a recall?

Mr. MILLER. Well, if the local legislature wanted to provide a recall, they might do so. I would not put it in the constitution. I would not favor a recall in the Philippine Islands.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER].

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 12, noes 23.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, in line 20, to strike out, after the word "election," the remainder of that line, all of line 21, and all of line 22.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 10, line 20, after the word "election," strike out the following language: "and who does not own in his individual right property, real or personal, situate in the Philippines."

Mr. TOWNER. This provision, Mr. Chairman, is absolutely of no value whatever. Any man with a coat to his back could qualify. It says, "who does not own in his individual right property, real or personal, situate in the Philippines." Any man in the Philippine Islands with a peso in his pocket could qualify. Such a provision is worse than useless; it is absolute folly.

Mr. Chairman, I am not in favor of placing any property qualifications in the Philippine Islands. If such qualification is justified there, it is justified here, and I am opposed to property qualifications either for suffrage or for office. We have given to the Philippine Legislature power by which they themselves can fix the qualifications, and there I would let it remain without further limitation. They are better qualified to pass upon the matter than we are, and I am in favor of trusting them. In any event, do not let us be so unwise as to retain such language as this in the section. If a property qualification is desired, which I am against, make it a real-property qualification; but if you are not in favor of a property qualification, then let us strike it out, as I think we ought to do.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER].

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. TOWNER. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 15, noes 22.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend by inserting after the word "personal," in line 21, page 10, the words "in the sum of ₱1,000."

I really would like to have some gentleman on the other side of the aisle stand up and have the nerve to tell me why they write into this bill the words the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] has just called attention to.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, may we have the amendment reported?

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 10, line 21, after the word "personal," insert the words "the sum of ₱1,000."

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, if it is the purpose of the committee, inasmuch as they have just voted down the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER], to put something like a property qualification upon the members of the senate, let us put one there. Now, the language of the bill is:

And who does not own in his individual right property, real or personal, situate in the Philippines.

"Property, real or personal." As the gentleman has stated, any man there who has a coat on his back can hold the office. Not all of them have coats. Some of them have breeches and no coat, because they live in a region where they do not need a coat. Some have not breeches, some have neither breeches nor coat nor shirt, but have a G string; and that is property. I can take you into the islands and show you hundreds and thousands of people that wear a G string and nothing else, and everyone of them thereby has sufficient qualification to bring them within the provisions of this bill. Now, that includes everybody in the islands. So, if it is the intention of the committee that no property qualification should be required, let us cut it out. I am in favor of cutting it out as was expressed by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] in his amendment, but if it is the sense of the committee to leave it in let us make it mean something. And I offer the ₱1 000 amendment in order to get the expression of the committee and see if that is the amount of the property qualification which they think ought to be inserted.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I do not think, in the first place, that the gentleman has carefully considered the wording of his amendment. I do not think if he had he would want it adopted in its present form, even if the House were inclined to do it. It would read:

Who does not own in his individual right property, real or personal, in the sum of ₱1,000.

Mr. MILLER. "Of the value of ₱1,000."

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman says he wishes somebody to explain why this requirement was put in the bill, and I desire to make this statement: It is a fact, which may not be known to all the Members of the House, that persons who own property in the Philippine Islands of less value than ₱500 are not taxed at all.

It was originally intended to have this language read something like this, "and who does not own in his individual right taxable property, real or personal." Had that language been used, no one owning property of less value than $250 could have been eligible to the senate. So that the committee, not desiring to fix the property qualification that high, and deeming it right that a senator should own some property, so provided.

The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER] says that nearly everybody owns something——

Mr. MILLER. I said everybody owns something.

Mr. JONES. Everybody owns something. I do not understand that this means merely the shirt on a man's back. It means that he should have some property, personal or real.

Mr. COOPER. Suppose he owns a silver watch?

Mr. JONES. Well, if he owned a silver watch, it would be taxable, if any personal property were taxable, and therefore I think he would be entitled to be elected. [Laughter.]

I am opposed to the gentleman's amendment. I would much sooner have voted to strike out the language in the bill than for the gentleman's amendment fixing a property qualification of a thousand pesos, and I question the consistency of a gentleman who, having voted against any property qualification, would now fix one as high as ₱1,000. Such a property qualification as that would exclude from election to the senate many educated, cultured, and really able Filipinos.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES. I will.

Mr. MILLER. If I get permission to withdraw my amendment, will the gentleman ask to reconsider the vote by which Mr. TOWNER's amendment was lost?

Mr. JONES. I will not. The gentleman has offered an amendment that he can not consistently vote for himself, and he can not make terms such as he proposes with me under the circumstances. If the gentleman was honestly in favor of the amendment offered by him, I might agree to his proposition.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, the American Congress ought not to establish a property qualification for the holding of office in the Philippines. [Applause.]

All of the Members of the House are familiar with the struggle that took place in the convention which drafted our Constitution over the question whether there should be a property qualification for membership in the Senate of the United States. Some members of the convention urgently insisted that the Senate be made an aristocratic body and that the Constitution require that every man aspiring to a senatorship must be possessed of a specified amount of property. But that qualification was voted out of the Federal Constitution, and the wisdom of the great convention in voting it out has been amply proven through all the country's subsequent history.

For centuries Europe has been cursed by degrading distinctions of caste based upon inherited titles, ranks, and honors. Here we have no such distinctions of caste, and God forbid that we should ever have class distinctions meaner and more contemptible based upon property. [Applause.] And yet this is exactly in principle what it is proposed to establish in the Philippines.

We can leave the election of their senators to the judgment of the Filipino people.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER. Yes.

Mr. JONES. I wanted to ask the gentleman if he was not aware of the fact that the amendment now pending provides for the qualification of a thousand pesos, and that there is no amendment before the committee as to a property qualification?

Mr. COOPER. I move by way of amendment to strike out the last word.

Twelve years ago, when this subject was new and the Philippine Islands were the "paramount issue" in American politics, when we knew very little about conditions over there, we did put in one property qualification. We were taking a first and vastly important step and taking it very carefully. We put it in the organic act because of our desire to have them conservative in the election of the new Philippine Assembly.

The Filipino people have been reasonably successful in electing good men to the assembly, and I believe that they will do equally well in electing men to the new Philippine Senate. In my judgment, it would convey an exceedingly bad impression in the islands for us to send there an enactment of the Congress of the United States requiring this property qualification, when the very foundation principle of our political system is the equality of all men, rich or poor, before the law.

Mr. JONES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER. I do.

Mr. JONES. I want to call the attention of the gentleman to a statement he made which I do not think is correct, and I want to give him the opportunity to correct it; that is the statement that the organic law provided for a property qualification. I do not really think it did.

Mr. COOPER. It was in the alternative. A man had to be able to read or write in the English or Spanish language, or he had to pay taxes of $15 in gold——

Mr. JONES. Was that in the organic law, or was that in the act of the Philippine Legislature?

Mr. COOPER. We adopted it in the organic act. It was practically the Spanish law.

Mr. JONES. I do not think it was in the organic act. That is what I want to call to the attention of the gentleman.

Mr. COOPER. During the debate 12 years ago I was interrupted by Mr. Hill, of Connecticut, who asked me to state the qualifications, and here is what I said:

> The existing law in regard to municipal electors applies. The elector must be 23 years of age. He must be able to speak, read, and write either the Spanish or the English language, or have held an office under the Spanish administration, or pay a tax amounting to $15 in gold, equivalent to ₱30, or own real property of the gold value of $250.

Mr. JONES. That applies to the elective franchise and not to the holding of office. That is the suffrage qualification.

Mr. COOPER. That is the suffrage; yes.

Mr. JONES. Not the qualification for office.

Mr. COOPER. That is what I meant. It is the only property qualification in the organic act. It is in the alternative and was inserted for the reason I have given. It related to the electors.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I rise to oppose the amendment of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER]. I do not think we ought to establish in this bill a property qualification for holding office. I do not think the gentleman is entirely in earnest——

Mr. MILLER. Did the gentleman vote in favor of the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER]?

Mr. BORLAND. I was just about to say that I am not sure but that those words ought to have gone out. If the original intention of the committee had been that only those shall be qualified for memebership in the Senate who own property not exempt from taxation, if those words had been put in there, they would have had a definite meaning; but those words, "not exempt from taxation," being left out, the phrase as it now stands has no meaning. I am not at all clear but that it ought to come out, because it simply introduces an element of confusion there by making those people think there is some property qualification when, in fact, there is none. I do not believe in a property qualification. We have tried it in all the great municipalities of this country. We have provided that a man must be a freeholder. Now, a man who is defined in any city charter as a freeholder must be an owner of property in the city; but it is easy enough to qualify a man for councilman by deeding to him under a tax title a lot down in a gully somewhere. I have never known it to fail that if a man could get the nomination for councilman he could get a tax-title deed to some duck pond somewhere inside of the city limits, and it amounted to nothing as a protection against the invasion of property rights by hasty legislation or the imposition of ill-advised taxes, which was the reason given for imposing the qualification of a freeholder.

Now, it seems to me that after mature consideration perhaps the committee may say that these words "who does not own in his individual right property, real or personal, situated in the Philippines," are without force and effect and unnecessary to the principle which is carried out in this bill, and is not a principle upon which our own municipalities and States are governed.

Mr. TOWNER. I will say to the gentleman from Missouri that I shall move to strike out the same words in the succeeding sections, and I hope after this illuminating discussion that it may carry, and then that we may reconsider the vote on the other amendment.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I am going to suggest this to the gentleman from Iowa, who is a member of the committee, that it is getting toward the close of the day, and if the committee takes the matter up at a future date they may be able to come to some amendment that will be acceptable to the House.

Mr. STAFFORD. If the gentleman will yield to me, I would like to ask the chairman of the committee what time he proposes to rise?

Mr. JONES. I would like to dispose of this amendment. I do not know whether or not the gentleman from Minnesota is going to withdraw his amendment, but if he does not, I would like to have a vote on it.

Mr. BORLAND. I will ask the gentleman from Virginia if he will not consent to return to the amendment which was voted upon, offered by the gentleman from Iowa, to strike out the words requiring a property qualification for a senator.

Mr. JONES. That has been voted down.

Mr. BORLAND. I know; but I am asking to return to it and have another vote.

Mr. JONES. To reconsider that vote?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes.

Mr. TOWNER. That can be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. JONES. It can not be done in any other way.

Mr. STAFFORD. I hardly think the Members on the other side appreciated the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that this section be passed without prejudice, so that an amendment may be offered without a point of order being made. I move to reconsider the vote whereby the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] was voted down.

Mr. JONES. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER] is pending, and it must be first voted upon.

Mr. MILLER. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, to withdraw that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent to withdraw his amendment. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri moves to reconsider the vote by which the committee voted down the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER].

Mr. MOORE. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Chairman. I would like to know how the gentleman from Missouri voted.

Mr. BORLAND. I voted in the affirmative, and I have a right to move to reconsider.

Mr. STAFFORD. A point of order, Mr. Chairman. I do not think a motion to reconsider under our rules is recognized in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. JONES. I wanted to make that point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. JONES. The gentleman can make his request to-morrow for unanimous consent to reconsider the vote, and he can do it as well then as to-day. We can pass over the paragraph, and it will not make any difference.

Mr. STAFFORD. Why not submit the request now?

Mr. BORLAND Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the vote by which the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] was defeated be reconsidered.

Mr. CANTOR. Mr. Chairman, can not we have that amendment reported again?

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 10, line 20, after the word "election," strike out the following language: "and who does not own in his individual right property, real or personal, situated in the Philippines."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent that the vote by which the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa was defeated be reconsidered. Is there objection?

Mr. JONES. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman, I suggested to my friend that he make this request to-morrow. I am sorry that he has insisted upon making it this evening, because it could be done as well to-morrow as now; but, inasmuch as the gentleman insists, I am not going to make any objection.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. TOWNER. Now, will the gentleman from Virginia move that the committee rise?

Mr. JONES. No; I am going to ask that the gentleman make his motion and take a vote on it, and then we will rise.

Mr. TOWNER. Very well; I will offer the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JONES. Now, Mr. Chairman, if the Clerk will read the next section, I will move that the committee rise.

Mr. TOWNER. I will say to the gentleman that I have the same amendment to the next section.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 14. That the members of the house of representatives shall, except as herein provided, be elected quadrennially by the qualified electors of the Philippines. Each of the representative districts hereinafter provided for shall have the right to elect one representative. No person shall be an elective member of the house of representatives who is not a qualified elector and over 25 years of age, and who is not able to read and write either the Spanish or English language, and who does not own in his individual right property, real or personal, situate in the Philippines, and who has not been a bona fide resident of the district from which elected for at least one year prior to his election.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. FLOOD of Virginia, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 18459, the Philippine bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. BOOHER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, is this upon the subject of cotton?

Mr. BOOHER. No.

Mr. MOORE. I understand it is on the subject of the Grand Army?

Mr. BOOHER. Yes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. I object.

Mr. BEAKES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD upon the subject of the work of the Sixty-third Congress.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, in view of what the gentleman from Missouri stated, which I did not fully understand, I shall withdraw my objection to his request.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BEAKES].

There was no objection.

Mr. BOOHER. Mr. Speaker, I renew my request to extend my remarks, as the gentleman from Wisconsin has withdrawn his objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BOOHER] to extend his remarks in the RECORD?

Mr. PAYNE. Upon what subject?

Mr. PAYNE. I have no objection to that.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CURRY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the subject of the ship-registry bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CASEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD upon the bill H. R. 19115, providing for the erection of a monument on the Wyoming battle ground, in Pennsylvania.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, in view of all these unanimous-consent requests having been granted, I ask unanimous consent that I be allowed to print in the RECORD a short bill of five sections, very brief, in regard to the cotton situation.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to print in the RECORD a bill of five short sections on the subject of cotton. Is there objection?

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I object.

SENATE.

SATURDAY, October 10, 1914.

(Legislative day of Thursday, October 8, 1914.)

The Senate reassembled at 11 o'clock a. m., on the expiration of the recess.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask unanimous consent to introduce a bill out of order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. SMOOT:

A bill (S. 6623) in relation to the location, entry, and patenting of lands within the former Uncompahgre Indian Reservation, in the State of Utah, containing gilsonite or other like substances, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Public Lands.

By Mr. POMERENE:

A bill (S. 6624) empowering and directing the Secretary of the Treasury to convey by quitclaim deed certain lands in the city of Akron, State of Ohio; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

A bill (S. 6625) granting a pension to Caroline Dufner (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

A bill (S. 6627) to establish and disburse a public-school teachers' retirement fund in the District of Columbia; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

AMERICAN VESSELS AND WATCH OFFICERS.

Mr. JONES. I have a Senate resolution that I think will cause no discussion. I ask unanimous consent to present it, and I ask for its immediate consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the resolution.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 467), as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of Commerce be requested to furnish to the Senate the following information:

1. How many Americans were shown by reports from the various customs districts to be available for watch officers, including masters, mates, and engineers, when the order suspending the requirements of the navigation laws relating thereto for a period of seven years was issued.

2. Copies of letters and communications on file with the department relating to the supply of Americans available for watch officers on ships admitted to American registry.

3. A list of the vessels admitted to American registry under the emergency act with a statement as to where and when built, by whom owned, what flag heretofore flying, and the number of American vessels and watch officers employed.

Mr. FLETCHER. I think the resolution ought to go to some committee. I do not know fully the scope of it.

Mr. JONES. I will state that it simply calls for information that is in the department.

Mr. FLETCHER. I understand; but it calls for a lot of correspondence and other information, and I think it ought to go to the Committee on Commerce or to some committee, and should not be agreed to in this way.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. FLETCHER. I object to its present consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will have to go over.

MEMORIAL TO THE LATE SENATOR JOHN T. MORGAN.

Mr. FLETCHER. I introduce a joint resolution, which I ask may be referred to the Committee on Interoceanic Canals.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 196) to authorize the Secretary of War to grant permission to the Southern Commercial Congress to place a tablet at Gamboa, Canal Zone, as a memorial to the late Senator John T. Morgan, was read twice by its title and, with accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Interoceanic Canals.

Mr. FLETCHER. In connection with the joint resolution I present a letter which I have received from Dr. Clarence J. Owens, managing director of the Southern Commercial Congress, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD and referred, with the joint resolution, to the Committee on Interoceanic Canals.

There being no objection, the letter was referred to the Committee on Interoceanic Canals and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE SOUTHERN COMMERCIAL CONGRESS,
Washington, D. C., October 8, 1914.

Hon. DUNCAN U. FLETCHER,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR FLETCHER: On yesterday I took up with Secretary Garrison the question of placing the memorial tablet to the late Senator John T. Morgan in the Canal Zone. You will recall that upon the adjournment of the Mobile congress I conducted a party to the Republic of Panama and the Canal Zone. Upon arrival in Panama City we were received by Col. Goethals, and he detailed Col. Hodges to join with me in the selection of a site, and I had in charge the dedicatory exercises that were participated in by Minister Price, Gov. Metcalf, and others in the presence of Col. Hodges.

Secretary Garrison takes the position now that the tablet can not be placed in the Canal Zone unless Congress orders it done. I am of the opinion that the Senate and House will gladly approve this matter, as it will be a tribute to a distinguished statesman who served in the legislative branch of the Federal Government for so many years.

I beg to suggest, therefore, that a joint resolution be prepared and submitted, in order that we may secure early action, making possible the placing of this memorial at Gamboa, as has been announced by our organization.

Sincerely,

CLARENCE J. OWENS,
Managing Director.

SENATOR GEORGE E. CHAMBERLAIN—LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. KERN. Mr. President, I ask that the senior Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] be excused from further attendance during the session. The Senator from Oregon has been in constant attendance upon the Senate since April of last year. While other Senators have had brief vacations from time to time the senior Senator from Oregon has remained steadfastly at his post.

As caucus chairman of the majority, I urged him two weeks ago to return to his home State to look after his affairs there, but he declined, saying that he could not see his way clear to subordinate public interests to his own personal or political interests. But now that the labors of the session are practically over and the end is in sight, there is no reason why he should neglect his interests further. I know his fellow Senators on both sides of the Chamber, in token of their personal regard and in appreciation of his faithful service, will be glad to agree to this request.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Senator from Oregon is excused from further attendance on the Senate during the present session.

ALASKA COAL LANDS.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the conference report on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses upon the bill (H. R. 14233) to provide for the leasing of coal lands in the Territory of Alaska, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is, Shall the point of order be sustained?

Mr. LANE. Mr. President, before the question is put I wish to say a few words. I will not detain the Senate long.

This provision, in my opinion, is far-reaching in its effect on the coal-mining industry of Alaska. Under it the Secretary of the Interior, who is the Government's agent, is forbidden from having anything to do either with the operation of the mines or the working of them or with the products therefrom until he arrives at the end of a lawsuit.

Under the terms of this report the lessee can operate his mine under the most onerous conditions, and unfair conditions relating to the employment of labor. He can bring about a condition which is identical with that which has existed in other coal-mining districts in this country, of which we have heard so much of evil in the recent past. He can have gunmen on his lands; he can do anything which he pleases with his employees. He can fail to ventilate the mine; he can operate it under conditions which are absolutely dangerous, for the reason that this clause, in my opinion, controls every other provision in the bill preceding it. It is the keystone which will control the operation of those mines under this law.

I would like to have the Senate know exactly what they are doing, or at least what I think they are doing, if they pass this provision. The lessee can hold his coal for the highest price; he can keep it out of the market; he can sell it to the warships of a power at war with this country if he wants to do so.

The Government agent is forbidden to have a word to say about it, and when you forbid him you forbid this Nation. There is not only a bar forever upon the Government taking proceedings against the lessee, if it does not act in 90 days after it gives notice, but there is also a bar upon the Government from doing anything else. Unless it was carefully designed for the purpose of compelling the Government and the people of this country to keep their hands off and to allow the private owner to run the mine in any manner he wants to run it, I do not see why it was put in. It has that effect.

If I were the lessee of a coal mine in Alaska and wanted to operate it at my own sweet will and make the most out of it, gut it and rob the labor and do anything else I wanted to, without interference or supervision, I would like to have this provision remain in the bill. If, on the other hand, I was representing the Government and wanted the mine operated properly and the products from it handled in a manner which would be beneficial to the community and to the people at large as well, and at the same time do justice to the owner thereof, it is the identical kind of a provision that I would keep out of the bill if I could. Here is the Government tied to leases of its own land under a law which forbids it from taking any action for the relief of conditions which may be against the interests of the people of this country. It compels the Government to give 90 days' notice, but if it does not go into court within 90 days and make good, the Government and the people are forever debarred from further action. On the other hand, the lessee of the mine has unlimited time granted him. The short end of the rope is given to the Government and the people of this country who own the land, and one of whose resources it is.

Under another section of the bill any man may take up as much as 5,000 acres under a lease. The Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] informed us a few days ago, when the bill was before the Senate, that in one of those fields, I think it was the Matanuska, there are not over 15,000 acres of good coal land. Two lessees could go out under this act, under another provision, however, and secure all the land except what is reserved by the Government. You may depend upon it the Government will not get the best of the coal land. If anyone thinks the Government is going to get the best of the coal lands when it comes to locating it, I think he will find he is mistaken. That land is pretty well known now. It has been prospected and looked over with careful eyes by experts, and the best of it will be leased. They are allowed to take as much as 5,000 acres, and two or three men can cover, we will say, a field of 10,000 acres and control the coal situation in Alaska.

These leases will not be for the benefit of the people of Alaska if this provision is left in the bill. They must depend on the Secretary of the Interior as the agent of this Government, and he is not allowed to have anything to do with it or to say about it. You give him 90 days if he wants to file a notice in which to begin a court proceeding. I have seen a notice improperly written where a man rode day and night in order to "stake" it on a claim, and for the reason that he did not have it properly worded he lost his claim. It is very easy to make a mistake in a notice. Many good attorneys do not know how to write them properly. Anyone who has had experience in a mining country knows that. The Government is forever barred from rectifying any mistake which its agents may make, whereas the person who owns the lease has time without end in his favor to hold and operate it under conditions which the Secretary of the Interior and the Government of the United States are forbidden to question or even ascertain. He is forbidden to interfere in any way. If he goes around to look into the conditions, that is interference. If he takes the time of the employees to ride him up and down the shaft or enters a drift to examine the mine, he is in the way, and he is interfering with the operation of the mine, and they can oust him under this clause.

I hope the Senate will not adopt this report without knowing exactly what it is doing. In my opinion, this nullifies every good provision in the bill. I do not know how far these lands have been looked over now or how ready prospectors are to take them up. They are not asleep in Alaska. The people who go to Alaska are good, live, healthy men and women. They are not the kind of people who stay around a hot stove or care much whether they are comfortable or not. They put on snowshoes and go out in the storms of winter to stake mines. They go long distances and undergo terrific hardships for prospective profit.

This provision is not for the benefit of Alaska. I wish the Senate could understand this provision and know it from their experience, and could realize what can be done under it by a lessee who is a bit avaricious. Then you would know just how little influence over these coal lands Uncle Sam is to have. We have an example of what is done under the leasing system to a numerous class of people in this country. Under this law we will have labor wars in Alaska, and there will be the same old contention between the man who works and the employer, with all remedy denied. The lessee has given into his hands the right to forbid the Government even in the last extremity from interfering with his manner of handling the mines.

I do not know that my point of order will be sustained. I had hoped that the Senate might rule out this provision by a point of order. My opinion is that it has been put in here gratuitously. If we can not throw it out, we ought to send this report back to conference for the conferees to do so. We ought to reject it without prejudice and with all due respect to the conferees and have this change made.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, it seems to me that this is a very important matter. The question of Alaska coal lands has been discussed for a great many years. There has been a good deal of scandal in connection with it. From what Senators familiar with the situation there say it seems that by some ingenious language that has been woven into this bill in conference the selfish interests are to be given an opportunity that they have sought for years and which up to this time has been denied them. I think we ought to have at least a quorum of the Senate present when it is being discussed, and I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. So, in accordance with the ruling of the Chair heretofore made, the report of the committee of conference is rereferred to the committee of conference.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, during the three years and a half that I have served in the Senate this is the first and only time I have ever heard that point raised. There were columns of new matter put in the Clayton antitrust bill. If the point of order had been raised as to that bill, and the same ruling had, it would have been shot all to pieces, and there would not have been enough of it left to light a cigarette with.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I voted with the Senator, but I think he is mistaken about that.

Mr. MYERS. Senators who sit here and vote to throw out of this Congress one of the most important administration measures that the administration has asked this Congress to pass sat here and voted to put through the Clayton antitrust bill with columns of new matter written into it by the conferees that had never been heard of in either branch of Congress.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator is mistaken about that. I think if he will examine the bill he will see that there is nothing new in the bill.

Mr. MYERS. I take the word of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], who said that in section after section the teeth had been drawn out of that bill.

Mr. OVERMAN. What the Senator from Missouri was talking about was the penalties.

Mr. MYERS. Yes.

Mr. OVERMAN. They were in the House bill and not in the Senate bill. Therefore they were in conference. I voted with the Senator from Montana, but he is mistaken when he says that there was new matter put in that bill that was not in either the House or the Senate bill.

Mr. MYERS. I am told that there were penalties voted by both the House and the Senate which were drawn out by the conferees, and that where a penalty was put in the conferees said it should be unlawful. The Senator from Missouri, I think, made that statement.

Mr. OVERMAN. Before the Senator from Montana makes that statement he had better read the bill himself.

Mr. MYERS. I have been informed by one of the conferees that there was new matter put into that bill by the conferees. Senators who have raised the cry of distress and the danger signal that the Republic is going on the shoals and is going to be wrecked by the work of the conferees on this Alaskan coal bill sat here and voted for the Clayton antitrust bill, when I am informed and am sure that there was new matter written into it. I do not see why Senators who have raised the cry of distress and hoisted the danger signal that the Republic is going to be pulled down and is going into anarchy and chaos and onto the shoals on account of the action of this conference committee were satisfied to sit here and vote for the Clayton antitrust measure with new matter in it. I dare say there has hardly been an important measure which has been the subject of long, drawn-out controversy between the House and Senate in many years—certainly not since I have been here—where the conferees did not change the verbiage of sections to some extent. This is the first time and the only time since I have been in the Senate that I have heard that rule invoked.

I spoke of this matter in our conference. I said: "Are we not writing new matter in here, in letter, at least, and is it not contrary to the rules of the Senate?" The other conferees replied: "Why, that is always done, more or less. No bill is ever reported out of conference in the exact verbiage in which every section passed the House or the Senate," and they went ahead. We reported something here that we thought was in substantial compliance with the rules, and in accordance with the substance of the bill as it passed either the House or the Senate.

This is the first time I have ever heard the question raised since I have been in the Senate. I am satisfied that it is done right along; and yet we have Senators here, Democratic Senators, voting to sustain this point of order, who have taken no cognizance of such things in other conference reports. By the votes of Democratic Senators one of the most important administration measures of this Congress has been wrecked and relegated; and I want to say now that there will be no Alaskan coal bill at this session of Congress.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I think that might be a blessing.

Mr. MYERS. I think some of the other Senators who voted with the Senator from New Jersey to sustain this point of order are of the same opinion, and doubtless voted on the point of order on that ground.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I voted as I did on the point of order because I felt that it was entirely new business, not business sent to the conference committee by the House and Senate; and further than that, I voted as I did because it was a prop helping along my proposition, which I trust some day will be adopted, of Government ownership. I am opposed to the whole policy of this bill. I oppose it earnestly and honestly. I appreciate the Senator's position, but I believe this is a most pernicious and dangerous measure.

Mr. SIMMONS. A point of order, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from North Carolina will state it.

Mr. SIMMONS. I ask what is before the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The last the Chair observed there were three Senators on the floor.

Mr. MYERS. I have the floor.

Mr. SIMMONS. I make a point of order, Mr. President. I call for the regular order.

Mr. MYERS. There is no such point of order. I have never heard of that being invoked before since I came here.

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not want to interfere with the Senator from Montana, and I will not; but if this matter is going to arouse a joint discussion here, I shall have to make the point of order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is absolutely nothing before the Senate.

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not wish to interfere with the Senator from Montana.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Montana has a perfect right to proceed unless some Senator interrupts him and he yields.

Mr. SIMMONS. I shall not make the point of order until the Senator from Montana has concluded, and I will then renew it.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. MYERS. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I have no special interest in the present controversy, but as I entered the Chamber a question was raised as to a certain statement I was alleged to have made in reference to the Clayton antitrust bill. I therefore desire to say that the conferees on that bill did add new matter to the bill.

Mr. MYERS. Did not the Senator say the conferees had drawn the teeth out of the bill as it passed both the Senate and House?

Mr. REED. I say they did add new matter, and that is what I am now discussing.

Mr. MYERS. Go ahead. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. REED. They added to section 2 these words:

Where the effect of such discrimination may be to substantially lessen competition or tend to create a monopoly in any line of commerce.

They also added these words in the same section:

In bona fide transactions and not in restraint of trade.

They also added these words:

Or discrimination in price in the same or different communities made in good faith to meet competition.

The first one of those amendments to which I called attention very radically changed the meaning of the section. I do not intend to stop to discuss the effect, because I did that in some speeches which were very much prolonged.

In section 3, which relates to tying contracts, they substituted the House section for the Senate substitute. They took out of the House section the criminal penalty which had been attached to the Senate substitute, which was originally in the House provision, and added this entirely new language:

Where the effect of such lease, sale, or contract for sale or such condition, agreement, or understanding may be to substantially lessen competition or tend to create a monopoly in any line of commerce.

Those words are of great import and very radically change the meaning of the section.

In section 7 of the bill they inserted in two places the words "or to restrain such commerce in any section or community." I do not think, however, that that amendment impaired the bill.

There are several other additions which were made in the conference. Especially I call attention to section 5, which relates to the introduction of the decrees of the court in trust cases rendered in favor of the Government. That section as it came from the House read:

That whenever in any suit or proceeding in equity hereafter brought by or on behalf of the United States under any of the antitrust laws there shall have been rendered a final judgment—

And so forth.

The decree shall be used in evidence. The Senate changed that section so that it provided that when the judgment shall have been heretofore or hereafter obtained it can be used in evidence. The conferees struck out the word "heretofore," thus leaving the section in substance and effect as it was originally in the House, but they added this entirely new matter relating to future judgments:

Provided, That this section shall not apply to consent judgments or decrees entered before any testimony has been taken: Provided further, That this section shall not apply to consent judgments or decrees rendered in criminal proceedings or suits in equity now pending in which the taking of testimony has been commenced but has not been concluded, provided such judgments or decrees are rendered before any further testimony is taken.

Mr. President, I could cite some more instances. I could have made a point of order against the report at the time it was here, but it was my opinion that the temper of the Senate just then was not to listen very much to discussion upon the bill. Possibly I had worn out the good nature of the Senate by my long persistence. But the statement that the conferees did not put new matter into the bill can not be sustained.

Mr. OVERMAN. Will the Senator from Montana yield to me?

Mr. MYERS. I yield to the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. OVERMAN. I have no wish to enter into a debate with the Senator from Missouri on the Clayton bill. I want to say to the Senator, and this is what I rose to say, that I did think he and his committee did their part, and I so voted.

Mr. MYERS. I know how the Senator voted.

Mr. OVERMAN. I think it was different with the Clayton antitrust bill, because all those matters were in conference.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President——

Mr. MYERS. I yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I wish to say that I agree with the Senator from Montana that a great many bills have been brought in by conferees and passed which were just as objectionable as this.

Mr. MYERS. I said that yesterday.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The Senator is right about that; but if we have permitted it in other cases, that is no reason why we should fail to stop it when the objection is made.

If the Senator will pardon me, just one word more. I wish to make this suggestion: I hope he will not take it in any sense as a reflection upon him that I voted to sustain the point of order. I would not cast a vote in the Senate that in any way would reflect upon him. He knows how I feel toward him.

Mr. MYERS. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Now, I wish to make this suggestion: If the conferees would take this bill again and restore to it one of those two little paragraphs at the close of section 12 of the House bill or 14 of the Senate bill and let section 15 go out and let this proviso go out, I believe the report would go through the Senate instantly.

Mr. MYERS. There will be no Alaskan coal-land bill reported back at this session of Congress.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. MYERS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator has said several times that there would be no Alaskan coal bill unless this particular clause is left in. That accentuates the fact that this particular clause ought to be taken out. The Senator, in my judgment, ought to let this matter go back to conference, and he can have this provision eliminated and in two hours bring it back here. It is not necessary that this bill die unless there are those who think more of this obnoxious section than of the entire bill.

Mr. MYERS. Two of the House conferees have left Washington and will not return at this session.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The House can appoint two additional conferees.

Mr. MYERS. That would open up the entire subject. I doubt if we could agree at this session.

Mr. BORAH. If two of the House conferees have left Washington, then that is the reason why this bill can not pass, and not by reason of the fact that this clause has been taken out. But are there not other parties in the House? I apprehend others could be selected as conferees who might be able to serve in that capacity. I would suggest to the Senator from Montana that it would expedite the matter if he would undertake to get this out of the bill rather than to undertake to reconsider it here.

Mr. MYERS. As I stated, two of the House conferees left Washington on the last day the conferees sat. They said at 2 o'clock in the afternoon there must be an agreement that afternoon or there would be no report at this session; and we yielded some things, where we could do so conscientiously, in order to make a report.

I have not a particle of doubt on earth that if the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] had made the same point of order against the Clayton antitrust bill it would have been voted down by a large majority and probably by some Senators who voted to sustain this point of order. I think he was wise in not making the point of order. I have never heard that point of order made in the Senate since I have been here. I know that the practice is followed which was followed in this case almost universally, and in many cases to a far greater extent than it was followed in this case. If these conferees have trespassed a teaspoonful, other conferees have trespassed a bushel basketful. As violent as the fight was over the report on the Clayton antitrust bill, as violent and as earnest and as ceaseless, and I will say as valiantly as the Senator from Missouri fought that report, he never raised the point of order that there was new matter inserted in it. He knew that it was the universal custom that you can not rewrite, revise, and amend to suit all parties interested without to some extent vitally changing the verbiage. According to the rule laid down here, if you change "the" to "a," if you change an article that did not pass the House and the Senate, you have transgressed the rule.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Will the Senator let me interrupt him?

Mr. MYERS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I ask the Senator if, in his opinion, after the conferees have sat as long as they did in this case——

Mr. MYERS. Five days.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. When the House conferees have gone on and taken up every item in the bill in disagreement, fighting it out, could two new conferees come to a conclusion any more quickly than they did? With less experienced Members on this particular bill being called into the conference over it, opening the whole case anew, what hope does the Senator think there would be of passing this conference report if we should finally conclude on that course?

Mr. MYERS. None whatever. The chance is that at the next conference you would get two House conferees who are utterly opposed to the leasing system.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. May I ask the Senator from Arizona a question?

Mr. MYERS. The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] rose, and I will yield to him and then to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to say to the Senator from Montana that it does not look to me now as though the probability of the passage of this bill is entirely foreclosed. I voted with the Senator——

Mr. MYERS. I know the Senator did.

Mr. NORRIS. I believed the point of order was not well taken. I did not agree with the majority in that vote. I thought that the conferees had not overstepped their rights.

Mr. MYERS. I do not believe the majority of the Senators thought that way. Senators came in here and voted without knowing what was being voted upon.

Mr. NORRIS. I did not like the proviso which it was claimed was put in wrongfully, and I would a great deal rather that it had been out. I think the bill would have been vastly improved if it had been taken out. I understand that proviso which has brought about this division here was put in in lieu of section 15. In other words, the House members of the conference committee were opposed to section 15. I am glad they were. I am glad it was taken out. But this proviso was put in to placate them or, rather, to placate the Senate conferees because section 15 went out. If the Senate conferees were willing to leave out the proviso that went in instead of section 15, which the House conferees objected to, it seems to me it would be an easy matter for the House conferees at once to agree to the report, and then it could be back here, just as it is now, with the objectionable proviso eliminated.

Mr. MYERS. Two of the House conferees have left the city.

Mr. NORRIS. One of them is still here, and that conferee will be able to tell the new conferees from the House just exactly the situation. If two conferees are absent, the House undoubtedly will appoint two Members in their places.

Mr. MYERS. The two new conferees from the House would not confine themselves to this one question. That would open up the entire bill.

Mr. NORRIS. They might not; but inasmuch as it was the only matter in dispute, and inasmuch as it was put in in lieu of section 15, which the House conferees objected to, and now the Senate is willing to take this course, it seems to me the Senate is in full concurrence with the House conferees and we can have the bill brought back here with an agreement. I hope the Senator will not take the view that we can not have legislation on the subject at this session. I believe that the provisions that were taken out in conference vastly improved the bill. Some of the provisions in the bill as it passed the Senate, it seemed to me, were objectionable and would have given rise perhaps to the famous Cunningham claims being resurrected and perhaps substantiated. That and similar provisions were eliminated and the bill made a good bill, in my judgment. It seems to me the only objection to it is the proviso that seems to have given rise to all this dispute. I believe the Senator goes too far when he says we can not have a bill. I think he ought to go on the theory that by the elimination of this proviso the conference report will pass the Senate in a few moments and that there will be no difficulty in getting two conferees of the House to agree to that proposition.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Let me make this suggestion: The clause at the close of section 12 of the House bill or section 14 of the Senate bill was stricken from each. Some of us insist the two clauses are practically the same, and therefore they can not be the subject of conference and both could not be stricken out.

Mr. NORRIS. I believe in that theory myself. The Senator is right; they could not properly have been thrown out; but so far as this proviso is concerned, it seems to me that it was within the power of the conferees to put it in, although that is decided now. The Senate has decided otherwise. There is only one thing now to do—to accept the decision of the Senate and go on and see if we can not pass the bill with that eliminated; and if we should pass it with this proviso eliminated, then the discussion that has taken place and the action of the Senate has not been in vain, because it will certainly improve the bill.

Mr. MYERS. I will say that, so far as I am concerned, there will not be a word changed, the article "a" or "and" will not be put into the conference report, if it did not pass one or the other branch of Congress. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. I only want to say I think it can not be contended for a moment that this proviso is in the interest of the public. It can not be contended that it is for the protection of the Government. If it is there for any purpose at all, it is to protect those whom the Government may think it has a charge against.

Mr. MYERS. My colleague [Mr. WALSH] claims as a legal phase in a very clear and explicit exposition of the matter that it does protect the Government and is in the interest of the Government, and I accept his legal construction of it.

Mr. BORAH. Then I take back the proposition that it can not be contended, and say, in my judgment, it can not be successfully contended that it protects the Government or that it protects the people. When we say here that the Government has a charge against a man and if the Government does not do a certain thing within 90 days, that man is forever relieved from that charge, it can hardly be successfully contended that it is in the interest of the public or the Government.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. That is, to give notice.

Mr. BORAH. I understand the matter. We are in this position here. We are told because that kind of a section is not to go into the bill the bill must die. You had better consider the other proposition also. If it does go in, what will happen to the bill?

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I wish to say in this connection, I never desired to be fulsome in regard to any Senator nor do I want any impression in the mind of the Senate that I have any personal feeling against the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH], or that anything I said can be taken as any stricture upon him. Every Senator has a right to his view. Some here know that I esteem the Senator from Georgia in the very highest sense and regard him as one of the kindest and most beneficial friends that I have had in this body, and I still so feel toward him.

I can understand how Senators who took the floor in the debate and contended that this was a violation of the rules of the Senate could and should vote that way, and I think there were other Senators who voted that way thoughtlessly, who had not given the matter the thought and the attention that it deserved. They came out of the cloakroom at the last minute and did not know what was being voted on when they came out and voted.

As I have said, so far as the warfare over the Clayton antitrust bill was concerned, no Senator made any such point of order. This is the first time I have ever known the point made. When a point of order of this kind is made—that new matter, which has never passed the House or the Senate has been inserted—Senators seem to lose sight of the fact that if both the House and the Senate adopt the report, then both branches of Congress will have passed the new matter. If you so modify it, that by adopting the report the new matter is passed in both branches——

Mr. OVERMAN. This new matter pertained to the subject matter that was in conference?

Mr. MYERS. Yes; it is only a little different in detail.

Mr. OVERMAN. If this rule is made to-day as to the Senate, there never can be any legislation.

Mr. MYERS. There never can be any legislation at all.

I want to say in conclusion that one of the chief measures of this administration has been defeated by this vote. It was a measure that was earnestly desired by President Wilson and by the Secretary of the Interior, Mr. Lane. Both of them gave it their absolute stamp of approval and commendation in the form in which it came before the Senate; both of them were very desirous that it be enacted into law at this session of Congress, and yet it has been defeated by Democratic votes.

It is a wonder to me that the Democrats in this body cling together as well as they do. It is a wonder to me there is as much cohesion among them as there is. There is more cohesion than I would expect.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Will the Senator yield to me for just a word?

Mr. MYERS. I will.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Now, when you say "Democrat" you refer to me.

Mr. MYERS. I am satisfied of that.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I claim to be as good a Democrat as there is now in this body or as ever sat here. This is not a political question; it is a great economic question.

Mr. MYERS. I never heard anyone doubt the Senator's Democracy, and I do not doubt it.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. You talk about clinging together. We will cling together for principle's sake; but in God's name, because a measure may be pressed by a Democratic Senator, does that imply that a Senator must give up his whole life ideas and his individuality? This is an economic question; it is not a political question at all.

Mr. MYERS. I yielded for a question.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Well, I feel that you have touched me.

Mr. MYERS. Evidently I have touched the Senator.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Yes; you have. You must not question my Democracy. However much I may disagree with many other members of my party in this body, every vote I have cast has been based on my conscience and on that which I believe would advance and accrue best to the interests of my fellow citizens. I will use all honorable means to maintain and sustain my party; but, by the eternal heavens, I will not grovel and sacrifice my convictions and my honest judgment for any party, by whatever name you may call it. When you tell me that this is an administration measure, and that hence I must stand by it, I repel and repudiate any such doctrine.

Mr. MYERS. I have not said that.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I myself believe in Government ownership of coal mines.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I refuse to yield any further.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I believe this is an object lesson to the American people, and I shall use every opportunity and every means to defeat such a proposition.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Montana has the floor.

Mr. MYERS. I have not said anything to the contrary of what the Senator has said. I do not think there are now very many people who expect the Senator from New Jersey to vote for many of the administration measures that come before this body.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. There is no reason to make that assertion either. I vote for every administration measure that on my conscience I believe is just and for the welfare of the country——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Jersey must maintain order.

Mr. MYERS. I have said nothing to the contrary of the Senator's statement.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I will not have that stuffed down my throat by anybody.

Mr. MYERS. I have not said anything to the contrary or tried to stuff anything down the Senator's throat.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. The Senator's assertion was uncalled for and unwarranted.

Mr. MYERS. Then I retract it, although I still have my private opinion about it.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Well, that is your privilege.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, it seems to me sometimes that there is a disposition on the Democratic side of the Chamber to drive Senators who stand most steadfastly by administration measures away from the camp. As I say, taking into consideration the statement I have made, the Democrats of this body show more cohesiveness and stand together better than I would anticipate. I am surprised they stand together as well as they do.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President——

Mr. MYERS. I yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. JONES. I do not want to interrupt the Senator's line of thought, but I presumed the Senator was through with that phase of the discussion, and so I wanted to suggest this: I really regret that the Senator from Montana takes the position that by reason of the action of the Senate there will be no Alaskan coal legislation at this session. I believe if the Senator will reflect he will change his mind with reference to that matter. I voted with the Senator on this proposition.

Mr. MYERS. I know the Senator did.

Mr. JONES. And on yesterday I stated that I did not think that any criticism should be made of the action the conferees have taken, and that they have simply followed the course of conferees heretofore. I believe if this matter were now sent to the House from the Senate with the request for a further conference, if that action is necessary, or with some notification, at any rate, to the House that the Senate had rejected the conference report and asked for a further conference, that without any delay whatever new conferees would be appointed. As has been suggested here, I think the conferees will be able to get together without very much trouble. This is apparently the only point especially in controversy, and while the Senator from Montana fears that the conferees on the part of the House might raise questions with reference to other provisions, I rather doubt that such will be the case.

The chairman of the House committee is still in the city, and I know that the views of the chairmen of committees have great weight with the other members of the committees and especially with the members of conference committees; but even if the other members could not be gotten back and new members are appointed upon the committee, I really do not believe that the Senator will have anything like the trouble that he anticipates in getting a report and bringing it into the Senate. I therefore appeal to the Senator—and I am just as anxious as he is about this legislation—to try that course. If he does so, I believe he will find that his bill will be enacted without very much trouble.

I wanted to make that suggestion because I am in hearty sympathy with the Senator; I am very earnestly in favor of this legislation and hope that we shall be able to get it through before the session is over. I feel satisfied that if that course is followed favorable action will be had. I think if the Senator will reflect a little he will also come to that conclusion.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I will state at this juncture, before I say anything further—and I am not going to say much more—that, of course, I very highly esteem the Senator from New Jersey; I know that he always votes conscientiously, and that nobody can question his Democracy. I make that statement while the Senator is out of the Chamber, as his modesty perhaps might forbid his being on the floor of the Senate when it was made.

The fact remains that, to my mind, this bill has been rejected by the Senate on what appears to me to be the barest technicality and triviality by invoking a dead-letter rule which I have never before known to be invoked. I take it that that is the temper of the Senate toward the bill, and if the Senate wants to register its view of the bill in that way, it is certainly its privilege to do so.

In response to the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] and others who have suggested this or that method of procedure and what is best to be done now, I have nothing more to say. The conference report is in the hands of the Senate and it can do with it what it pleases.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has decided that automatically the report goes back to the committee of conference.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Mr. President, I voted to sustain the point of order made against the conference report upon perfectly clear and justifiable grounds. I have been dissatisfied with the rule that was established in more recent days in the Senate, that conferees are at liberty to introduce independent, substantive matters that were not in dispute between the two Houses, and that objection by the Senate to such unauthorized action could only be taken by defeating the entire report on a formal vote upon its final adoption. Such action by conferees is prohibited by the practice in the House of Representatives, and a departure from the rule is the subject of a point of order which means that the objection being interposed in the form of a point of order will defeat the entire conference report by the judgment and ruling of the Speaker on the objection of the Member who chose to invoke it.

I believe that the change in the rule introduced in the Senate by one or two rulings that were made under peculiar party stress established a bad precedent and gave to conferees authority that it was never intended they should exercise. I think conferees should properly, in the exercise of their traditional powers, confine themselves to the matters in dispute between the two Houses, and that they ought not to exercise an independent judgment as to whether or not other matters—independent, distinct, and substantive propositions—should be incorporated in a bill as reported by them. For that reason I voted to reestablish the rule as it was originally and immemorially recognized.

So far as the present conference report being obnoxious to the rule is concerned, I accepted the judgment of the Chair, because, unless the Chair had decided as a preliminary question that there had been incorporated by the conferees independent, distinct, and substantive provisions that were not in dispute between the two Houses, he could not reasonably have submitted the point of order to the Senate. I assume that that question of fact had been determined by the Chair, and correctly determined. In the debate which ensued while I was present in the Senate it seemed to be conceded by all that that was the fact.

Mr. MYERS. Will the Senator yield to me for one word there?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I will be glad to yield to the Senator.

Mr. MYERS. I do not think the Senator was present when the Chair made the ruling. As I understand, the Chair merely held that the point of order might be made, and he submitted it to the Senate to determine whether or not it was well taken and whether or not the provision in the report was obnoxious to the rule.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I assumed that probably the Chair did not intend to submit the question in that broad and unguarded way; but I have stated what was my understanding of it.

So far as this particular conference report is concerned, I can not say that I have any decided objection to its adoption. For the reason that I am not very familiar with its details, I have accepted largely the judgment of Senators who assert that they have scrutinized it and have made a thorough examination of it, and I therefore felt justified in saving the trouble of doing the same thing over again for myself.

I want to establish a correct and workable rule on this subject; but in attempting to establish it I do not want to establish another rule that may amount to a barbarism, as we should do if we permit the Chair on every occasion to say, simply because a disputed proposition pending between the two Houses had been somewhat amplified or changed in phraseology by the conferees, that thereupon the whole conference report must fail on his single ruling. There is an extreme at either end of it that may on occasion lead to very great abuses; and I confine my assent to the rule now established by the Senate by its present vote to instances where it is practically undisputed that new, substantive, and independent propositions have been added by the conferees. If there is fair room to doubt that this has been done, then I think the conferees should be given the benefit of all doubts and be held to have exercised their discretion properly, and that the application of the rule which we have just established could not be rightfully made. I confine my assent to the rule that has just been established, and I justify the vote that I have given upon the proposition that the rule should only be applied where it is virtually undisputed that new provisions have been added and provisions that have not been in dispute between the two Houses.

So far as this particular conference report is concerned, since I have now come to make a little closer examination of it for myself, I find that there is room for saying that it is fairly doubtful whether or not this report is vulnerable to the objection which has been raised and decided adversely to its further consideration in its present form.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, in view of what has been said here with regard to this conference report, I want to make it clear that my vote was cast to sustain the point of order for two reasons.

In the first place, I believe the Chair was right in submitting it to the Senate. In my opinion he could have gone much further than that and could have sustained the point of order, and I believe the precedents will show that the decision would have been right; but I need not defend the position of the Chair.

In the second place, I believed the conference committee had exceeded their authority in striking out matters which had been agreed to both in the House and in the Senate and inserting new matters that had not been considered in either House.

I want to call attention to what transpired on the floor of the Senate two years ago, when the immigration bill was before this body. I did not raise the point of order against that conference report, but I then made a statement similar to that which I made on yesterday, only I made it more fully. The senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] was then, I believe, chairman of that committee. I made the statement that I believed the conferees had exceeded their authority, because new matter was injected into that conference report. We discussed the matter for a day and a half, and while I did not make the point of order, it was conceded by the Senate that the conference report was subject to a point of order, and it was sent back to conference.

For that reason, Mr. President, I voted as I did.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, may I make a parliamentary inquiry? That is all I wish to do.

I am entirely satisfied with the way the Senator from North Dakota voted on the point of order. As far as personality is concerned, I am satisfied that Senators may vote as they please. I only felt that there had been a difference of treatment of this report from other reports against which the same complaint might just as well have been lodged; that there had not been the same kind of treatment accorded this report as some other reports.

I now ask, What is the parliamentary status of the conference report?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has ruled that it automatically goes back to the conferees.

Mr. MYERS. Back to the conferees?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Yes. The Chair understands that the only question in dispute is the question of the new matter.

EMERGENCY REVENUE LEGISLATION.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 18891.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 18891) to increase the internal revenue, and for other purposes.

Mr. SIMMONS. I ask unanimous consent that the formal reading of the bill may be dispensed with.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I shall confine myself to a very brief statement, mostly in connection with the changes made by the committee in the House bill. Later I shall expect to discuss the bill more elaborately.

The bill before the Senate is framed along the lines of the act of 1898, and that act followed the lines of similar taxation during the Civil War. The report of Mr. Dingley, who was chairman of the ways and means committee of the House in 1898, in presenting the bill of that year to the House, speaking with reference to the objects upon which it imposed taxes, said:

> They are all taxes upon objects which were assessed during or subsequent to the Civil War with one exception, and therefore open up no new or untried systems of taxation.

Some of the objects upon which a tax was imposed in the act of 1898 are left out of the pending bill, but every object, except wines and rectified spirits, upon which this bill imposes a tax, was taxed in the act of 1898.

Some of the rates prescribed in his bill are lower upon some objects than the rates prescribed in the act of 1898 upon the same objects; but no rate in this bill except that upon pawnbrokers, is higher than the rate on the same object in the act of 1898.

The amount of revenue raised under the act of 1898 and the amount it is estimated will be raised under the proposed bill are practically the same. The additional revenue realized from the internal-revenue taxes of the act of 1898 was $105,374,227. It is estimated that under the present bill the additional revenue will be $107,001,400.

In presenting the Spanish-American War revenue act to the House in 1898, Mr. Dingley said:

> The war-revenue bill which has been reported provides for internal-revenue taxes exclusively. * * * These taxes have been selected, first, because we have the machinery for the collection of them now, and they can be collected with but slight additions to the force and with but slight increase of expense. We have selected them, also, because they were a source of revenue successfully seized upon during the Civil War, and because they are taxes either upon articles of voluntary consumption or upon objects where the tax will be paid by those who are ordinarily able to pay them; and we have refrained from putting a tax in a direction where it would be purely upon consumption, so that the consumer may regulate his own tax, following what is the accepted rule in all countries, with a view of imposing the least burden and disturbing the business of the country as little as possible.

From these statements of fact it appears:

First. That with two exceptions everything in this bill upon which a tax is imposed was embraced in the act of 1898.

Second. That the rates imposed in this bill are not higher, but lower, than those in the act of 1898.

Third. That the objects of taxation in both the act of 1898 and in the pending bill are objects upon which similar taxes were imposed during and subsequent to the Civil War.

Fourth. That the objects of taxation embraced in the act of 1898 were selected by the Ways and Means Committee, of which Mr. Dingley, the author of the bill, was chairman, because they could be collected in the main with the regular force of the Internal Revenue Bureau, and with but slight increase in expenses, and because they were taxes either upon articles of voluntary consumption or upon objects where the tax would be paid by those who were ordinarily able to pay them.

Under these conditions there would seem to be no grounds for partisan controversy as to the objects selected for taxation in the pending bill.

Mr. President, I will now proceed to briefly consider the more important changes from the House bill which the bill recommended by your committee proposes.

The first change of importance—and I shall not trouble the Senate with reference to the smaller changes—relates to the tax upon beer or fermented liquors. The Spanish-American War act imposed a tax of $2 a barrel upon beer. The present law imposes a tax of $1 a barrel upon beer. The House bill imposed a tax of $1.50 a barrel upon beer; that is, it increased the tax 50 cents. The Senate bill has still further increased that tax, and raised it to $1.75 a barrel, allowing a discount of 5 per cent.

The section of the House bill relating to wines has been rewritten and changed as follows:

First. To include liqueurs or compounds known or designated as wines, liqueurs, or cordials.

Second. To apply the tax to imported wines or cordials as well as to domestic wines.

Third. To reduce the rate of tax upon dry wines from 12 to 8 cents per gallon.

Fourth. That the tax shall be paid by the dealer instead of by the manufacturer, as provided in the House bill.

I should say to the Senate that your committee have had great difficulty with reference to this matter of taxing wines, and they have earnestly sought to equalize the conditions and circumstances under which wine is produced in different sections of the country.

Your committee is not altogether satisfied with the substitute for this section it has recommended, and it is probable before a vote is taken on the bill it may present a substitute for the one incorporated in the bill.

Referring to the substitute now in the bill for this section, it is only necessary that I should say the differentiation in the tax imposed upon sweet wines and dry wines is based upon the fact that sweet wines may contain not exceeding 24 per cent of absolute alcohol, 12½ per cent being usually added in the form of spirits. The spirits used for this purpose in a large part of the country is grape brandy, which, under certain conditions, is not subject to the usual tax of $1.10—in fact, pays no tax except 3 cents a gallon. Dry wines can not contain more than 14 per cent of absolute alcohol, and this is generated by fermentation from the natural sirup of the grape. It was thought the 12 cents differential would reasonably cover the tax which the brandy spirits used in the fermentation of sweet wines should pay.

The House bill carried no tax upon rectified spirits. After considerable discussion and consideration, your committee decided these manipulated spirits constituted a proper subject on which to impose some of the burden of this taxation, and they recommend that they be taxed at 5 cents per gallon.

The House bill imposes a tax of 2 cents per gallon on gasoline. Your committee, after most thorough consideration, decided to recommend its elimination.

The House bill imposes a tax of $2 for each thousand dollars of capital and surplus upon bankers. Your committee thought a tax upon banks an entirely proper tax, but it thought $2 per $1,000 too high and reduced it to $1. We did not feel that banks should escape this tax altogether, because they receive and enjoy exceptional privileges from the Government, but we felt in the present condition, when they were in more or less distress, especially the State banks, we should not deal with them harshly.

The House bill imposed a tax of $50 on brokers. Your committee recommend this paragraph be stricken out of the bill. That was done largely upon the suggestion that because of the closing of the stock exchanges and the general cessation of trading in the character of things they deal in, it might be a hardship to impose a tax upon them.

The House bill imposes a flat rate of $100 upon all theaters, amusement and concert halls. This seemed to the Senate committee unjust, in that it would impose the same rate of taxation upon the small theater that is imposed upon the large theater.

The House bill exempted from the operation of this tax theaters, and so forth, in cities of less than 15,000 inhabitants. Your committee did not think there were any good reasons for this exemption. It considered that a small theater suited to the purposes of a town of 5,000 or 10,000 people might possibly be conducted with as much profit as a like theater in a city of 100,000 people. To meet these views your committee recommend, first, the striking out of this exemption, and, secondly, that the tax be graduated and based upon seating capacity, as follows:

Upon theaters, amusement and concert halls having a seating capacity of not more than 300, $25; having a seating capacity of 300 and not more than 600, $50; having a seating capacity of 600 and not more than 1,000, $75; having a seating capacity of more than 1,000, $100.

We have added to the bill a paragraph imposing a tax of $20 upon commission merchants. We did that because of a decision of the Supreme Court that commission merchants were not included under the general designation of commercial brokers in the law of 1898, and it was the desire of your committee that commission merchants should not escape taxation altogether.

The House has made only three classifications of manufacturers of tobacco and cigars. The Senate committee has added two other classifications. Under the first of these additional classifications the tax is raised to $48; under the second, it is raised to $96. It has made the same classifications and the same raises with reference to manufacturers of cigars.

I should state, Mr. President, it was also the purpose of the committee to make a like additional classification of manufacturers of cigarettes, but it was omitted by mistake from the bill. I shall offer on behalf of the committee an amendment making these additional classifications.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. POMERENE in the chair). Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. SIMMONS. I do.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Did the committee secure any statistical information in fixing these graduated taxes for the purpose of ascertaining the number of concerns that would probably fall within each group?

Mr. SIMMONS. I will say to the Senator that we accepted the three classifications that the House made, and then we had the actuary, as best he could, work out the two additional classifications carrying out the principle apparently applied in the House classifications. It is a mere extension of the principle applied by the House.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I will say to the Senator I am very glad, indeed, to see incorporated in this bill the idea of a graduated tax; that is, a tax the rate of which is higher upon the large manufacturers than upon the smaller. It conforms to my conviction very closely that it should be the purpose of the Government in levying internal-revenue taxes to carry the idea of graduation much further than it has been carried in this bill.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator will recognize the fact that this is only a license tax, and the same principle is not applied here that should be applied to an income tax; that is, if we are to have harmony in the bill. The license taxes are very low, as the Senator will see, all through the bill.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. They are low, it is very true, and I am anxious to see, and I hope I can persuade the committee to accept, an addition to this graduated idea. I notice the highest tax is $96, levied on manufacturers whose sales exceed 750,000 cigars—a year I suppose that means.

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. That is your amendment—$96 upon manufacturers whose manufactured product exceeds 750,000 cigars a year. I imagine there are a good many manufacturers who manufacture as many as 750,000 cigars. There are others, however, whose manufacture exceeds many times that much, and it seems to me there should be a still further graduation to reach those enormous manufacturers who flood the whole country with their product and whose dividends are far greater than these comparatively small manufacturers. Their product is so enormous, their processes have been so perfected, their trade is so great, and their advantages so large that their profits far exceed the profits of the ordinary manufacturer, and, in my opinion, there should be a still further graduation of their tax, raising it to a higher figure. I hope I may be able to persuade the members of the committee as to the propriety of increasing the tax on the larger manufacturers.

Mr. SIMMONS. I will be glad to confer with the Senator about it.

Mr. President, the committee recommends a slight change in the House bill in the paragraph relating to telegraph and telephone messages. The House required the telephone or telegraph company to pay the tax imposed. The Senate committee recommend that the sender be required to pay it, and they recommend that this tax be collected by the telegraph and telephone companies, and at the end of each month they make a sworn statement to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, and the taxes be settled upon the basis of that statement.

The committee recommended the entire elimination of the section relating to acceptors of bills of exchange or orders for the payment of money drawn or purported to be drawn in foreign countries and payable in the United States.

I may say that the law of 1898 imposed a tax upon foreign bills of exchange, but the Supreme Court of the United States decided that was a tax upon exports and hence unconstitutional.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. SIMMONS. I do.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I should like to ask the chairman of the committee if any order has been made for the printing of the bill as reported by the committee in parallel columns with the House bill?

Mr. SIMMONS. I am going to ask that this afternoon. We did have a print in parallel columns, but that was before the last amendments. There ought to be a new print, and I shall make that request this afternoon.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I hope the Senator will make that request, so that we can have the print on Monday next.

Mr. SIMMONS. I shall make that request.

Mr. SMOOT. Before the Senator leaves the question of the stamp tax in Schedule A——

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield, and to whom?

Mr. SIMMONS. I yield to the Senator from Utah. I will yield to the Senator from Washington later.

Mr. SMOOT. Before the Senator leaves the question of the stamp tax under Schedule A I desire to ask him his understanding of the certificates of indebtedness.

Mr. SIMMONS. What section does the Senator refer to?

Mr. SMOOT. The very first under section A, page 31, of the bill.

Mr. SIMMONS. Bonds, debentures, and so forth.

Mr. SMOOT. It provides for bonds, debentures, or certificates of indebtedness. I want to know of the Senator if certificates of indebtedness will include the deposit slips of a bank?

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not think the committee thought or intended that it should include certificates of bank deposits. I will state to the Senator that we expressly voted against imposing any tax upon certificates of deposit. It follows the language of the old law, as the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] suggests to me. If there is any reason for the construction that the Senator from Utah seems to think might be placed upon that section, I would be glad if he would give his reasons to the Senate now, or we will discuss them hereafter, because I am sure the committee does not desire that those words shall have the import that he indicates they might possibly have.

Mr. SMOOT. I am fearful the words "certificates of indebtedness" would apply to deposit slips in a bank. I do not want to discuss it now, I will say to the Senator, but I want to say that I believe an amendment should be made there so as to absolutely exclude the deposit slips.

Mr. THOMAS. May I ask the Senator from Utah if he thinks a deposit slip, such as he has mentioned, would be a certificate of indebtedness?

Mr. SMOOT. They are many times all that the depositor has. Many times depositors come into a bank and ask that the deposit slip be signed by the cashier as the pledge of the deposit.

Mr. THOMAS. I can not speak with positiveness, but I do not think that construction was given to this section by the administrators of the law of 1898.

Mr. SMOOT. I want to say to the Senator the question did arise at that time, or after the act was passed. I do not believe it was ever carried to the court. It is so easy, it seems to me, to amend the bill so as to exclude them that there should be no chance taken. I am quite sure that there is not a Senator in this body who would vote to require a stamp to be placed on every deposit slip received by depositors in all the banks of this country.

Mr. SIMMONS. I entirely agree with the Senator in his last statement.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. SIMMONS. Certainly.

Mr. POINDEXTER. For fear that it may be overlooked, it seems to me the order might as well be made now. I will ask unanimous consent——

Mr. SIMMONS. I hope the Senator will not do that in my speech. I will make it the minute I finish. I hope the Senator will not insist upon it now.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The only fear I have is that the Senator will overlook it.

Mr. SIMMONS. I will not forget it. I assure the Senator I will not.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I was going to suggest that there be placed in three columns the law of 1898, the House bill, and the bill as amended by the Senate.

Mr. SIMMONS. That is what I intend to ask. Mr. President, the House bill imposes a tax on life insurance and accident policies. The committee did not feel that there was anything in the present situation to justify any such tax. We felt that that was a tax imposed upon a man who was unselfishly denying himself during life in order that he might better provide for his dependents after his death, and we recommend that that section be stricken from the bill.

The committee recommend an amendment to the paragraph relating to marine and inland fire insurance. The purpose of that amendment is to provide, upon the cancellation of a policy or the refund in whole or in part of the premium, that the tax thereon shall be refunded pro rata to the insurer. We also add an amendment providing against the taxation of reinsurance, because we thought that would, in effect, be double taxation.

The committee also recommend that the tax imposed upon mortgages or pledges of land and personal property be stricken out. We did not feel in the present conditions, indeed in any conditions, it was quite fair to tax a man upon an indebtedness secured by a mortgage of his property.

With reference to the tax imposed by the House on palace or parlor cars, the Senate committee recommend a reduction of that tax from 2 cents to 1 cent. One cent was the rate carried in the act of 1898. It was shown to the committee that a 2-cent tax upon the tickets of the Pullman Palace Car Co., upon the basis of the 24,600,000 tickets sold last year, would yield the Government $492,000, and that this sum was about five times the amount that company paid during the last fiscal year under the income-tax law. Under these circumstances the committee thought the tax excessive.

Your committee recommend the addition to the bill of a schedule to be known as Schedule B. In general terms, this schedule imposes certain taxes upon proprietary medicines, upon cosmetics, upon perfumery, and upon chewing gum. Your committee saw no reason why these articles, which were taxed in the war-revenue act of 1898, should not now be taxed and bear a part of this burden.

Mr. President, I wish to present and ask that it be incorporated as an appendix of my remarks, an estimate of the revenue expected to be derived from taxes imposed in this bill. The table gives the amount of revenue collected during the year 1900 under the act of 1898, the amount estimated under the House bill, and under the bill as reported by the Finance Committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. SIMMONS. Now, Mr. President, a few general observations, and I shall conclude.

In normal conditions the income of the Government under the act of October 3, 1913, would have been amply sufficient to meet the needs of the Government for the present fiscal year, 1915, as it was for the last fiscal year, 1914. During the fiscal year 1914 the ordinary receipts of the Government were $734,673,166.71, while the ordinary expenses were only $700,254,489.71, leaving a surplus, after paying all expenses, of more than $34,000,000.

Unfortunately, the conditions which now confront us are not normal conditions. They are extraordinary conditions; indeed, they are not only extraordinary, but they are unparalleled conditions. The Spanish-American War entailed upon us an additional expense and for a short time disturbed trade conditions, but its effect upon our international trade was negligible, while its effect upon our domestic trade was to stimulate rather than depress it.

The condition of armed conflict which now exists between six or eight of the great nations of Europe—a conflict in which the fate of empires is involved; a conflict straining to the utmost all the energies and resources of the countries involved, calling, in the case of many of these nations, for enlistment in the naval and military service of practically every able-bodied man, involves unparalleled destruction of property, practical cessation of industry, and the general demoralization and dislocation of the trade business, not only of this great industrial continent, but of the entire world.

Nor are the countries of Europe the only ones affected in their productive and consumptive capacity and international trade relations. To a greater or less extent all the noncombatant countries of Europe are also seriously affected in these respects.

When we recall the fact that for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914, our dutiable imports from the world amounted to $766,422,958, while our dutiable imports from Europe, chiefly from the countries engaged in war, for the same fiscal year amounted to $505,575,811; when we recall the fact that nearly all the great exporting countries of Europe are in a state of industrial paralysis, that the business and the finances of the combatant countries have been so broken up and dislocated that moratoriums have been ordered and specie payment suspended, and that this situation is not likely to improve, but to grow worse as the war progresses, we can not escape the conclusion that he must be an optimist indeed who thinks that there will not be a continued falling off in our customs revenues from the curtailment of imports from these countries, and that in view of the fact that we derive so large a part of our customs revenues from these importations the aggregate loss will not be so great as to seriously embarrass and weaken the financial situation of the Treasury, unless this loss is offset by income from some other source. But, Mr. President, argument is unnecessary. The naked facts with respect to our loss of revenues from imports since war was declared are all that is necessary to satisfy any mind not predetermined against conviction of the necessity for this legislation.

During the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914, there was a falling off in revenue from that of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, of $26,000,000. This represented a normal falling off in revenue as a result of reduction of tariff duties. The decrease in customs revenue for July, August, September, and the first five days of October, 1914, as compared with a similar period in 1913, was, in round numbers, as follows:

July	$4,800,000
August	11,500,000
September	9,600,000
October (five days)	2,800,000
Total	28,700,000

A total decrease for three months and five days of $28,700,000, or nearly $3,000,000 in excess of the total falling off under normal conditions during the full fiscal year of 1914. Leaving out July and including only August, September, and five days of October, the period of war conditions, the aggregate falling off amounted to about $24,000,000, or within $2,000,000 of the loss during the entire fiscal year 1914. The fact that our imports for September were greater than in August has been regarded by some as an indication of an early return to normal importations and that there is no real reason to apprehend a permanent loss of a serious character through decreased imports.

Mr. President, to those who entertain this opinion the wish is father to the thought. There is no ground for it. When the war began Europe had a large stock of goods on hand, and, naturally, when the lanes of ocean commerce were opened they hurried them to market, and for a little while after the embargo on ocean commerce was removed there was a spurt in imports from Europe to this country. The movement has not altogether subsided, though the imports for the five days in October indicate that it is rapidly subsiding. It will not be long before this accumulated surplus has been disposed of. And what then? Where will the commodities for export then come from? The great industrial nations are not now engaged in manufacturing commodities for export. In some of them the factories are already idle and in others partially so, but wherever the factories are in operation they are producing for home consumption; they are engaged in an effort to supply the necessities of their own people, and especially their armies. They will do well, straining every effort, to make enough to supply this great demand. For these reasons it is folly to suppose that under the conditions which exist in the combatant countries there can be any considerable exportation of goods while the war continues.

When the surplus stock of merchandise for export which they happened to have on hand when the war began has been sold their exports will cease. They may send their stocks and bonds and their gold here to buy food and munitions of war, but the products of their fields and their factories will be needed at home. For a little while Great Britain and France may continue to export something, but soon these exportations must, in the nature of things, cease. The stock of goods available for exportation in the other combatant countries must also soon be exhausted, and no additional supply beyond home and continental necessities can be made till peace is established; and even after peace is established the process of rehabilitation which will then set in will necessarily be slow. Considerable time, to say the least, will elapse before they can supply their own needs and become to any extent exporters.

When you consider the financial situation thus presented in connection with the collection of customs receipts under ordinary conditions and the further fact that our receipts from income taxes are not collected monthly and may be and generally are paid annually, the danger of a deficit even where the annual revenues are sufficient to meet annual expenses during certain months of the year is apparent. To illustrate, on October 31, 1913, there was an available balance of about $125,000,000 in the Treasury; on June 30, 1914, there was an available balance of about $146,000,000; but on April 30, 1914, there was an available balance of only $80,000,000, and on May 31, 1914, there was an available balance of only a little over $74,000,000. Aside from the danger involved in the withdrawal of $74,000,000 now on deposit in national banks, all of which will have to be paid in gold—even if this money were in the Treasury instead of in the banks—the figures I have given show that because of the falling revenues which now confront us the position of the Treasury would be jeopardized by failure to provide revenue to offset the daily loss resulting from decreased imports.

Mr. President, the gravity of the situation through which the country has passed during the last two months can not be overstated. Seldom has there been a more critical period in our national history—one that at times has been fraught with more danger of far-reaching import.

That this situation has been so successfully met every thoughtful person knows has been largely due to the strength of the National Treasury—inspiring confidence and steadying the whole financial fabric by its demonstrated ability to render needed assistance to safeguard the credit of the Nation by supporting the weak and inspiring the faltering with hope and confidence.

Anything that will tend to weaken the Treasury and to undermine public confidence in its ability to help in case of emergency or stress would under the conditions which environ us be a serious, not to say criminal, blunder, and it would be equally unwise to pursue a course which would bring embarrassment and possible distress to the bankers of the country now taxed to the utmost to safeguard the interest of the respective localities in which they are situated.

After a thorough consideration of the facts with respect to our general fiscal situation and the financial condition of the Treasury and of the bankers, who are in a sense the fiscal agents of the people, the Secretary of the Treasury, with a grasp and foresight which has won for him a position second to that of no man who has occupied the great office he now fills since the Civil War, believes this legislation is necessary in the interest of the public and to safeguard the National Treasury.

Profoundly impressed with the necessity of this legislation, the President of the United States in the discharge of his constitutional duties has in person appealed to the two Houses of Congress to protect the Government and the Treasury against certain embarrassment by providing revenue to offset this loss. It is not proposed to increase the revenues of the Government, but merely to maintain them at a standard sufficient to defray legitimate expenses.

It is said that this will be an unpopular measure. Undoubtedly that is true. All direct taxes are unpopular. When the President recommended this legislation he knew it would be unpopular, and, from a party standpoint, possibly hurtful, especially right on the eve of a national election; but the President is a man who does not hesitate—and that is one of the reasons why he is so strong with the people—to do what he believes to be his duty, what he believes to be for the best interest of the people, what he believes to be necessary for the peace, happiness, and safety of the country, without regard to personal or political consequences.

Senators and Representatives who are supporting this measure know full well that the imposition of this tax will create friction and irritation, and that it may be used to the detriment of themselves and their party in the elections soon to take place; but, with the President, they believe the safety of the country requires immediate action, and they confidently rely upon the good sense and patriotism of the people to justify them in doing their duty in safeguarding interests higher than those of party and affecting the welfare of the whole people.

For myself, I have no fears about the result. I have an abiding confidence that those who seek to make party capital out of the distress and necessities of the present situation, out of a courageous discharge of a plain duty by the party in power, will be sorely disappointed, and that their efforts in this behalf instead of receiving the approval of the people will receive their emphatic condemnation.

Do you Republicans expect to defeat this bill? You know you do not. You know you can not defeat it. But do you really want to defeat it? I imagine you do not, because, while you would be willing for us to bear the responsibility of what may happen should it fail and the Treasury be left helpless, you do not yourselves wish to incur that responsibility. Your hope is by your attitude of opposition to make political capital for your party in the coming election. You will be disappointed. The people know that a Republican Senate or a Republican House in the next Congress would render the great man in the White House impotent in his efforts to relieve them from the wrongs and abuses which have grown up under your party and to bring to full fruition the great measures that have been enacted under his superb leadership, and they will see to it that the next Congress will have a majority in both Houses in sympathy with the principles, policies, and measures for which the Democratic Party, under his leadership, stands.

Mr. JONES obtained the floor.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to make a request?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. JONES. Certainly.

Mr. SIMMONS. I desire to ask unanimous consent that the emergency revenue bill as passed by the House and as reported to the Senate, together with the war revenue act of 1898, be printed in parallel columns. I will also ask that there be printed as a public document, if the Senator from Utah now desires, as he seemed to on the day before yesterday, the estimates that I have made a part of my remarks. (S. Doc. No. 597.)

Mr. SMOOT. That was what I was going to ask. I should like to have the estimates as presented to the committee printed as a public document.

Mr. SIMMONS. I ask that there be printed in parallel columns the revenue derived under the act of 1898, the estimated revenue under the bill as passed by the House, and the estimated revenue under the amended Senate bill (S. Doc. No. 596). I suppose what the Senator desires is that those figures be printed as a public document?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes, Mr. President; that is the request I made a few days ago.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ASHURST in the chair). Is there any objection to the request of the Senator from North Carolina? The Chair hears none, and the order is made.

HEARINGS BEFORE THE JUDICIARY COMMITTEE.

Mr. OVERMAN. Will the Senator from Washington yield to me for a moment?

Mr. JONES. Certainly.

Mr. REED. Will the Senator yield to me for a formal matter?

Mr. JONES. I have just yielded to the Senator from North Carolina. After he concludes I will yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. OVERMAN. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. SIMMONS. I ask the Senator from Washington if he will not yield to the Senator from Missouri, because when I began my remarks I promised him I would yield to him as soon as I had concluded.

Mr. JONES. Oh, certainly.

Mr. REED. It is a formal matter and I think it will not take a word of debate. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the resolution which I send to the desk, which simply gives authority to the Committee on the Judiciary or any subcommittee thereof to take evidence during the session of Congress or the vacation on bills that are pending before the committee. It simply confers the additional right to take the evidence during the vacation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri submits a resolution, which will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 469), as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary, or any subcommittee thereof, be authorized during the Sixty-third Congress to send for persons and papers, to administer oaths, to employ a stenographer, at a cost of not to exceed $1 per printed page, to report such hearings as may be had in connection with any subject that may be pending before said committee, and to have such hearings printed for the use of the committee; that the expenses of such hearings be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate; and that the said committee and all subcommittees thereof may sit during the sessions of the Senate.

Resolved further, That the said committee, or any subcommittee thereof, is hereby authorized to conduct said hearings and investigations in the city of Washington or elsewhere as it may deem proper, and may continue such hearings and investigations during any recess of said Congress.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, under the law the resolution can not be considered at this time. The proper thing is to refer it to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, as it carries an appropriation.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, a similar resolution was passed long ago, except as to the clause authorizing the taking of evidence during the recess of the Senate. We have a bill on which some evidence has been taken, and there is probably a day's evidence to be taken in the city of St. Louis; and without the authority proposed to be granted by the resolution we could not issue the subpœnaes. It is a very small matter, and as I am going away on Monday evening I would like to have it considered.

Mr. SMOOT. I wish the Senator to know that I am not in any way opposed to the resolution. If it were not contrary to the law, I would not object to its immediate consideration; but it calls for an appropriation, and under the law all such resolutions must be referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate. It is not merely a rule of the Senate but a law which requires the reference; otherwise I would gladly waive any objection to it.

Mr. REED. The resolution does not call for any appropriation.

Mr. SMOOT. It provides for the payment of a stenographer, and if the committee should go to St. Louis the expenses of witnesses and others would have to be paid.

Mr. REED. The Senator meant to say it calls for an expenditure of money?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. REED. But it does not appropriate any money.

Mr. SMOOT. Of course, the money will be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate. I am perfectly willing that the Senator should submit the resolution and have it referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, and that that committee shall immediately report it back to the Senate. Then I shall not object for a moment to its consideration.

Mr. REED. I think the Senator is in error about the situation.

Mr. SMOOT. I will leave it to the Chair.

Mr. REED. A resolution has already been passed authorizing this to be done, but in the form in which the resolution was passed we probably can not take evidence after Congress shall have adjourned.

Mr. SMOOT. That is the reason why the resolution is offered?

Mr. REED. That is the reason why it is offered.

Mr. SMOOT. Therefore there is that additional authority——

Mr. REED. It is an extension.

Mr. SMOOT. Or an extension of the authority; and that, of course, would carry an expenditure out of the contingent fund of the Senate. I hope the Senator will adopt that course, and then there will be no question at all about it.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I understand the resolution has been referred to the committee?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair has made no ruling. He is waiting for the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. OVERMAN. I understand the Senator from Missouri has no objection to the resolution being referred to the committee.

Mr. REED. No. I shall endeavor to get a report this afternoon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

Mr. REED subsequently said: From the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate I report back favorably Senate resolution 469, authorizing the Committee on the Judiciary to hold hearings during the session of the Senate and also during the vacation. I ask that the resolution may be placed on the calendar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be placed on the calendar.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House insists upon its amendments to the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 74) appropriating money for the payment of certain claims on account of labor, supplies, materials, and cash furnished in the construction of the Corbett Tunnel disagreed to by the Senate, agrees to the conference asked for by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. POU, Mr. DIES, and Mr. MOTT managers at the conference on the part of the House.

ENROLLED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills and joint resolution, and they were thereupon signed by the Vice President:

H. R. 12198. An act for the relief of Benjamin A. Sanders;

H. R. 15575. An act donating the old iron fence around Vance Park, Charlotte, N. C., to the Mecklenburg Declaration of Independence Chapter, to be placed around Craighead Cemetery, near Sugar Creek Church, in Mecklenburg County;

H. R. 17764. An act to provide for sale of portion of post-office site in Gastonia, N. C.; and

S. J. Res. 193. Joint resolution to authorize the President to grant leave of absence to two commissioned officers of the line of the Navy for the purpose of accepting an appointment under the Government of Brazil as instructors in naval strategy and tactics in the Naval War College of Brazil.

Mr. PERKINS presented memorials of the Retail Druggists' Association of Sacramento; the Retail Druggists' Association of San Francisco; the California Pharmaceutical Association; and of Fremont Older, editor of the Bulletin, of San Francisco; the Viavi Co. and Coffin, Redington Co., of San Francisco, the Western Wholesale Drug Co., of Los Angeles; and of the Langley & Michaels Co., of San Francisco, all in the State of California, remonstrating against the proposed tax on proprietary medicines, which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented memorials of the Superior Garage, of Stockton, and of the Bekins Speer Motor Co., of Los Angeles, in the State of California, remonstrating against the proposed tax on automobiles, which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a memorial of the Citizens' National Bank, of Los Angeles, Cal., remonstrating against the proposed tax on capital and surplus of banks, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. PAGE (for Mr. DILLINGHAM) presented telegrams in the nature of memorials from Arthur L. Cheney, of Morrisville; H. A. Slade, of Montpelier; and J. W. O'Sullivan, of Burlington, all in the State of Vermont, remonstrating against the proposed tax on proprietary medicines, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. SHIVELY presented resolutions adopted at a peace meeting held at Muncie, Ind., approving President Wilson's policy in cultivating friendly relations and concluding treaties of arbitration with other nations, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I present a resolution adopted by the Federation of Citizens' Associations of Washington, D. C., which I ask may be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

There being no objection, the resolution was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., October 3, 1914.

The following resolution was unanimously adopted at the meeting of the Federation of Citizens' Associations held Saturday, October 3, 1914:

"Resolved, That the Federation of Citizens' Associations approves House bill No. 17097, to fix the salary of the auditor of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, and petitions the United States Senate its early enactment into law. We recommend that that official receive a fixed salary not exceeding $5,000 per annum, and that all necessary expenses of maintaining the office be paid out of the fees received from litigants and others, and that the surplus, if any, be deposited in the United States Treasury to the credit of the District of Columbia, the latter being required to pay all expenses incidental thereto."

CHARLES S. SHREVE, Jr.,
Acting Secretary.

Mr. POINDEXTER presented memorials of Schwabacher Bros. & Co. (Inc.); Western Association of Retail Cigar Dealers; Olympia Building & Loan Association; Mr. A. M. Riley; North Yakima Clearing House Association; Seattle Chamber of Commerce; Seattle Clearing House Association; I. A. Nadeau; Spokane Realty Board; Washington State Automobile Association; Walter J. Nicholls; J. L. Myers; Hawkins Motor Car Co.; Yakima Auto Dealers' Association; Yakima Auto & Supply Co.; Washington Auto Co.; Scorn Motor Co.; Bell Wyman Implement Co.; Mr. W. H. Macfarlan; Mr. Harry A. Calohan; Western Washington Woman's Christian Temperance Union; and Prof. Charles Timblin, all in the State of Washington, remonstrating against certain provisions contained in the war revenue bill, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. WARREN. I have a telegram from the president of the Board of Trade of Chicago, Ill., relative to the proposed tax on cotton and grain. I ask that the telegram may lie on the table and be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the telegram was ordered to lie on the table and be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CHICAGO, ILL., October 8, 1914.

Hon. FRANCIS E. WARREN,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

We would respectfully call your attention to a fact which we think is not understood by our Senators and Representatives. This is that the effect of that part of the revenue bill on page 22, lines 18 to 23, will be to impose a tax on every bale of cotton and on every bushel of grain shipped from any country point to be sold in the principal markets of the country on any chamber of commerce, board of trade, or similar place. It is a direct tax on sales of both cotton and grain, whether for domestic consumption or export. We believe that all the State grain dealers' associations and producers who are aware of this section are in favor of its elimination. We do not believe the Congress desires to impose a tax on cotton and foodstuffs.

C. H. CANBY,
President Board of Trade of the City of Chicago.

Mr. KERN. I have received about a hundred telegrams from druggists and manufacturing chemists in various parts of Indiana, protesting against the proposed tax on proprietary medicines. I desire to read into the RECORD three of these messages, which are short. It will be observed that, while they are respectful in tone, they are very earnest in sentiment. The first is from Connersville, Ind., and reads as follows:

CONNERSVILLE, IND., October 8, 1914.

Hon. J. W. KERN,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

We ask you to do what you can to have the stamp tax on medicines removed, as the war has already raised the cost of drugs to almost prohibitive prices and some are hardly obtainable. This additional tax would therefore be unjust to an industry already heavily burdened.

THE MAXINE CO.

Another is from Muncie, Ind., and reads as follows:

MUNCIE, IND., October 9, 1914.

Senator JOHN W. KERN,
Washington, D. C.:

We are instructed by the Delaware County Druggists' Association, consisting of 30 members, to enter a protest against the taxation of the retail druggist by a war tax. We were made goats in the last war. This is discrimination favoring dealers in other lines above our own. We feel that if a tax is made it should be on all lines of business, manufacturers included.

DELAWARE COUNTY DRUGGISTS' ASSOCIATION,
H. M. JACKSON, President,
A. C. HELM, Secretary.

Another is from Mount Vernon, Ind., and reads as follows:

MOUNT VERNON, IND., October 9, 1914.

Senator JOHN W. KERN,
Washington, D. C.

Please do your best to kill amendment taxing patent medicines. Such revenue is borne entirely by retailer. Can't be passed to consumer. Manufacturer passes to jobber, jobber to retailer, where it stops. Practically only line where such tax stops before reaching consumer. Think it very unjust. Willing to pay our share, but not the other fellow's. Will cost us together over a thousand dollars a year.

W. H. FOGAS,
CHAS. DAWSON,
D. & H. ROSENBAUM,
Druggists.

The other telegrams I send to the desk, and ask that they may be noted in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the telegrams were ordered to be noted in the RECORD, as follows:

Telegrams from sundry druggists of Indianapolis, Laporte, Bedford, Jonesboro, Whiting, Albany, Aurora, Brazil, Waynetown, Anderson, Muncie, Mount Vernon, Michigan City, Goshen, Greenfield, Columbus, Elkhart, Markle, and Odon, all in the State of Indiana, remonstrating against the proposed tax on proprietary medicines, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. SMOOT. In that connection I desire to say that I have received probably hundreds of similar telegrams. I am not going to ask that any of them be printed in the RECORD, but will content myself by announcing that I have received telegrams from all parts of the United States of the same import as those the Senator from Indiana has presented.

Mr. CLAPP. I desire to make a similar statement. Under the rule we adopted some time ago in the Senate, it is not necessary to present petitions in the open Senate, they being noted in the RECORD without such formal presentation; but lest those who have sent messages to me might misunderstand the silence, I desire to say that I have received hundreds of telegrams, and that I am in hearty sympathy with the spirit and the purpose of them.

Mr. FLETCHER. I have a telegram from the secretary of the Florida Rexall Club, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the telegram was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

OCALA, FLA., October 9, 1914.

Hon. D. U. FLETCHER,
Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Relative to Senate amendment to war revenue bill taxing drug business of the country, the brunt of this will fall on the retail druggists, as was the case during the Spanish-American War, the manufacturers raising the price of their products and the retail price remaining unchanged. Representing the Florida Rexall druggists, I respectfully ask that you use your influence against the amendment, as I feel we paid sufficient war tax in our own last war to keep us immune for some years to come.

J. J. GERRIG,
Secretary Florida Rexall Club.

REGISTER OF FOREIGN-BUILT VESSELS.

Mr. FLETCHER submitted a report (No. 816) to accompany the bill (S. 2335) to provide for the register and enrollment of vessels built in foreign countries when such vessels have been wrecked on the coasts of the United States or her possessions or near-by waters and salved by American citizens and repaired in American shipyards, heretofore reported by him.

SLAVS ON SOUTHERN FARMS (S. DOC. NO. 595).

Mr. FLETCHER, from the Committee on Printing, reported the following resolution (S. Res. 468), which was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to.

Resolved, That the manuscript entitled "Slavs on Southern Farms," by Mr. Le Roy Hodges, be printed as a Senate document.

COMMITTEE SERVICE.

Mr. KERN. I submit to the Senate the resignations of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. WEST] and of the Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD] from the Committees on Military Affairs and Immigration, respectively, and ask to have the communication read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

Hon. THOMAS F. MARSHALL,
Washington, D. C.:

We hereby tender our resignations as members of the Committees on Military Affairs and Immigration, respectively.

W. S. WEST.
MORRIS SHEPPARD.

On motion of Mr. KERN, it was Ordered, That Senator MORRIS SHEPPARD, of Texas, be appointed a member of the Committee on Military Affairs to fill the vacancy caused by the resignation therefrom of Senator WEST, of Georgia.

That Senator W. S. WEST, of Georgia, be appointed a member of the Committee on Immigration to fill the vacancy caused by the resignation therefrom of Senator SHEPPARD, of Texas.

EMERGENCY REVENUE LEGISLATION.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 18891) to increase the internal revenue, and for other purposes.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, the bill now pending proposes to add to the direct taxes to be paid by our citizens. They can not escape it. No foreigner pays any of it or is burdened by it. This, however, is not the only tax that it is proposed to exact from the producers and consumers of the United States.

The railroads are asking permission to raise their rates for transportation. If granted, it will amount to an increase of taxes on the people. The President was quoted as in favor of this raise before the Interstate Commerce Commission denied the application of the railroads to make it, and he has since been prevailed upon to issue a statement expressing sympathy with the movement for such increase. This is expected to have its effect, not only upon the country but also upon the commission before which is now pending a petition for a rehearing. Surely the people of the country when they voted the Democratic Party into power did not expect that party not only to add greatly to the direct taxes on the people but also to favor giving the railroads the right to further increase the taxes of producers and consumers by raising transportation rates. On the contrary, the party in its platform—which, it is true, has become a mere fiction—intimated that further reductions would be required. Why are they now in favor of a raise in rates? The war in Europe is given as the reason for the decrease in business, which everyone now admits to exist. Every trouble that we suffer now is blamed upon this war, but the people surely can not be fooled by such a claim in the face of the facts at hand.

Railroad business is depressed. So is every other business. When did the depression begin? Before the war, not after it. Why? Simply because of the injurious effect of Democratic policies upon the industries of the country. The railroads had lost much of their business before the war began because of the depression that followed the enactment of the Underwood tariff law, which all those opposed to Democracy said would bring industrial disaster. The figures of railroad business and activity will clearly show what the real trouble is and are more eloquent and convincing than any words that anyone can utter, and furnish a basis for sure and correct deductions. From 1900 to 1912 our country and its industries were thriving under Republican policies. The railroads shared in that prosperity and developed in a wonderful degree.

In 1900, 258,784 miles of railroad were operated, and in 1912, 371,238, or an increase of 112,454 miles.

The stock upon which dividends were paid in 1900 amounted to $2,668,969,895, and the stock in 1912 upon which dividends were paid amounted to $5,581,289,249, or an increase of $2,912,319,354. In 1900 the total operating revenue was $1,487,044,814, while in 1912 it was $2,842,695,382, or an increase of $1,355,650,568. The net operating revenue in 1900 was $526,616,303, while in 1912 it was $870,279,606, or an increase of $343,663,303. These increases were quite steady year by year, very few years showing decreases from the preceding year.

While railroad dividends and net operating revenues were growing the employees increased in number and their wages also increased steadily. Labor had an abundance of work at ever-advancing pay.

In 1900 railroad employees numbered 1,017,653, and in 1912, 1,716,380, or an increase of 698,627; aggregate compensation in 1900, $577,264,811, while in 1912 it was $1,252,347,697, or an increase in wages of $675,082,886. The average daily wage of all the employees was $1.90 in 1900, and in 1912, $2.42. This increase was very steady, there being but one year in which the average was below that of the preceding year. Here are the averages of some particular employees:

Station agents, 1900, $1.75; in 1912, $2.20.
Enginemen, 1900, $3.75; in 1912, $5.
Firemen, 1900, $2.14; in 1912, $3.02.
Conductors, 1900, $3.17; in 1912, $4.29.
Machinists, 1900, $2.30; in 1912, $3.21.

While dividends, wages, and mileage increased, the equipment of the roads was not neglected. The number of locomotives in 1900 was 37,663, and in 1912, 62,262, or an increase of 24,599. Cars of all kinds in 1900 were 1,450,838, and in 1912, 2,382,674, or an increase of 931,836.

Freight business originating on the line in 1900 amounted to 516,432,217 tons, and in 1912 it was 998,282,525 tons, or an increase of 481,850,208 tons.

These figures show continued and growing prosperity for the railroads and their employees. With the advent of the new administration and the change in governmental policies all kinds of business were disturbed and curtailed. While Republican policies continued in force business remained very good, and the net operating revenues of about 90 per cent of the roads for the year ending June 30, 1913, were $938,560,638, but with the enactment of the Democratic tariff business depression came and the railroads were the first to show it. Freight diminished, passengers decreased, trains were laid off, men were thrown out of employment, and revenues failed. Authoritative figures for idle railroad men are not available; but from the various statements given out by reliable authorities, from 200,000 to 300,000 railroad men were out of employment July 1, 1914. Authoritative figures are at hand disclosing the decrease in business as shown by decreased net operating revenues, which for the year ending June 30, 1914, were $836,326,390, or $102,234,248 less than for the year 1913 on the same roads. The operating revenues of these roads for the month of June alone were $10,309,159 less than for June, 1913. The freight revenues for May, 1914, were over $24,000,000 less than for May, 1913. The foregoing figures are taken from bulletins of the Interstate Commerce Commission and data taken therefrom by the Bureau of Railway Economics.

This was the situation on July 1, 1914, and can not be attributed to the war, because the war was not even thought of at that time. The railroads may be entitled to raise their rates by reason of the situation they are in. What is responsible for that situation? There is but one thing responsible for it, and that is Democratic legislation and the consequent business depression incident thereto.

We are now confronted with the levy of over $100,000,000 direct taxes, which the foreigner has heretofore largely been paying. This levy is urged by the President in order to prevent the necessity of calling from the national banks the $75,000,000 which they now hold subject to call. Instead of calling from the banks as needed what they hold and are now loaning to the people, the President would let them retain this money and take from the pockets of the people in direct taxes another $100,000,000, which of itself will eventually get into the banks. In addition to this, and because of business depression caused by Democratic legislation, the railroads are to be permitted to levy additional taxes upon the people by way of increased freight rates in order to make their business remunerative, while other business must make out the best way it can. This is the way Democracy would reduce the high cost of living. This is its method of benefiting the people. Was this what the people voted for at the last election? Will they vote for it at the coming election? Time alone can determine, "but I hae my doots."

Thus, Mr. President, the fruits of Democratic policies are business depression, idle labor, curtailed markets, reduced revenues, extravagant appropriations, increased transportation rates, special, direct, and multiplied taxes, and a higher cost of living.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, much will be said in the pending discussion concerning the effect of recent revenue legislation upon the national income. The decrease of imports, the consequent necessity for an emergency revenue law, and the very natural desire of every interest to escape an added burden have furnished the opposition an opportunity to criticize the fiscal policy of the Democratic Party and to charge the pending deficit to the operations of the Underwood tariff law. We are reminded with all the aggressiveness of the juvenile spirit of "I told you so" that the repeal of the Payne-Aldrich law was a blunder, rising to the proportions of a national crime; that its schedules were synchronized with prosperity and scientifically adjusted to the demands of the Treasury; that if it were now in force the need for emergent revenue would not have arisen; and that the people are to be inflicted with a direct tax as a punishment for Democratic ascendancy. If this were true—indeed, if it possessed the semblance of truth—the indictment would be a grave one, and the dominant party should be justly held responsible for its errors, whatever the good faith of its purposes.

But, Mr. President, these assertions are without merit, and none know the fact better than those who make them. Indeed, it would be a reflection upon their intelligence to suggest that they are not painfully aware of the fact that our threatened deficiency is far less than it would be if the iniquities of the Payne-Aldrich Act still disfigured our statute books.

I agree that attending and succeeding the tariff act of 1913 industrial conditions have not been satisfactory. I agree that until the 1st of last August our imports were increasing, as we intended and expected, although the imports of manufactured goods from Europe remained practically stationary. I agree that some lines of business have suffered from this depression, and that large numbers of people have been out of employment. I am prepared to concede that these conditions were but partially caused by the iniquities of a high protective tariff. They were more largely the result of world-wide causes. They were as common to England, to France, to Germany, and Japan as to the United States. They were the aftermath of a long season of commercial and financial debauchery, involving the people of all nations and sparing none of them. They came in the wake of a speculative era, swollen with billions of negotiated securities, the greater part of which have uncertain values behind them, and which had absorbed the liquid capital of the nations. They were companioned by huge deficits in the European budgets, the cost of whose armaments on land and sea far exceeded their incomes, by increased and increasing burdens of taxation laid upon every conceivable source of production and consumption, by the contraction of credits at home and abroad, by the destruction of the Balkan wars, and by the awful disclosures of bankers' management of our great lines of transportation. They would have been with us if Taft or Roosevelt had been elected instead of Wilson. They are the product not of one but of all national conditions. It is hard for partisanship to recognize, much less to admit, these stubborn facts, since to do so would deprive it of all thunder for the pending campaign. It had Mexico last summer, with canal tolls and the Japanese invasion as interludes, but these are gone. It must therefore have hard times, with the administration to blame for them, or its occupation will be gone. Hence this beating of tom-toms about the ravished virtues of high protection, the dire menace of the Underwood bill, and the supreme injustice of a war tax when there is no war.

I appreciate the dilemma in which the Republican Party finds itself, because I fully understand it. That party faces an election that is now in sight, and faces it without an issue. It has heard from Maine and realizes the hold of this administration upon the people. It is patriotic, and therefore it must stand by the Government in this crisis of a world in arms. But it wants an issue; so it thanks God for hard times, and can bear harder ones with resignation. And harder times are in store for it, not for the public. On the 3d of next November it will have new cause to sympathize with Belgium and hasten to claim the privileges of a neutral.

Our good Republican friends on the other side of the Chamber have joined in a chorus of reproaches for nonperformance of certain party pledges. Some of these reproaches are just and will bear repetition, thus bringing about their observance, as I sincerely trust. We certainly will not be permitted to forget them. I trust also that the shock which this nonobservance has given to Republican Senators will so purify their hearts and consciences that they will change their ancient ways and devote themselves to the full observance of their own covenants should Providence in His infinite displeasure ever inflict another Republican triumph upon an unhappy nation.

But I fear this conversion will never materialize, for we are not only reproached but denounced and sometimes abused for such of our promises as we have kept. If I comprehend the Republican position, it condemns us for observing the promises we have kept and condemns us just as vigorously for not observing those we have disregarded. It would commend us had we done the opposite thing. Its grief over our sins is not because of our sinning, but because we have not sinned to suit it. It seems to have been inspired by that sentiment in Hudibras which would—

> Compound for sins they are inclined to
> By damning those they have no mind to.

Having kept the faith as to all things abhorred by our opponents, we shall long before this administration shall have ended keep it as to the things about which on the eve of an important election Republicans are so painfully anxious. Be of good cheer, gentlemen, we are here to remain for a time, and long ere our lease of power is ended we shall leave a record of fidelity to party covenants that will light the pathway of your children with its example while the Republic endures.

Mr. President, this country is in no wise responsible for the conditions which beset it. This Congress, however subject to criticism in other directions, in no wise contributed to them. We are, in common with other neutral and innocent peoples, the victims of modern militarism. The great powers of the world have for years been arming and preparing for and have therefore deliberately provoked the conflict. They have called their armaments "an insurance of peace." Their mutual suspicions and jealousies have been adroitly inspired and quickened by the wicked machinations of the war-equipment trust. That embodiment of greed, whose chief asset is national hostility and suspicion, has long fattened upon the industry of nations and realized billions upon manufacture and sales of military and naval equipment. In the midst of the awful carnage of this hour it is busy with our own people, pointing to Europe's desolation as a conclusive reason why we should patronize it by making huge expenditures of public money for guns and ships and shells, all of which it is eager to supply. The swaggering bullies of the Old World, armed and prepared for conflict, have collided. It was as inevitable as gravitation. God grant that from the prevailing destruction and slaughter militarism will forever disappear from the earth.

Mr. President, no one expected the cataclysm which involves the civilization of Europe in the closing days of last July. It came as the tolling of fire bells at night and created havoc with the interrelated mechanism of commerce and industry everywhere. But as we reflect upon the attitude of the great powers toward each other, their preparedness, their expansion, their racial and political complications, we perceive that the conflict was inevitable. We recall the glowing periods of Gov. Black, who, placing the name of Theodore Roosevelt before the Chicago convention of 1904, declared that—

> The fate of nations is still decided by their wars. You may talk of orderly tribunals and learned referees, you may sing in your schools the gentle praises of the quiet life, you may strike from your books the last note of every martial anthem, and yet out in the smoke and thunder will always be the tramp of horses and the silent, rigid, upturned face. Men may prophesy and women pray, but peace will come here to reside forever on this earth only when the dreams of childhood are the accepted charts to guide the destinies of men. Events are numberless and mighty, and no man can tell which wire runs round the world. The nation basking to-day in the quiet of contentment and repose may still be on the deadly circuit and to-morrow writhing in the toils of war.

The truth of these sentiments seems to be vindicated by the events of the last two months. We, whose separation from the Old World by the Atlantic should have exempted us from their influences, were instantly confronted with disarranged finances, interrupted commerce, the temporary disappearance of outside markets, and a Treasury deficit through decrease of tariff revenues. We have no alternative but to provide against the deficiency. Our people, ever loyal and ready for any sacrifice demanded for the general good, are seconding our efforts and will support our policy, however onerous the burden, so long as it may be necessary.

And whatever may be said to the contrary, Mr. President, the people know that but for the Underwood Act our deficit would be far larger than is now possible. It would be increased by the difference between its amount and the revenue from the income tax, less the old corporation excise tax of 1 per cent, all of which under the old law was realized from imports. I am familiar with the contention that by retaining the duty on sugar our import duties would not now be sensibly diminished, but that contention is fallacious. Cuba had one customer for her raw sugars when war was declared. She has many now. Europe, and England especially, must obtain her supplies from the cane-growing countries, and they are doing so. Much of the rise in sugar is unavoidable, for the supply has been almost cut in two. To imagine that under existing and normal conditions Cuban sugars would keep flowing, duty burdened, to the United States when they are eagerly sought for at better prices elsewhere, and free from duty, is to reject the experiences of mankind and to ignore the operation of the law of supply and demand. Let us be thankful, then, that the baleful genius of protection was dismissed and discarded by America before the occurrence of a war, which demonstrates its artificial and uncertain benefits by carrying it to extremes from which its most loyal votary recoils.

For if protection be a good thing for a people, there can not be too much of it. If a protection wall 10 feet high is a benefit, a protection wall ten times as high must be a tenfold benefit. Therefore a wall so high as to be unscalable must be an unmixed benefit. The war in Europe for a short time after its outbreak was almost such a wall. Should England and Germany become, as they may, rival scourges of the sea, protection to American industries will become supreme. This will be the opportunity of the protectionist, not unlike but greater than those of the past. Verily his theories may then be tested. When foreign goods are excluded utterly and our exports are no more, we should, if they be sound, prosper upon a scale sometimes dreamed of but never hoped for.

Out of evil cometh good, and from blood and tears our commercial isolation may ensue. But the blessing which beckons may elude us.

Mr. President, we have keenly felt the afflictions of Europe's mighty struggle, and will probably do so for some time to come; yet it is as true as it ever was that misfortune to some spells good fortune to others. The manufacturers of sugar are among the favored ones of the hour. They were prosperous when the war came; they are soon to garner a harvest of wealth whose abundance can be encompassed only by man's imagination.

Fifteen years ago Mr. Henry T. Oxnard declared over his own signature that beet sugar at 3 cents paid a good profit and at 4 cents a large profit to the refiner. Since then improved methods of extraction and refinement have reduced the cost of production and prompted huge capitalizations far exceeding the sums invested in the beet-sugar industry and returning large dividends for their holders. It is conservative to declare that the crop of 1914 will command an extraordinary and unexpected profit of 3 cents a pound over and above the normal, a profit which should be shared at least with the producer and, in my judgment, with the consumer as well.

The World Almanac for 1914 gives the total consumption of sugar in the United States for 1912 as 3,504,182 tons, or 7,008,364,000 pounds, on which an extra profit of 3 cents would be $210,250,920. This fairly represents the burden placed by the European war upon consumers of sugar in the United States for the ensuing year. Of the amount of sugar consumed in 1912, 541,000 tons, or 1,082,000,000 pounds, was beet sugar produced in the United States. Assuming the output of 1914 to be equal to this amount, the refiners will realize an extraordinary profit of $32,460,000. In 1912 the State of Colorado produced 111,703 tons, or 223,406,000 pounds, of beet sugar. If the crop of 1914 equals this, the refiners will, at 3 cents per pound, harvest an unexpected and extraordinary profit of $6,702,180, or half as much money as they ever invested in their plants. Should not these enormous returns, the result of great international upheavals, and coming from the consumers of the land, be shared with the growers of beets? Should not some concession be made to those who must contribute these moneys because they can not help themselves?

Last winter the growers in my State were required to accept a reduced price for their 1914 beets because the refiners declared their inability in the face of a reduced tariff duty to pay more. They passed the anticipated loss on to the material man, who could pass it no further. In view of these conditions the Democratic Party of Colorado declared in its platform recently adopted that the refiner having compelled the grower to bear a great part of the anticipated loss on profits should now divide these extra profits with him. Within a week afterwards the Great Western Sugar Co. announced that it would pay for beets upon the scale of 1913, or an increase of 50 cents per ton. This announcement appeared in the Rocky Mountain News of October 1, from which I quote:

> The European war has brought benefits to the growers of sugar beets in Colorado. As a direct result of the war it was announced the Great Western Sugar Co. to-day sent letters to all growers serving it announcing a 50-cent increase per ton over the price contracted for last spring. The increase will be paid on all beets delivered when the company's campaign starts this fall under the spring contracts.
> The same price will prevail this fall as prevailed in 1913, which is based on a sliding scale dependent on the percentage of saccharine per ton and averaging about $5.50 a ton. According to William D. Lippitt, of the Great Western Co., the officials of the company believed at the time the 1914 contracts were issued that a reduction in the price of refined sugar was to be expected corresponding to the tariff reduction. The war, creating an extraordinary demand and keeping up prices, changed those conditions, he said, and resulted in the decision of the officials to pay at the same rate as called for under the 1913 contracts, even though the contracts for 1914, calling for a 50-cent decrease, had been signed and could be enforced.

Mr. President, upon its face this action of the sugar company would appear to be an act of voluntary generosity. When we consider that the added value to a ton of beets carrying 15 per cent of sugar at 2 cents a pound is $6, the amount of the gratuity to the beet grower from the refiner appears very small by comparison.

It is said that this added price will mean the distribution of about $750,000 among the farmers of northern Colorado. This is commendable, but it does not go far enough. If it was right that the farmers should be docked last January because of an anticipated decrease of profit to the refiner, it is right that they should enjoy a similar proportion of a large and unexpected profit.

Mere reimbursement of the docked amount is not sufficient. It must not be forgotten that the profit I am considering is but a part of the whole. The refiners have their normal profit besides. That they should keep. But this great windfall dropping into their laps from the war clouds of Europe should inure to the whole industry. The country has for years been told that the beet-sugar industry was a boon to the farmer; that it should be nurtured and hothoused for his sake; that it enriched his lands and his pocket; that his was the paramount interest; and that the refiner was but the medium of supply to the consumer. Let the grower reap a part of the golden fruit of 1914, since the people pay for it all.

And the people of the Rocky Mountain West, what of them? Why continue to add to their sugar tax the freight rate from the East? What reason now justifies, if it ever justified, a greater charge for sugar at the factory door than at the Missouri River 600 miles away? Why make the consumer pay a transportation charge which the commodity never bore? At this time when special taxes must burden all, the beneficiaries of the conditions which make them necessary can do no better service to the country and themselves than to distribute a portion of their sudden and unexpected accumulations among their less fortunate but equally deserving fellow citizens. Their clamor for continued governmental protection would be more likely to secure attention, if accompanied by such a manifestation of justice and equity.

Mr. President, as long ago as 1902 I sounded the warning that the weakness of the beet-sugar industry was not in tariffs, but in seed; that dependence upon Germany for seed was fraught with many dangers, a trade war, a prohibitory export duty, a short crop, or a general European war. The last has come, and the industry is menaced with real disaster. I am told that provision will be made by extraordinary exertion for 1915. But what of 1916 and succeeding years?

The beet is a biennial, and the sugar men have been too busy watering stocks and making dividends upon them, too greedy for beets as they come from the fields, to raise their own seed and free themselves from their dependence for it upon Germany. Would it not be well; is it not essential that we now give hostage to fortune by ceasing to whine about tariffs and turning our attention to beet-seed culture? A little common sense, chastened by a severe experience, will mean more to the future of this great industry than all the tariff schedules of all the tariff infamies of the past.

Mr. President, the pending emergency tax bill imposes an unusual though a needed burden upon our people. For the first time in our history this burden has been cast upon us by external forces beyond our control. We did not cause it, and therefore we can not avoid it. We have endeavored to distribute its exactions fairly with due regard for all interests and keeping in mind the precedents of the past. We believe the public need for the law to be transient, and we have therefore provided for its expiration on December 31, 1915. We know that every interest levied upon feels, as it always does, that the tolls placed upon it are too large or that they should have been placed elsewhere. But that is true of every tax ever devised by the wit of man. Our duty has not been a pleasant one, but a duty nevertheless, and therefore to be performed. Those who criticize and complain of our action should point to some method or object of taxation so just and fair as to command approval, some tax that would be popular, some revenue-raising process at once satisfactory and successful. But we are all conscious of the fact that until human nature changes and human intelligence reaches perfection laws which levy upon the substance of the people for defraying the expenses of government are framed with difficulty, obeyed with reluctance, and resisted with energy. Yet I indulge the belief that the people will soon recognize in this measure a law which fairly and justly meets a great national exigency, comparing favorably with those of 1862 and 1898, and responding well to the needs which gave it birth.

The Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES], in a short speech delivered this afternoon, undertook to establish the proposition that the need for this extraordinary revenue was due to the course of Democratic legislation and of Democratic policy since the beginning of the present administration. He quoted a number of statistics concerning the railway and transportation business of the country as an index of the facts upon which his assertion was based; and if I understood him correctly, contended that these figures were a virtual demonstration of the soundness of his charge.

Mr. President, I am not now going into the causes of that depressed condition which, beginning some time in 1912 or before, has since continued with greater or less degree, not alone in the United States but throughout all the world, because I think it is now generally recognized by the people—certainly by all thinking men who are fair-minded—that the enormous waste of the Balkan War, the enormous investments in questionable securities, and particularly railway securities, the enormous armaments of the older countries of the world both on land and on sea, the vast deficits resulting from their fiscal policies and expenditures, particularly at the close of the year 1913, the additional burdensome taxation made necessary because of these deficiencies—all these things have combined to stretch credit to the breaking point, and as a consequence to affect commerce and the securities markets everywhere.

I have had my attention called during the past six months, chiefly before the beginning of the European war, to trade conditions in the several countries with which our principal foreign commerce is carried on, and I assert as a general conclusion that the world before the commencement of this war, outside of the United States, faced a condition where its fixed charges were fully one-half of the productive energies of its people; that before the producers of England, of France, of Germany, of Austria, of Italy, of Russia, and of Japan could call a single dollar of their earnings their own they were compelled to yield practically 50 per cent of those earnings to the State—not for the cancellation of debt, not to decrease the amount of their burdens, but to meet the fixed charges upon them plus the cost of maintaining and continuing their Governments.

Mr. President, ever since the days of the Pentateuch all of our great financial depressions have been due to the fact that the burdens of the world's debts reached a figure which the existing civilization could not support, and when that point is reached there must necessarily be a rebalancing of the books, a charging off of indebtedness, and a rearrangement of fiscal affairs. All nations have been confronted with these conditions, some perhaps to a greater extent than others, some being burdened by the weight of private credits as contradistinguished from those of a national character, others by combinations of both.

During the panic of 1893 Mr. Frederick C. Waite, who was then statistician of the Treasury Department, wrote a letter to one of my predecessors, the lamented Henry M. Teller, calling attention to this great fact in financial history, giving the vast increase of personal and of public debts in the United States and demonstrating the fact that the panic under which we were then suffering was the direct and logical outcome of this condition; that the credit of the country had been strained to the breaking point; that the existing civilization could no longer support the vast aggregate of obligations, both public and private; and that as a consequence disaster must come. Liquidation followed, and then the Nation again moved on.

The Senator complained, and I think very justly so, Mr. President, of the attitude of the railways of the East in seeking to reopen the question of an increase of 5 per cent in freight rates, upon which hearings will be had in the near future by the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. President, the railroads I have no doubt are in a distressed condition, many of them, perhaps most of them. They are finding difficulty in meeting many of their fixed charges. The railroads, many of them, will be unable—and I speak now not of those which are identified with the 5 per cent controversy, but generally—will be compelled to readjust their finances, either through the agency of receiverships or by concurrence of their creditors, sooner or later, no matter what the action of the Interstate Commerce Commission may be, for it is the history of railway finance in America that debt succeeds unto debt and capitalization unto capitalization; that the vast sum of our railroad bonded indebtedness can not be paid, never will be paid, is not expected to be paid; that when bonded issues mature they are met by extended bonded issues in almost every instance in excess of the amounts outstanding.

Mr. President, no man and therefore no corporation can conduct business upon borrowed money forever, especially when the amount of the indebtedness is continually increasing and more than keeping pace with the extension of the business. But that has been the course of railway finance in the United States with two or three distinct and honorable exceptions ever since the day of railway consolidation began. Their incomes have increased out of all proportion to the incomes of the average business corporation; yet they are always behind, always borrowing money, always increasing their capitalization, always staving off the final day with which they must be confronted, because of a policy that essentially spells ultimate ruin.

The New York World of to-day or of yesterday contains an account of a proposal of the Baltimore & Ohio Co. to issue a general line of bonded securities, amounting to $600,000,000, for the purpose of taking in and retiring all of their outstanding bonded issues, thus following the example of the Great Northern in a similar amount and the New York Central in the sum of $500,000,000. I think it safe to say that the proposed new issue exceeds the combined sum of the earlier ones.

Mr. President, without any reflection upon the manner in which these huge sums have been used, without any criticism of that policy which always charges an increase of equipment to capital account but which never credits anything to that account by reason of discarded or worn-out equipment, without criticizing in any manner this policy, I assert, and I do not believe it can be contradicted, that the ultimate destiny of all the great railroad concerns in the country is a reorganization through a receivership or through a voluntary retirement or cancellation of the major portions of their huge indebtedness.

I read the other day, Mr. President, the statement of the locomotive firemen and engineers of the western railroads given to the public in support of their demand for an increased wage. This was a calm, considerate, and well-prepared document, and presented to the reader schedules showing increase of earnings and of business of each and every one of the roads involved for a considerable time prior to their demand, which is now pending before the Board of Mediation; and I venture to assert that no man, however prejudiced he may be either for or against this demand, can read that statement without reaching the conviction that these men are not only entitled to a greater proportion of the earnings of these roads than they are receiving, but that they can be paid without in any wise embarrassing their financial condition. This statement also shows the vastly increased amounts of stocks and of securities which these great systems have issued during the same period. This constantly progressive increase of indebtedness must inevitably spell disaster sooner or later, without regard to the wage rate of employees.

But coming back for a moment, Mr. President, to the statements of the Senator from Washington concerning railroad business, I have a few figures that I want to submit upon the same subject and taken from the same source.

I think the number of idle cars at a given time may be said to be a fair index of the activity or its absence of the railroad transportation business of the country. If that is a test, then the figures to which I call attention are quite as conclusive as those which were used by the Senator from Washington if not more so. The number of idle cars in this country on the 29th day of April, 1908, was 413,338. That was in a period of great prosperity, as a matter of course, because the Republican Party was in full control of the Government, with their redoubtable champion and leader, Mr. Roosevelt, in the White House. On the 6th day of January, 1909, the number of idle cars had decreased to 382,513, Mr. Roosevelt still being the occupant of the White House; on the 31st day of May, 1914, the number of idle cars had decreased to 241,802; and on the 1st day of July, 1914, one month before the outbreak of the great European conflict, the number of idle cars in the country had decreased to 219,542. We were progressing, Mr. President, rapidly toward a prosperous and satisfactory condition in this country, for the very good reason that the country had been blessed with an enormous crop of unusual proportions, and, after all, it is the prosperity of the farmer, the tiller of the soil, which spells prosperity for the Nation.

Another reason, Mr. President, is found in the fact that this Nation was in better condition in all respects than any of the others, having vastly greater resources and vastly greater opportunities. The European war came, and with it, of course, everything changed in an instant.

I agree, Mr. President, very fully with the Senator from Washington in his objection to the levying of an added tax whenever it can be avoided, and particularly to a tax through the 5 per cent increase of railway rates east of the city of Chicago and north of the Ohio River to the Atlantic seaboard. The business of a railroad company, like the business of any other company or the business of an individual, may become depressed, but should the people, through governmental agencies, for that reason be taxed by authorizing the depressed business to increase its rates to the public? If we do so for the railroads, should we not do so for every other pursuit, many of which are suffering in consequence of European conditions? Are the railroads of the United States any greater objects of solicitude to the Government than are the cotton planters of the South or the copper miners of the West?

Few perhaps realize what this 5 per cent means. In the aggregate it means an added $50,000,000 to the annual transportation bill of the United States.

Mr. President, I have here a copy of the statement which was made to the President of the United States last month by the railways, at the time a request was made for a reconsideration of this demand. Among other things, it gives a list of the railroad securities in default up to September 1, aggregating $578,672,956—an enormous amount of securities, an enormous indebtedness; more than half as much as the interest-bearing indebtedness of the United States, and more than half as much as the bonded indebtedness of the city of New York—more than half a billion dollars. Of course, it follows that, inasmuch as these securities have already defaulted, those who are responsible for them are, to use a common expression, decidedly "up against it." If, however, the list of securities is examined, it is easily perceivable that the great proportion of them are issues of railways now under investigation or which ought to be under investigation; railways which have been exploited by the financial managements which have had complete control of them, and which are responsible for their unhappy condition.

But the remarkable part of this showing, Mr. President, is that of this total aggregate of more than $578,000,000, only $14,655,600 of the amount are defaulted securities of roads east of Pittsburgh and Buffalo, upon roads within that section where the commission denied the petition for an increase of 5 per cent, or, in fact, any increase at all. Therefore, of the roads, Mr. President, asking for relief through the agency of the Interstate Commerce Commission, and because of defaulted securities, there are but $14,655,600 that are in default at all. It may be, and doubtless is, true that, owing to present conditions, there will be greater defaults hereafter in that section of the country; but I am calling attention to the showing then made; and in order that the country may perceive the fact, I ask unanimous consent to insert this extract as a part of my remarks.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, permission is granted.

The extract referred to is as follows:

SEEKS RELIEF FOR RAILROAD FINANCES—COMMITTEE ASKS PRESIDENT WILSON TO AID IN REMOVING ANTAGONISM—WANTS APPEAL TO PEOPLE—URGED THAT CHANGE OF SENTIMENT AND ATTITUDE WOULD RESULT IN BENEFIT TO ENTIRE COUNTRY.

Railroad presidents, representing the leading railroad systems of the United States, to-day requested President Wilson to call to the attention of the country "the pressing necessity for support of railroad credit" by governmental authorities and the public, and the further need of the railroads for additional revenue, which will not only enable them to meet their indebtedness in the present crisis imposed by the European war, but also to carry out their wage agreements, maintain their domestic credit, and provide for their normal development. These requests were laid before the President at a conference at the White House, at the conclusion of which the President announced that he had taken the request under consideration and would state his position later.

Chairman Trumbull, of the Chesapeake & Ohio and the Missouri, Kansas & Texas Railways, acted as spokesman. He laid before the President a written statement, setting out the position of the railway men of the country.

The others in the committee were Samuel Rea, president of the Pennsylvania; Daniel Willard, president of the Baltimore & Ohio; Fairfax Harrison, president of the Southern; E. P. Ripley, president of the Santa Fe; and Hale Holden, president of the Burlington.

WILL GIVE CAREFUL CONSIDERATION.

The president agreed to give careful consideration to the statement of the railroad men, but made no promises on their requests. He is understood to favor the view that the railroads need assistance.

The specific requests of the railroad men were:

"That the President will call the attention of the country to the pressing necessity for support of railroad credit by the cooperative and sympathetic effort of the public and of all governmental authorities, and that the railroads be relieved as far as possible of further immediate burdens involving additional expense.

"That the President will urge a practical recognition of the fact that an emergency is upon the railroads which requires, in the public interest, that they have an additional revenue and that the appropriate governmental agencies seek a way by which such additional revenues may be properly and promptly provided.

"The credit of the railroads," said the statement, "seriously impaired, as we believe, before the war started, is now confronted by an emergency of a magnitude without parallel in history."

The railroad men left the White House greatly encouraged by the frank and open nature of the conference with the President, which they described as satisfactory in every way so far as freedom of presentation of their argument was concerned. Frank Trumbull, chairman of the board of the Chesapeake & Ohio and the Missouri, Kansas & Texas Railroads, who headed the committee, declined to add to the official statement of his committee and referred all inquiries as to the attitude of the President to the White House.

WHAT REQUESTS COVER.

As interpreted in Washington the requests made of the President by the railroad presidents include not only an increase in net earnings of the roads by an increase in rates, probably both freight and passenger, but also a restraint on the part of Congress and State legislatures relative to further railroad regulation at this time. The inference conveyed in the official statement of railroad men is that the railroads of the country are now carrying a heavier burden than they can bear without assistance.

In this connection the decision of the Senate to postpone further action at this session on the Rayburn bill, which proposes to regulate and supervise the issues of railroad securities, may be fairly taken as an indication of the views of the administration on the railroad situation. This measure is one of the recognized administration bills for the regulation of big business. It was originally a part of the Democratic Party program at this session of Congress. Following an informal preliminary statement of the situation by railroad men to high officials of the administration 10 days ago the President interposed no objection when it was proposed in the Senate to drop this legislation at this session.

WAR CLOSES SECURITY MARKETS.

The war, according to prominent railroad men, has done three things: It has closed Europe as a market for investment securities for an indefinite time; it has brought about liquidation of American securities held abroad to the extent that may necessitate this country repurchasing from Europe a large part of the $5,000,000,000 worth estimated to be held abroad. This estimate is by Sir George Paish, editor of the Statist, now assisting the English chancellor of the exchequer.

In connection with this, the committee laid before the President the amount of the defaults by railroads in the payment of principal and interest on bonds and short-term notes up to the present time, the maturities still to be met this year, and those which will fall due in 1915.

SECURITIES ALREADY DEFAULTED.

These figures are startling. The following list, which is compiled by a man who has been prominent in railroad circles and has been in close touch with the financial situation for many years, is believed to be absolutely authentic.

The list of securities in default up to September 1 shows an aggregate of $578,672,956. In detail it is as follows:

St. L. & S. F. g. lien 5s, May 1, 1914	$69,524,000

Mr. THOMAS. Now, Mr. President, I have no intention of detaining the Senate longer on this Saturday afternoon. I have spoken at greater length than I intended, my original purpose being merely to read a short speech into the RECORD. I have been impelled to add somewhat to it because of the insistence of the Senator from Washington that Democratic legislation and Democratic policy have been the fruitful parent of all the ills of the present day.

RECESS.

Mr. KERN. I understand there are no Senators who are ready to proceed with the debate on the pending bill this afternoon. Therefore I move that the Senate take a recess until Monday morning at 11 o'clock.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 3 o'clock and 12 minutes p. m., Saturday, October 10, 1914) the Senate took a recess until Monday, October 12, 1914, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, October 10, 1914.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou who has ever been our refuge and our strength through all the vicissitudes of the past, continue, we beseech Thee, to favor us, and may we ever remember that righteousness exalteth a nation, while sin is a reproach to any people; that with vigilance we may preserve our liberty with honesty, our integrity with truth, our dignity and honor with enthusiasm, and go forward to grander attainments under the spiritual leadership of Thy son Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I move that the Journal be approved.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

DISPOSITION OF PAPERS IN THE EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENTS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a report (H. Rept. 1183) by Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland, from the Joint Select Committee on Disposition of Useless Executive Papers, which was read and ordered filed.

BOARD OF MANAGERS, SOLDIERS' HOME.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I move to take from the Speaker's table House joint resolution 241, appointing a board for the soldiers' home, with Senate amendments, and move to concur in the Senate amendments.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of House joint resolution 241 with Senate amendments. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object——

Mr. OGLESBY. Mr. Speaker, I just want to ask the gentleman from Virginia if these Senate amendments made any change in the names of the men selected for the Board of Managers?

Mr. HAY. No; it simply increases the board and added one name to those which were in the resolution when it passed the House. Does the gentleman from Illinois desire to ask any questions?

Mr. MANN. I would like to know what the Senate amendments are.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution and the amendments.

The Clerk read as follows:

H. J. Res. 241. Joint resolution for the appointment of four members for the Board of Managers for the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers.

The joint resolution and the Senate amendments were read.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I understand one of the amendments increases the number of the members of the board. Is that correct?

Mr. HAY. Yes; that is correct. It increases them from five to seven.

Mr. MANN. Well, I make the point of order that that requires consideration in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and without unanimous consent the bill must be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The SPEAKER. Do these men draw any salary, or not?

Mr. HAY. They do not draw salary, but the Government pays them their expenses—traveling expenses, and so forth.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks, while it is a very close shave, it takes it to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, is the reservation of objection still made?

The SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. HAY. I do not understand the gentleman from Illinois objected to the consideration of it.

Mr. MANN. I reserved the right to object. I do not wish to object as far as the regular order was concerned. I think it ought to go to the committee to determine whether the resolution we have enacted reducing the number shall now be changed and the number be again increased.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, this is a matter concerning which there was very considerable contest here in the House, as I recall, and if it were opened up again here in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union there would still be that contest again, provided the same gentlemen were here who then fought the question of reducing the number. I hope the gentleman will not make the request now if it is to go into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this joint resolution may be considered in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union immediately after the consideration of the Philippine bill.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, we have an order set immediately after that, and I think the resolution ought to go to the committee and the committee should report on it first.

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman objecting?

Mr. MANN. Well, I am asking to have it referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the first request of the gentleman for immediate consideration?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. Now, the gentleman asks that this resolution be considered in the Committee of the Whole House immediately after the disposition of the Philippine bill. Is there objection?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask the gentleman to include in his request that it shall not interfere with the revenue bill when it comes back.

Mr. HAY. I will do that.

The SPEAKER. With the understanding that it will not interfere with the war-revenue bill.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, we have already made one special order following the bill. The gentleman can just as well make the request after the disposition of the Philippine bill.

Mr. HAY. That is what I did.

Mr. MANN. The request can be made just as well after as now. I do not think it saves anything.

Mr. HAY. If the gentleman from Illinois will agree that it is not necessary for this resolution to go to the Committee on Military Affairs——

Mr. MANN. But I think it ought to go to the Committee on Military Affairs and let them report on it.

Mr. HAY. Well, Mr. Speaker, I make my request, and if the gentleman desires to object, of course he can do so.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent that this joint resolution be considered in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union immediately after the disposition of the Philippine bill, provided it is not to interfere with the consideration of the war-tax bill.

Mr. GOULDEN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to inquire of the gentleman from Virginia the exact change made in this joint resolution by the Senate. I did not catch it, owing to the noise and confusion in the House.

Mr. HAY. The board is increased by the Senate from five to seven, and one additional name was added to the names which were already in the resolution when it passed the House.

Mr. GOULDEN. I sincerely hope, Mr. Speaker, that the committee will not agree to the change in conference. The bill as it passed the House is satisfactory.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. I object.

THE PHILIPPINE ISLANDS.

The SPEAKER. Under the special rule, the House will resolve itself automatically into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 18459, and the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD] will take the chair.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 18459) to declare the purpose of the people of the United States as to the future political status of the people of the Philippine Islands, and to provide a more autonomous government for those islands, with Mr. FLOOD of Virginia in the chair.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 15. That until otherwise provided by the Philippine Legislature herein provided for the qualifications of voters for senators and representatives in the Philippines and all officers elected by the people shall be as follows.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I did not know the Clerk had commenced reading the next section. I ask, Mr. Chairman, in accordance with the agreement that, I think, was made yesterday, to return to section 13.

The CHAIRMAN. The understanding when the committee rose last night was that sections 13 and 14 would be subject to amendment. Does the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] ask unanimous consent to return to section 13 first?

Mr. TOWNER. Yes; for the purpose, Mr. Chairman, of offering this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. That is in accordance with the understanding of the committee. The gentleman will send his amendment to the desk.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the word "four," in line 11, page 10, and insert in lieu thereof the word "six."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, on page 10, line 11, by striking out the word "four" and inserting in lieu thereof the word "six."

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I am going to ask the gentleman to modify his amendment so as to make it read in this way:

Six and three, as hereinafter provided.

Mr. TOWNER. This has reference only to the Senate, I will say to the gentleman.

Mr. JONES. Of course; but it is proposed to provide hereafter that one-half the senators for the first term shall be elected for three years——

Mr. TOWNER. Very well; I have no objection.

Mr. JONES. This is to make the language of this section harmonize with that of one that follows, as it is proposed to amend that section.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment as modified.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert the words "six and three."

Mr. JONES. "As hereinafter provided."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER].

Mr. JONES. "As hereinafter provided" should come after the word "years."

Mr. STAFFORD. I thought the amendment was going to be voted upon, and I wished to rise in opposition to the amendment if the gentleman from Iowa did not wish to take any time. If the gentleman will yield, I wish to say that I understand the purpose is to create a six-year term for members of the senate, and I am in perfect harmony with that suggestion. I do not agree with the proposed form of the amendment suggested by the chairman of the committee. I think we should modify it as suggested by the gentleman from Iowa—change the "four" to "six"—and then make a provision as suggested by the gentleman from Missouri yesterday—that one half at the first election be elected for three years and the other half for six years.

Mr. JONES. I agree with the gentleman from Iowa. The change which it is agreed shall be made in a subsequent section makes it very necessary that this amendment shall be modified as I have suggested.

Mr. STAFFORD. I do not think there is any need of putting three years in this place where you fix the regular term for six years. The three-year term can be provided for in the suggested amendment—those elected first, one-half to hold office for three years, and thereafter for six.

Mr. JONES. It makes it perfectly plain, and there can be no objection to it.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I will take my time now, if the gentleman will allow me, because the matter can be entirely explained. To make this charge that is now agreed to by the members of the committee, changing the provision in the bill by which senators and representatives each have a term of four years, it has been finally agreed to upon conference that we shall modify that, giving the senators a term of six years and representatives a term of three years, and I will say in passing that that has also received the approval of the Philippine Commissioner, Mr. QUEZON. In order to do that it will necessitate changes in three sections. It will necessitate a change in section 13 of the provision of four years for senators to six years. It is suggested by the chairman that that should also read "six and three as hereinafter provided." I have no objection, because that will be fully explained in a subsequent section. Then it will be necessary to change section 14 from "quadrennially" to "triennially," because the term of representatives is changed from four years to three years. Then it will be necessary to change section 16, and I will ask the attention of the committee to the change that will be made necessary in this section. The provision that I shall ask to have stricken out and will offer a substitute for is in line 13, commencing with the sentence following the word "districts," as follows:

The first election hereafter shall be held on the first Tuesday of June, 1915, and there shall be chosen at such election senators and representatives to the Philippine Legislature.

That I will move to strike out and substitute in lieu thereof the following provision:

The first election under the provisions of this act——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. TOWNER. I shall have to ask unanimous consent for five minutes more, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent for five minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. TOWNER. The provision which I shall ask to insert is as follows:

The first election under the provisions of this act shall be held on the 1st day of June, 1915, and there shall be chosen at such election one senator from each senate district for a term of three years and one for six years.

That provides for the first election following the adoption or putting into effect of this law. Then the provision goes on:

Thereafter one senator from each district shall be elected from each senate district for a term of six years.

Gentlemen will understand, of course, that it is provided that each senate district shall be entitled to two senators. The provision by which one senator is elected for three years will enable the senate to be continuing, one-half of it to be elected every three years. Then the provision is as follows:

That at said first election each representative district shall elect one representative for a term of three years and triennially thereafter.

I will say to the gentlemen of the committee that I think these are the only changes required to correspond with the desire of the committee as expressed yesterday quite clearly, and the arrangement is satisfactory to the committee, both to the majority and the minority side.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. TOWNER. Yes.

Mr. MANN. What will happen, then, in reference to the election of Resident Commissioners to represent the Philippine Islands in this House?

Mr. TOWNER. I will say to the gentleman that that may be hereafter provided for.

Mr. MANN. It is provided for in this bill that they shall be elected at the regular election, to hold for a term of four years. Of course, that would be impossible under the gentleman's provision to elect every four years where you have elections biennially, and then if you elect the Resident Commissioner at the regular election for these three years you elect a Commissioner to take his seat in the middle of a term of Congress.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will permit me to make a remark there——

Mr. TOWNER. Yes.

Mr. JONES. I will say that I recognize the force of what the gentleman from Illinois has said, and when we reach that section I shall propose to change that to a three-year term instead of four years. The Representative from the Philippines does not object to the shortening of the term.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman will see, then, that the Resident Commissioner would come from the Philippines and be at the long session of Congress, and then there would be another one at the short session of Congress. That certainly would have some objectionable features.

Mr. JONES. I also perceive the force of that, and I will say to the gentleman that when we reach that section we will endeavor to agree upon some proposition that will be satisfactory to everybody, so as to avoid having too many elections and the cost incident thereto.

Mr. TOWNER. I will say to the gentleman that, of course, the bill will have to be amended to correspond with this change. This change is made necessary for the reason that under the terms of the bill the terms of the senators and representatives all expire at one time, and thereby the very desirable feature of a continuing senate is lost. All agree now that that should be provided for, and we have agreed to this change that is now suggested.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TOWNER. Yes.

Mr. MANN. I have no desire to make any criticisms of the three or six year terms. But may I ask is that enforced anywhere under the jurisdiction of the United States now?

Mr. TOWNER. I think not, I will say to the gentleman. I know of no such provision anywhere in any State.

Mr. MANN. What is the objection to making it two years and four years?

Mr. TOWNER. The only objection that has arisen, I will say to the gentleman, is that urged by the Commissioner here, who, I understand, represents the sentiment of the Philippine Islands; and that is this——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I shall have to ask for five minutes' more time.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. TOWNER. That is based on two reasons. The first is that it is a very costly thing to have an election in the Philippine Islands, and the next is that they consider that it is best for their interests that frequent elections shall not be had. In fact, the provision in the bill is, as the gentleman knows, that the members of the assembly shall be elected every four years, and it was in accordance with their desire that that provision was made. Now, this amendment proposes a reduction of the term to three years instead of four, and elections will probably be held one year oftener than they would under the original terms of the bill.

Mr. MANN. Have the members of the committee considered, then, the question of a four-year and eight-year term?

Mr. TOWNER. That has been considered, I will say to the gentleman.

Mr. MANN. It is manifestly impossible to elect a Commissioner every three years, unless you break into the middle of a term in the House. Otherwise if you elect every four years you will have to have this extra election, which you were trying to avoid, and which ought not to be had. A special election in the Philippine Islands would elect the Resident Commissioner.

Mr. TOWNER. I will say to the gentleman that that is a condition that we can not avoid; but I see no serious objection to electing the Commissioner every three years and every six years.

Mr. MANN. I can see a serious objection to electing the Resident Commissioner every three years. Here, for example, is the Philippine bill that we have pending before us. It will not pass the Senate at this session of Congress, as we know. The Resident Commissioner might be reelected; but supposing his term was out and they elected a new man to come here for the new session of Congress next winter. It would be highly objectionable to have a new man enter upon his service in the midst of this legislation.

Mr. JONES. What would the gentleman think of making the term of the Resident Commissioner six years?

Mr. MANN. I do not see much reason for making it four years. It is a matter of detail, and the gentleman will know more about that than I do, whether it ought to be six years; but it certainly ought not to be three years, when the term of Congress is two years. It ought not to break into the middle of a term.

Mr. JONES. I will say to the gentleman that when we reach that section we will try to reach some agreement that will be satisfactory.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I wish to make this statement in justice to myself: I shall not oppose the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] and the general line of amendments that are to follow, because I understand that an agreement to accept such amendments has been reached in conference with the gentleman from Virginia and other members of the committee and the Resident Commissioner. But so far as my own personal opinions are concerned, I wish to say that I do not share in the belief expressed by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER] on yesterday, and which he has so often expressed, that it is a dangerous thing or an undesirable thing to have the senate term coequal with the term of the members of the house of representatives. Public sentiment changes, and it is entirely possible, if there be a change in public sentiment, to bring about a change in the executive department of the Philippine Government and in the house of representatives in the Philippine Government, and yet leave in the senate a sufficient number of members to block that sentiment as expressed at a popular election. I say this, although I do not propose to oppose it after the action of the committee; but so far as my own personal views are concerned I am not convinced of the necessity of it.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask a question of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. JONES]. In view of what has been stated by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] and other considerations which have accompanied the discussion, does the gentleman think there is any possibility of our agreeing on a four and an eight year term instead of three and six?

Mr. JONES. I do not.

Mr. MILLER. I admit that my amendment was to make the senatorial term six years.

Mr. JONES. When the subject was informally discussed on yesterday, the proposition of the gentleman from Iowa was simply to leave the senatorial term at four years and have one half of the senate elected at one time and the other half at another. I think the gentleman from Minnesota suggested six years for the senatorial term and three for the house of representatives.

Mr. MILLER. That is because I thought that that would be acceptable.

Mr. JONES. Personally I prefer four and two year terms, respectively, for senators and representatives, but out of deference to others I am willing to make the terms six and three years, respectively. That is as far as I would be willing to go.

Mr. BOOHER. Mr. Chairman, I do not think that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa ought to be modified as suggested by the chairman of the committee. If you fix the term of a senator at six years and three years, you have two definite terms fixed, and then you have to elect senators for six and senators for three years. The term ought to be fixed at six years, as provided in the amendment.

Mr. JONES. If that were the amendment, then what the gentleman says would be true, but the gentleman has overlooked the fact that the language is "six and three years as hereinafter provided." In a subsequent section it is provided that only for the first term shall senators be elected for three years.

Mr. BOOHER. Then it is only for the first election that they are elected for six years and three years, and thereafter they are elected for six years?

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. BOOHER. With that information, I have no objection to the amendment as modified.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, has section 14 been read?

The CHAIRMAN. It has.

Mr. TOWNER. I move to strike out, on page 10, line 25, the word "quadrennial" and insert in lieu thereof the word "triennial."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 10, line 25, by striking out the word "quadrennial" and inserting the word "triennial."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The question was considered, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to return to section 10, in order that I may offer an amendment to the amendment which was adopted on yesterday. I will say before the request is submitted by the Chair that the amendment that I propose to offer has been submitted to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] and has his approval, as well as the approval of the Resident Commissioner, Mr. QUEZON.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent to return to section 10 in order that he may offer an amendment to the amendment adopted yesterday. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend the amendment adopted on yesterday by changing the words "ninety days" to "six months," so that the limit of time permitted the President of the United States in which to express his approval or disapproval of tariff acts, coinage acts, and acts with reference to the currency may be 6 months and not 90 days. I do this, Mr. Chairman, because, while I was of the opinion that 90 days was ample time in which the President could express his approval or disapproval of acts relating to land, mining, and timber acts, it may not be sufficient time to enable him to examine carefully and pass judgment upon a tariff bill.

It is likely that any tariff bill passed by the Philippine Legislature would be just as lengthy as one passed by the Congress of the United States. It is likely to contain three or four thousand items. It is entirely possible that there might be in such an act provisions contravening stipulations in the trade agreements which the United States has with foreign countries. If that should be so, of course the United States, retaining sovereignty over the Philippine Islands, would be held responsible, so to speak, for the action of the Philippine Government.

Mr. Chairman, a general tariff measure, on account of its many items and provisions of one kind or another, could not well be cabled here; it would have to be sent through the mails. It would take 40 days to send it and 40 to return it, and it would require many days for the President and his advisers to give it the careful consideration it deserved. Unless the President could give a bill of such importance as a general tariff measure the thorough examination required, he would be forced to disapprove it, which might be most unfortunate. I have submitted the amendment to the gentleman from Iowa, and he agrees fully with me that the change should be made. I discussed the matter also with the Resident Commissioner [Mr. QUEZON], who favored the amendment of the gentleman from Minnesota on yesterday, and he, too, agrees that the change I propose should be made.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Does not the gentleman think it would be wise, in view of the expressed sentiment here touching the matter of fixing the time in which the President can veto, which has been expressed in two sections and will doubtless be expressed in the same way in subsequent sections—does not the gentleman think it would be wise to have it uniform and have it all put in one section instead of putting it in each section as we come to it?

Mr. JONES. That is a matter of form.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. And it is a matter of good draftsmanship.

Mr. JONES. I do not know whether or not those who favored the 90-day limit as to lands would be willing now to accept a six-month limit, and therefore I would like to have this amendment adopted now. The gentleman can then ask to return to the other section. I understand the purpose of the gentleman, and if it be determined that the limit of time in which the President shall approve all acts shall be uniform, then a general provision to that effect can be prepared and adopted.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Put it all in one section.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have this amendment considered first.

Mr. GOULDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. GOULDEN. I should like to ask whether it is intended to have it begin from the date of the receipt by the President or from the time of its enactment by the Philippine Government?

Mr. JONES. The amendment states from its enactment and submission to the President.

Mr. MILLER. Ninety days after it reaches the President for his consideration.

Mr. GOULDEN. Ninety days from its reaching the President of the United States, as it now stands.

Mr. JONES. That is correct, and therefore we need not compute the time occupied in the transmission of measures from Manila to Washington.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I have no objection whatever to the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Virginia. In fact, my original amendment touching this matter was for six months, as the gentleman knows, and I changed it out of deference to his request; but does the gentleman not think that, in harmony with what the gentleman from Tennessee has stated, it would be advisable to have the same period of time in all of these cases in which it shall be necessary for the President of the United States to express his approval? I can conceive that a great deal of confusion might arise in the islands as to just how long the President had to consider a measure, just when it would go into effect without his approval, and in the interest of clearness and conciseness I believe I would request in conjunction with the gentleman that the preceding amendment be changed to 6 months from 90 days.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I am willing to accept the gentleman's suggestion, although I think that my amendment ought to be acted upon first.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia. As the Chair understands the amendment, the gentleman proposes to substitute 6 months in place of 90 days?

Mr. MANN. In section 10.

Mr. JONES. In section 10.

The CHAIRMAN. In the amendment adopted to section 10 on yesterday?

Mr. JONES. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JONES. Now, Mr. Chairman, at the suggestion of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER] I ask unanimous consent to return to section 9 so that I may be permitted to offer an amendment to the amendment which was adopted to that section.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent to return to section 9 to offer an amendment to the amendment already adopted to that section. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, that amendment came in at the top of page 8, on the first line, and I move that the words "6 months" be substituted for the words "90 days," as they appear in that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend the amendment by striking out "90 days" and inserting in lieu thereof "6 months."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, did I understand that section 14 has been read?

The CHAIRMAN. It has; but it has been read with the understanding that it is open to amendment.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, on yesterday afternoon, just before we adjourned, an amendment was adopted to section 13 which struck out the language at the end of the paragraph, beginning in line 20, after the word "election":

And who does not own in his individual right property, real or personal, situate in the Philippines.

That was as applied to the senate. I take it that in view that the great fear that the Government of the Philippines might pass into the hands of the plutocrats and the interests, although there was nothing whatever said as to the amount of property which anyone should own, that it would be wise to protect against that same danger in section 14, in respect to the members of the house of representatives, and consequently I offered to amend by striking out, in line 6, on page 11, after the word "language," the words:

And who does not own in his individual right property, real or personal, situate in the Philippines.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 11, lines 6, 7, and 8, after the word "language," in line 6, strike out the words "and who does not own in his individual right property, real or personal, situate in the Philippines."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend line 8, page 11, by striking out the words "a bona fide" and inserting in lieu thereof the words "an actual." I notice in the qualifications requisite for senators, in paragraph 13, that the senator must be an "actual" resident. There might be some conflict as between the words "an actual" and "a bona fide."

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, the statement of the gentleman as to the other section is entirely correct. I had supposed that the words were synonymous, but I am willing to accept the amendment and make it "an actual" instead of "a bona fide."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 11, line 8, by striking out the words "a bona fide" and inserting in lieu thereof "an actual."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of making an inquiry of the gentleman from Virginia. I call attention to the language in line 9 on page 11:

From which elected for at least one year prior to his election.

Does the chairman of the committee not think it would be better if that were to read "from which elected for at least one year next preceding his election"?

I can readily perceive that a man might be elected who has been a resident of that district for a year, but which residence might have been 15 or 20 years back, and still be prior. I do not want to be captious or anything like that, but it seems to me it might be in the interest of clearness to make that "immediately prior" or "next preceding."

Mr. JONES. I have no objection to inserting the word "immediately."

Mr. MILLER. I move to amend line 9, after the word "year," by inserting the word "immediately."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 11, line 9, by inserting after the word "year" the word "immediately."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, if that amendment is adopted, of course it ought to be uniform, and I ask unanimous consent to return to section 13, and in line 20, on page 10, to insert the word "immediately" after the word "year."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to return to section 13 to insert an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 10, line 20, by inserting after the word "year" the word "immediately."

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. Am I to understand that the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] to change "quadrennial," in line 25, to "triennial" has been adopted?

The CHAIRMAN. That amendment has been adopted.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words for the purpose of asking a question regarding the same matter. The gentleman from Tennessee has just suggested that there should be uniformity in the bill. In view of the adoption of the amendment as to "quadrennial" and "triennial," why should we not express it in years, "three years," as you do in section 13? This, of course, would involve going back again, but you say in section 13 as amended that the terms of senators shall be six years. Then, with respect to the members of the house of representatives, in section 14, you say "triennially." Why not make it "three years," so as to have it uniform?

Mr. JONES. The word "triennially" has been substituted for the word "quadrennially" because the term has been changed from a four-year to a three-year term. The amendment was offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER]. I think the gentleman will agree with me that there can be no question as to the meaning of the word.

Mr. MOORE. There is no question as to the meaning.

Mr. JONES. It can not possibly lead to any confusion.

Mr. MOORE. I was simply suggesting that there should be uniformity of expression in two sections, which will be read together.

Mr. JONES. That expression is found in many of the constitutions of the States, and I think there can be no trouble about it.

Mr. MOORE. Very well.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Every male citizen of the Philippines 21 years of age or over (except insane and feeble-minded persons and those convicted in a court of competent jurisdiction of an infamous offense since the 13th day of August, 1898), who shall have been a resident of the Philippines for one year and of the municipality in which he shall offer to vote for six months, and who is comprised within one of the following classes.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. Is this paragraph now open to amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. It is.

Mr. MANN. Then I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, on page 11, line 15, before the word "citizen," strike out the word "male," and in line 21, after the word "he," insert the words "or she."

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. Is this the proper place to offer an amendment? The section has not yet been read in full.

The CHAIRMAN. The agreement was that on the reading of each paragraph it should be open to amendment.

Mr. MOORE. Very well.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I do not know how much debate there will be upon this proposition. Perhaps it might be wise to reach an agreement in advance.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the debate be limited to 10 minutes. I hope that will be satisfactory.

Mr. MILLER. Oh, I want some time on this.

Mr. JONES. I will ask the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] if he does not think that will be satisfactory?

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] is temporarily out of the Chamber. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER] can speak for him.

Mr. MILLER. This is a very important amendment, and while it seems to have been greeted with smiles by many, I do not think it should be treated in that way.

Mr. MANN. Does anybody else want to be heard?

Mr. MILLER. I think we ought to have at least 20 minutes on each side.

Mr. JONES. Ten minutes on each side.

Mr. MANN. No; 20 on this side.

Mr. JONES. I hope the gentleman will be satisfied with 20 minutes in all.

Mr. MANN. In my opinion there has been no amendment offered to this bill which is as important as this.

Mr. STAFFORD. And if the gentleman will remember, we have been trying to get the Democratic Party to take some stand on this question during the entire session.

Mr. JONES. I will say to the gentleman that I shall be very glad to take my stand on it.

Mr. MILLER. I ask the gentleman to let us have 20 minutes on a side for the discussion of this.

Mr. JONES. Suppose we compromise on 30 minutes, 15 on a side.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent that debate on this amendment be limited to 30 minutes, 15 minutes to be controlled by him and 15 by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER]. Is there objection?

Mr. MILLER. Reserving the right to object, I sincerely trust that the chairman of the committee will give us a little more time.

Mr. JONES. I submit that request for 30 minutes in all. I think that is time enough.

Mr. MILLER. If that is all we can get, I will not offer any objection.

Mr. MANN. We know the gentleman has it within his power to make it less.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Seventy-five Members present—not a quorum.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, on that motion I demand tellers.

Mr. HEFLIN. I suggest, if the gentleman from Illinois wants to put woman suffrage in the Philippine Islands into this bill, that he include in that proposition relief to the cotton producers of Egypt. [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. If I can put the gentleman from Alabama into the Philippine Islands, I will confer a very great favor on the country.

Mr. HEFLIN. If we should banish the gentleman from Illinois to the Philippine Islands, we would confer a lasting benefit on the people of the United States.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. How many Members are present?

The CHAIRMAN. Seventy-five.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I withdraw the motion that the committee rise.

The CHAIRMAN. There is no quorum present. The Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The committee rose; and Mr. SAUNDERS having assumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. FLOOD of Virginia, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee having had under consideration the bill H. R. 18496, the Philippine bill, finding itself without a quorum, under the rule he caused the roll to be called, whereupon 251 Members answered to their names, and he reported the list of absentees to be entered in the Journal.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The committee will resume its sitting.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. RAKER. Is this amendment open to debate?

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment is open to debate.

Mr. RAKER. I would like to be recognized for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the agreement was that time should be controlled, 15 minutes on a side.

Mr. RAKER. Another parliamentary inquiry. Is the time limited to 30 minutes?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes; to 30 minutes—15 minutes to be controlled by the gentleman from Virginia and 15 minutes by the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have five minutes on this amendment if I can get it.

Mr. JONES. On which side?

Mr. MANN. I am in favor of the amendment.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, if I have charge of the time, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, when the Alaska organic-act bill was before the House in the last Congress creating a legislature in Alaska I offered an amendment to strike out of the provision in reference to voters the word "male." The amendment at that time was defeated in the Committee of the Whole by a tie vote, but subsequently an amendment offered by the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] was agreed to. That amendment permitted the Legislature of Alaska to authorize women to vote. We are now passing an organic act for the Philippine Islands and fixing the qualification of electors. The bill reads, "every male citizen." I have moved to strike out the word "male." There are other qualifications in the bill. Everybody who lives in the Philippine Islands and is resident or a citizen is not permitted to vote under the terms of this bill, and I have moved to strike out the word "male" for the purpose of having a vote in the House of Representatives on the subject of woman suffrage, and I shall exercise every power that I know how to exercise to put every Member of the House who is willing to go on record on record on this subject, so that the people may know where we individually stand. I believe that the country has reached that point wherein, at least in a majority portion of the country, the people are disposed to grant political equality of the sexes, and we have not here any complication over the jurisdiction of the Federal Government in reference to the qualification of voters in States. There may be a question in the minds of many as to whether the Federal Government could invade the States by constitutional amendment for the purpose of fixing the qualification of voters of the States, but that question can not arise here, because here we are fixing the qualification of voters for the Philippine Islands, and those in this House who favor woman suffrage, either as an abstract or as a concrete proposition, ought to vote for this amendment. [Applause.] Those in this House who arrogate to themselves individual superiority, who believe that men, intellectually and otherwise, are better qualified than women to vote, ought to vote against the amendment. Since we have reached that stage in this country where it is the women who are best educated, where it is the girls who longest go to school and who know the most, in regard to learning at least, we have also reached the stage where men must divide with women the responsibility of government, and we will have to have the matter up from time to time until it is disposed of, because he who thinks that he can prevent the rising tide in favor of woman suffrage would do well to stand on the shores of the Pacific Ocean with a broom and try to sweep back the tide of the ocean. One is as easy to be done as the other. [Applause.]

I yield back any time I may have remaining.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. SAUNDERS having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed the following order:

Ordered, That the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 14233) to provide for the leasing of coal lands in the Territory of Alaska, and for other purposes, be recommitted to the conference committee.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed joint resolution of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. J. Res. 191. Joint resolution to convey appreciation of Congress to their excellencies Señor Domicio da Gama, Señor Rómulo S. Naón, and Señor Eduardo Suarez for their generous and distinguished services as mediators in the controversy between the Government of the United States and the leaders of the warring parties in Mexico.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bill of the following title:

H. R. 13296. An act for the enlargement, etc., of the Wall Street front of the assay office in the city of New York.

THE PHILIPPINE ISLANDS.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia is in control of the time on that side.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I promised to yield three minutes to the gentleman from the Philippines, the Resident Commissioner [Mr. QUEZON].

Mr. QUEZON. Mr. Chairman, it is evident from the statements made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] that the main purpose of his amendment is to test the sentiment and conviction of this House on the issue of woman suffrage. I submit, Mr. Chairman, that the Philippine bill does not offer the proper opportunity for such a test.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. QUEZON. With pleasure.

Mr. MANN. It is the only opportunity.

Mr. QUEZON. I beg to disagree with the gentleman; and if he will allow me to continue, I think I shall be able to prove that I am right.

Statesmen have the right to advocate such doctrines as they believe will be embodied in law to further the public good. But I deny that under free institutions legislative bodies have a right to enact such laws when the people whom they represent are not favorable to them. Wise legislation is not the expression of mere theories. It is the adaptation of those theories to the circumstances and conditions of a country, and among free people it should also be in accord with and not against the opinions of the people themselves. These propositions, Mr. Chairman, are nowadays recognized as self-evident truths. If we apply them to the amendment before the committee, we shall conclude that we should vote down the amendment even if in favor of woman suffrage for the United States.

Mr. Chairman, let me say right here that I am personally in favor of equality between men and women. I would not subscribe to the theory that the right to vote belongs exclusively to man because of his sex; and if I were to express a personal opinion, I am not sure but that I should perhaps prefer that our women vote. Speaking, however, as a representative of the Filipino people, women as well as men, I do not believe I should be complying with my duty in that capacity if I supported the amendment introduced by the gentleman from Illinois. Why? Because, while the women of my country are very intelligent, very patriotic, and very much interested in public affairs, the immense majority of them—in fact, practically all of them, so far as I know their will—do not want to vote.

For the information of the committee I will say that a few years ago a woman-suffrage movement was undertaken in Manila, but it ended in complete failure. Few meetings were had, I myself having addressed one of those meetings in my desire to help the movement, so that an expression of public opinion on the subject could be obtained; but it has not been possible to create any interest in this movement either on the part of the men or on the part of the women, still less to find any number of advocates for it. In the Provinces nobody ever attempted to discuss the question, and our women there would be decidedly against it. I hope, therefore, Mr. Chairman, that the committee, in its wisdom, will not care to enforce upon our womanhood this duty of voting. I say "duty," because, while the ballot is a right, once the right has been granted it thereby becomes one of the most important duties of citizenship. Our women being conscientious in the performance of their duties, they would no doubt, in spite of their ideas and their convenience, go to the polls if this amendment were to be adopted.

Mr. Chairman, while I am opposed to the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois, I welcome the opportunity he has thus offered me to say a word or two about Filipino women. An important subject, which has not been considered to the extent that it deserves in this discussion of Philippine matters, is the condition and qualification of our women and the part they play in our life. The Filipino woman occupies a position enjoyed by no other oriental woman. She is what women are in the most enlightened countries in the world. Even before American occupation there were public schools for women; there were many colleges where a high degree of education was given, so that, even at that time, education was not the exclusive patrimony of men. Since the establishment of public schools during the American régime the benefit of this institution of free education has been equally enjoyed by our girls and our boys. Instances are not rare when in our classes the intellectual star shines from among the girls. In the University of the Philippines some of the graduating classes have been headed by girls. The opportunities for college education for girls have been multiplied manifold, and indeed the opportunity they afford has not been lost. In the home the wife is the inspiration of the husband, the mother the molder of the character of the son, the daughter the hope, the consolation, the comfort of the parents. Even in business women are consulted by men. I venture to say, therefore, Mr. Chairman, that the character and intelligence of our women alone would justify our optimism as to the wonderful possibilities of our country. Now, let me give the committee a piece of information taken from volume 2, page 117, of the Philippine Census. It is as follows:

> The number of women who reported themselves as prostitutes was 476, nearly all of whom were in Manila. Of these 75 were white, nearly all the countries of Europe being represented, besides the United States. Two hundred and sixty, or more than half, were yellow, practically all of whom were Japanese, and only 141, or 1 in 25,000 of the female population of the islands were Filipinos. It is rather extraordinary that in this Malay Archipelago seven-tenths of all the prostitutes were from foreign lands, a fact which speaks volumes for the chastity of the Filipinos.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. SAUNDERS). The time of the gentleman from the Philippines has expired.

Mr. QUEZON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for one minute more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. QUEZON. Mr. Chairman, one more word and I shall be through. Without imposing upon our women the burden of going to the voting places and leaving their work at home the Filipino people are already receiving the benefit of the advice of our women on matters of public interest, because while our women do not vote and do not want to vote they take an interest in public questions and exercise their wholesome influence upon the men.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I am sincerely in hope that the amendment will be voted upon, not from the standpoint of the people of the United States, but in conformity with the preference of the Filipino women. [Applause.]

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN].

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Chairman, I protest against this political play of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN]. The gentleman is trying at this late hour to come from under cover on the subject of woman suffrage. He is taking up the time of this House discussing suffrage for women in the Philippine Islands, and yet he persists in denying to the people of the South the opportunity of having the cotton situation discussed by Members of the House from that section. There is the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD]; he has objected to allowing a plea to be made here for the people of the stricken section. The gentleman was elected the last time, I am told, by the aid of Democratic votes. I trust that the Democrats of Wisconsin will commit no such blunder any more. And there is the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE], an ex-leader on that side, persisting in preventing even a discussion of the question that affects vitally thirty-odd millions of people and a billion-dollar industry; and, Mr. Chairman, I protest against this kind of political play on the part of the much-disturbed gentleman from Illinois, who has been blacklisted by the suffragettes of his State. Here he is trying to institute woman suffrage in the far-away Philippine Islands in order to save his political scalp in the November election. I recall the opposition of the gentleman to a resolution permitting the women to parade here just before Inauguration Day, on the 3d of March, 1913, and in that speech he said that the people of his own political persuasion would not be here in great numbers. Well, Mr. Chairman, the suffragettes were here in full force. They were of some political persuasion. Of whose political persuasion were they, I ask the gentleman? And then, later, when the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HOBSON] came in and said something about some of the ladies being mistreated in the parade, the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] rose and made some remark about it, and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] said if they—the women—had been at home, where they ought to have been, that would not have occurred.

Mr. MANN. I did not make that statement, and the gentleman's statement, as usual, is erroneous.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Chairman, I state that the gentleman did make that statement and that somebody changed it in the RECORD. I can prove that he made the statement by a dozen Members in this House.

Mr. MANN. I did not make it; but what I did say is in the RECORD.

Mr. HEFLIN. Many of us here remember exactly what the gentleman said, Mr. Chairman. Now the gentleman comes and throws himself in the way of relief to a stricken people in my section and denies discussion of conditions there, and when he is out of the Chamber he has the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] object, as he did on yesterday. Yesterday a Member on this side went over and requested him to let him extend his remarks in the RECORD, and Mr. PAYNE said, "Is there anything about cotton in your speech?" He said, "No"; and then he said, "You may print it. I will not permit anything to go in that is about cotton." That is the treatment that a great producing class of our people are receiving at the hands of these Republican Members that I have named. When other sections of the country are in distress the Members from the South respond cheerfully. I voted to appropriate money to relieve the distressed and suffering people of Salem, Mass., when fire destroyed that city, and I heard the cry of the suffering people in San Francisco when the earthquake came, leaving death and destruction in its wake, and I voted for relief for them. But the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] and the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] object to even a discussion of the distressed condition of the people of the South.

Mr. Chairman, the conduct of these two men does not contribute to the harmonious relation and cordial good feeling between the sections that every patriot in our country knows is the very life and spirit of our great country's peace, happiness, and prosperity. The sooner such men are retired from positions in this House the better it will be for the whole country.

Our requests to be permitted to discuss conditions that injuriously affect 30,000,000 of American people are met with objection from the gentleman from Illinois and the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD], but the gentleman from Illinois can take up the time of the House playing politics, advocating woman suffrage for the Philippine Islands. God of our fathers, deliver us from such rot. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. BRYAN].

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, the principal objection I have to this Philippine bill is that it starts out on its face as a fake. It provides at the very beginning, in the title, that it is designed to declare the political status of the Philippine Islands and to provide a more autonomous government, but in truth it does not declare the political status of the Philippine Islands, and it was argued repeatedly that an amendment to the body of the bill after the enacting clause, declaring the political status of the Philippine Islands was out of place, and when offered it was rejected. It was not considered favorably and it was declared to be a violation of the purposes of the committee to incorporate any provision whatever on that subject in the body of the bill.

Now, as to this suffrage proposition: I loath and despise a fake. The Speaker of this House, the Hon. CHAMP CLARK, declares he is for woman suffrage in the State of Missouri; the Secretary of State, William Jennings Bryan, says he is for woman suffrage in the State of Nebraska; the Secretary of the Navy, Mr. Daniels, proclaims that he is in favor of woman suffrage; and a number of the other Democratic leaders declare themselves for it. They say, however, that it is a State issue and not a national one, and in this particular instance you are going to declare here this afternoon either for it in truth, without any faking, without any nonsense, or you are going to declare against it.

Awhile ago I phoned down to the woman-suffrage headquarters and advised them to come here and bring their tablets and to note what goes on where there is no roll call, and we are going to find out whether the Democratic Party stands for suffrage or against it. If you stand against it, like the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN], on principle, and if you believe it is wrong in policy, then you ought to vote and talk that way. That is all right. But what I despise is faking on the proposition, and we have got you now to the point where there can be no faking. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Washington has expired.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I am informed, and I believe it to be true, that the woman suffragist organizations of this country recently prepared a blacklist, upon which they placed the names of nine Senators and nine Members of the House of Representatives, and that one of the names so placed upon that list was that of the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN]. It seems to me, therefore, that this is an effort on the part of the gentleman from Illinois to get his name off the woman-suffrage blacklist prior to the November election. [Applause and laughter on the Democratic side.]

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] says that the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] misquoted him as to what took place in a colloquy between the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] and himself. However that may be, Mr. Chairman, I wish to say that on March 1 of last year, a few days prior to the inauguration, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN], whom everybody recognizes as a leading opponent to woman suffrage, yielded five minutes of the time allotted to him to voice his opposition to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], in order that he might speak on the same side of the question. [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MANN. I am ashamed of that—that I ever spoke on the same side with him. [Laughter.]

Mr. HEFLIN. You are not as ashamed of it as I am. [Renewed laughter.]

Mr. MANN. The shame is mutual, then. [Laughter.]

Mr. JONES. The gentleman from Illinois on that occasion read, or had read, a letter from the president of the Capital Traction Co., of this city, protesting against permitting the women to parade on Pennsylvania Avenue; and after having read it, the gentleman proceeded to say—I read from the RECORD:

> If the House desires to hold up transportation for practically the afternoon, it is within the power of the House to do so. But I submit that it is not fair to the strangers who come here, practically invited for Inauguration Day, to subject them to this inconvenience and probably render impossible the reaching of their destination during the afternoon.

That was on the 1st day of March. On the 3d day of March, after permission had been granted for the parade and the ladies had paraded the Avenue, Mr. HOBSON addressed the House, protesting against certain bad treatment which he alleged they had received on that occasion. Among other things Mr. HOBSON said:

> I have been called over the telephone since then and told by a lady that her young daughter was on one of the floats, and a ruffian climbed on the float and insulted her daughter.
>
> Mr. MANN. Her daughter ought to have been at home.
>
> [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MANN. If that comforts the gentleman, that is all right.

Mr. JONES. Now, I do not perceive much distinction between that and what the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] alleged.

Mr. MANN. It is a very great distinction.

Mr. JONES. I am willing to submit that to the House. It was charged by Mr. HOBSON that a lady, not walking on the street but riding on a float, was insulted by a ruffian, who climbed on the float and insulted her; and the gentleman from Illinois, instead of sympathizing with what Mr. HOBSON said, and with the young lady who was insulted, rose from his seat and declared that he thought she ought to have been at home, thereby intimating that the treatment she received was just what she deserved to have received. [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Chairman, I reserve the rest of my time.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I yield one minute to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] is recognized for one minute.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the answer which I usually receive on the other side of the House when I submit a proposition is personal abuse, which has nothing to do with the situation. I protested two years ago against giving Pennsylvania Avenue up for the parade for the reasons stated, that it would be impossible to manage the crowd and prevent insults to women. I said then what I still believe, that it was inadvisable to do it on Pennsylvania Avenue, and I do not think now any more than I did then that a young girl should have her place on a float, passing up Pennsylvania Avenue, in the midst of a crowd of Democrats assembled in Washington, who were sure to insult her. [Applause and laughter on the Republican side.]

[Here followed words subsequently ordered by the House to be stricken out.]

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I demand that those words be taken down.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the gentleman's words be taken down, and I repudiate his statement as that of a man unworthy of a seat on this floor.

Mr. MANN. Let them be taken down.

Mr. HEFLIN. The statement as made is without foundation and unjustified from any source.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask for order. The gentleman from Alabama is obviously out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Official Reporter will send up the words to the Clerk's desk. The Clerk will read from the desk the words complained of.

The Clerk read as follows:

> I thought it was better for the young girl to be at home than in that parade, for fear the gentleman from Alabama should have seen her. He would have been sure to have insulted her.

Mr. STAFFORD. I question that that is a report of the gentleman's words.

Mr. MILLER. I submit that is not the entire statement of the gentleman from Illinois.

The CHAIRMAN. That question may be raised later. The gentleman from Alabama will please take the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

The committee rose, and Mr. UNDERWOOD took the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Mr. Speaker, as Chairman of the Committee of the Whole I report that in the Committee of the Whole a request was made that words of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], which were complained of, should be taken down. This was directed to be done, and in conformity with the rule I report now to the House the language complained of, which was uttered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], those words being:

> I thought it was better for the young girl to be at home than in that parade, for fear the gentleman from Alabama should have seen her. He would have been sure to have insulted her.

In conformity with the rules I make this report to the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is the report of the committee questioned by any Member?

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Speaker, that may have been a portion of the statement made by the gentleman from Illinois, but it certainly is not a complete report of the statement which he made, and standing by itself I do not think it is a proper foundation upon which to make a determination of the matter.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the Chair understand the gentleman from Minnesota that he questions the report?

Mr. MILLER. I do.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will put the question. The question before the House is, Are the words reported from the committee to the House the words spoken by the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. HAY. I make the point of order that this is not debatable.

Mr. TOWNER. Is it not proper to have all the words of the gentleman's statement before the House? It may be that the House will determine that those particular words were used, and yet in order to determine the correctness of the report all the words used in connection with them ought to be reported to the House.

Mr. DONOVAN. A point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Will the gentleman permit the Chair to answer the parliamentary inquiry? The Chair is unable to go beyond the report of the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole. It is for the House to accept the report or not, as it desires.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Speaker, another parliamentary inquiry. I notice the language used by the Chair in putting the matter before the House was, "Were these words used?" Now, I do not deny that those were some of the words used, but the gentleman said something before that, and standing by themselves they are an incomplete statement.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, the question is not debatable.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is not debatable. The Chair sustains the point of order. The gentleman may make a parliamentary inquiry if he desires. If not, the Chair will put the question.

Mr. MILLER. Is it not proper for the Chair to have all the language of the gentleman from Illinois read?

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Speaker, when a point of order has been sustained against the gentleman he should take his seat.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman is submitting a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. MILLER. Would it be proper for the Chair to put the question in this form: Were the words which have been reported a complete and correct statement of the remarks of the gentleman from Illinois?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair has presented the question to the House in the form which is usual in such cases, and has followed the precedent.

Mr. MILLER. Another parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MILLER. Before the committee rose I rose and asked recognition for the purpose of having a complete statement of the words uttered by the gentleman from Illinois—for the purpose of having the statement completed—but was denied that recognition by the Chairman.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is not a question for the Chair to determine.

Mr. MILLER. May I put a question: What redress can there possibly be for a situation of that kind?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman is exercising his right now by demanding a vote on this question. If the House votes that these were not the words used, then the words can be corrected, but the question as put by the Chair must first be determined.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. MANN. I hope the gentleman will not do that. I ask the gentleman to withdraw that.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wisconsin makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman withdraws the point of no quorum. The question then is, Are the words reported by the committee the words used by the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. RAGSDALE. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker. In voting on that proposition do I have to vote yea or nay that those were the identical words and that no other words were used?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is, Are the words reported from the committee to the House the words spoken by the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. CARTER. He does not have to vote that those were all the words, and that the gentleman did not use any other words except this identical language.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Of course this is not understood to be the entire speech of the gentleman from Illinois. The question is whether he used the words that were taken down and reported to the House by the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. MOORE. Does the motion now before the House affect the accuracy of these words?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. To the extent of whether or not the words are the words used by the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MOORE. If we vote "aye," we affirm the accuracy of the reported words?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Yes.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. MILLER) there were 52 ayes and 50 noes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. What disposition does the House desire to make of the matter? A motion that the gentleman proceed in order is in order.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I could not proceed in order in the House, and besides my time was exhausted.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the words of the gentleman from Illinois be stricken from the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Virginia moves that the words used by the gentleman from Illinois be stricken from the RECORD.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to be heard on that. While the words which the majority side of the House has declared were the words I uttered in debate were not the words that I used, I do not desire to criticize or quarrel with the reporters. I did use some words in animadversion of the gentleman from Alabama. I remember very distinctly the occasion in reference to the granting of permission for that parade. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] had the floor and made a speech in this House which, in my judgment, made everybody in the House blush with shame. Most of the speech was left out of the RECORD.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, I protest against this cowardly man using such expressions about me.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I call the gentleman from Alabama to order.

Mr. MANN. Let it go on; I can take care of myself.

Mr. HEFLIN. I ask that the gentleman's words be taken down. I do not propose to sit here and permit this man, who knows nothing and cares nothing for the rules of decent procedure, to insult me.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois has the floor.

Mr. MANN. And is proceeding in order.

Mr. HEFLIN. I demand that his words be taken down.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has a right to have the words taken down if he will indicate what the words are.

Mr. MANN. I am waiting patiently, Mr. Speaker. Is my time running?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Alabama will have to indicate what words he wishes taken down.

Mr. HEFLIN. I will withdraw the demand, Mr. Speaker, for the present.

Mr. MANN. What I stated was true and in order. We all who were here heard the speech of the gentleman from Alabama. It was an insult to womanhood.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, the Member from Illinois is a liar.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Alabama will be in order.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the words of the gentleman from Alabama be taken down.

Mr. MANN. I hope that request will not be made, Mr. Speaker. The gentleman from Alabama does not disturb me.

Mr. HEFLIN. I ask the gentleman from Illinois not to indulge in talk of that kind any more to-day on this floor.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from New York insist upon his demand?

Mr. PAYNE. No, Mr. Speaker; it will all be in the RECORD, and I will withdraw it.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I do not wonder that the gentleman from Alabama is tender of criticism. If I had made that speech which he made against womanhood I would never have wanted anybody else to have referred to it and I should want to forget it myself. It is a credit to the gentleman from Alabama now that he resents any reference to that speech. It is the best sign that I have seen exhibited by the gentleman from Alabama that he has a conscience and a memory to recollect some facts.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I make the point of order that the gentleman from Illinois is not discussing the matter before the House.

Mr. MANN. It seems to me that I am.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The motion before the House is a motion to strike out the words used by the gentleman from Illinois and reported to the House. The question is as to the propriety of striking out those words. The Chair is of opinion that the gentleman from Illinois should confine himself within a reasonable scope.

Mr. MANN. I am endeavoring to do so. I do not intend to detain the House very long. I thought then and I still think that the speech that was made by the gentleman from Alabama was an insult to womanhood. If I could use unparliamentary language, which I shall not, I would tell what I thought with reference to the speech about the House itself. The words that I just spoke, though somewhat changed by the reporter, were fully justified by the recollection which I have and which other Members in this House have of that speech which was made by the gentleman from Alabama, the most disgusting portions of which were, fortunately, left out of the RECORD.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman state his recollection of the words that are proposed to be stricken out of the RECORD? The gentleman says that those are not the words spoken by him. I was not in the Chamber at the time, and if he would not mind, I for one would like to know just what the words were and which we are now moving to strike out of the RECORD.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I stated, justifying a position which gentlemen were criticizing in reference to my action when the resolution was before the House concerning the woman suffrage parade, that I then thought there was danger of insults to the women from the crowds coming to town, and added, facetiously, by the Democratic crowds coming to town. Then I added that the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN], who just rose and presented himself, himself might be one of the crowd from whom the women would suffer.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, it is extremely painful to me to have had to ask that the words of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] be taken down, but I am firmly persuaded that the dignity of this House should be preserved. The gentleman now says that he did not make the remark which was read from the Clerk's desk, and which the House determined he had made. I can only say that I am sure that the reporters of this House are accurate, that they are wholly impartial, and that in this instance—because I was paying very close attention to what the gentleman was saying—the words taken down by the reporter were the words which I heard, and which other gentlemen sitting around me heard, and I thought it was my duty as a Member of this House, when it was stated by another Member that the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] would have insulted a woman, to ask that those words be taken down; and I think we are now acting as mildly as the occasion will permit in asking that the words be stricken from the RECORD.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit a request for unanimous consent. I presume there is not a Member of this House who is not jealous of its dignity and its reputation throughout the country. There has been language used, even since these words were taken down, that ought not to be used in the House of Representatives, and I ask unanimous consent that the entire proceedings be stricken from the RECORD and that the order under consideration be vacated.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that the entire proceedings from the beginning of this controversy be stricken from the RECORD. Is there objection.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I think the RECORD would better show the proceedings that took place. There will be a long fight over woman suffrage.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois objects. The question before the House is the motion of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY] to strike from the RECORD the language used by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. STAFFORD) there were—ayes 72, noes 43.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Evidently there is no quorum present. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll. The question is on striking the words objected to from the RECORD.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 153, nays 66, answered "present" 10, not voting 199, as follows:

THE PHILIPPINE ISLANDS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a special order of the House the House automatically resolves itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the Philippine bill.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 18459, with Mr. SAUNDERS in the chair.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, may I ask how the time stands?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will inform the gentleman in a moment. The gentleman from Virginia has one minute left, and the gentleman from Minnesota has seven minutes left.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I yield four minutes to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I understand that the women of the Philippine Islands are highly intelligent and very capable; that they have the truly womanly traits of grace and modesty and, in addition, a splendid capacity for questions of business and government.

Mr. JONES. Will the gentleman permit a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. I regret I have not the time. A friend who knows the Filipino people well and admires them tells me that the Philippine women, who would be given suffrage under this provision, "are the best men in the islands," and that their husbands largely depend on their judgment in matters of business, and would, I am sure, be glad to consult with them on matters of government. Aye, Mr. Chairman, the world does move. The gentleman from Illinois offered an amendment, which was rejected, to give to the women of far Alaska the suffrage. Fortunately it was secured through an amendment which I offered later. The world does move. The question of suffrage is no longer a joke with even the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN]. Time was when suffrage for woman was mentioned that gentleman shook the archæological joke tree and retailed jokes which a Texas friend of mine once referred to as jokes that were "stricken with paresis in the days of old Rameses." [Laughter and applause.] Those were the days when his references to woman suffrage was larded with salacious and suggestive jokes—jokes that had to be toned down before they were printed in the RECORD; but even as modified they show to the understanding minds what was intended, and if what was intended was not an insult, then the gentleman should have chosen other language for his expression. Aye, it is a serious question not only for the gentleman from Alabama but for the gentleman's party. I am told that in the high councils of the party the official spellbinders holding exalted office, who are sent forth, who ought to be here attending to the affairs of Government, are duly warned not to refer to woman suffrage or other troublesome questions in their speeches. But it will not down. The men of this country have made up their minds that they will call to their aid in settling the vexed questions of Government the best and most virtuous half of mankind, and as we have made this determination for ourselves so we propose to give our friends in the Philippines the same advantages and opportunity. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I believe I have three minutes remaining.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes; three minutes.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I am very glad this amendment was offered by the gentleman from Illinois. Had he not offered it, I myself would have done so, and I wish to assure the members of the committee that it is offered with the most serious intent. I listened with interest to the remarks of the gentleman from the Philippines [Mr. QUEZON], in which he paid a very splendid tribute to the womanhood of the islands. I indorse all that he said, and I desire to add something thereto. I believe it is well within the truth to say that the women of the Philippine Islands are fully as competent and capable of exercising political powers as the men of the islands. If it be proper to confer the right of franchise upon the male inhabitants of the islands, it is certainly as highly proper to confer it upon the women of the islands. The gentleman from the Philippines said we should not decide this question according to our political notions and theories applicable to the United States. I agree with him. In view of the conditions existing in the Philippine Islands, if we give to womanhood there the right to vote, in my judgment we will give political power to the best part in the islands. To-day, at this hour, the major part of the business in Filipino hands in the islands is conducted by the women of the islands. It is a historical fact, without any disparagement whatever to the men, that in the home, in the Provinces, in the municipalities, the strength and power of womanhood in business and in politics is strong. The argument that they do not care now to vote, to my mind, has no bearing whatever upon the question. You give them the right to vote, and they will exercise it mighty quickly. If they do not care to vote, no harm has been done.

I firmly believe that if you give to the women the right to vote, you will relieve yourselves of a great many difficulties that may result from conferring franchise upon the male inhabitants alone. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I yield the time remaining to me to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] is recognized for one minute.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, whatever the merits or demerits of the question of woman suffrage may be, I do not care now to discuss. I have my opinions and convictions concerning the matter, and I have never hesitated to express those opinions or convictions in courteous language on this floor, or to the committees of ladies that have called at my office, or at any other place, or at any other time. But we are making now a great advance in the matter of government for the Philippine Islands. We are increasing the number of voters by enlarging the qualifications of men voters in the islands if this provision in this bill shall remain as fixed. We are making a decided and strong advance, and certainly out on the "rim of the world," in a nation in which even the male citizens have enjoyed a very limited degree of suffrage, is not the place, and this is not the time, to make the experiment with this movement. And I sincerely trust that this committee will not be swept from its feet upon this great proposition, fundamental in character, that we are attempting to work out here for the Filipino people, and bring into it this new experiment, tried only in a very few States of our own country.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I was not present when the time was fixed by unanimous consent. I would like to have unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes upon this question.

Mr. MILLER. Reserving the right to object, we made every possible effort to secure more time than that which was finally agreed upon.

Mr. RAKER. I want to say to the gentleman this——

Mr. MILLER. I can not agree to the gentleman's having time.

Mr. RAKER. I am in favor of this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER] objects. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a division.

Mr. MILLER. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 58, noes 82.

Mr. MANN. I ask for tellers, Mr. Chairman.

Tellers were ordered, and Mr. MANN and Mr. JONES took their places as tellers.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 58, noes 84.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend the paragraph by striking out, on page 11, line 22 and all the remaining lines on that page.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk has not read the paragraph as yet.

Mr. TOWNER. Very well. I will withhold it, then, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be recognized. I have moved to amend, page 11, line 21, after the word "months," by inserting the following words—and I trust that I will have the attention of the committee—"next preceding the day of voting," so that it will read:

One year, and of the municipality in which he shall offer to vote for six months next preceding the day of voting.

Mr. JONES. I have no objection to that.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, on page 11, by inserting, after the word "months," in line 21, the words "next preceding the day of voting."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

(a) Those who prior to the 13th day of August, 1898, held the office of captain municipal, gobernadorcillo, alcalde, tenientes, cabeza de barangay, or member of any ayuntamiento.

(b) Those who own real property to the value of ₱500, or who annually pay ₱30 or more of the established taxes.

(c) Those who are able to read and write either Spanish, English, or a native language.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 11, line 22, strike out all of the remaining language on page 11, and on page 12 strike out lines 1, 2, 3, and in line 4 the words "those who are," and in line 5 the words "or a native," and insert in said line, following the word "Spanish," the word "or."

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, the amendment which I offer strikes out this class that is stated here as class (a); that is, those who prior to the 13th day of August held certain offices under the Philippine Government. I suggest to the committee, and especially to the Democratic members of the committee, that there can be no justification for making a qualification for suffrage dependent upon the fact that the man at one time held some sort of an office. However that may have been justified in preceding years in the Philippines, there can be no longer any justification for such provision as a qualification for suffrage.

On the next page, the class which is enumerated as class (b), those who own real property to the value of ₱500, or who annually pay ₱30 or more of the established taxes, may vote. That is a property qualification for suffrage. It seems to me we have passed that era in the history of American citizenship. If a property qualification was ever justified, that time has passed. The majority have very ill-advisedly determined that there shall be a restriction of suffrage to the men on the islands. Now, no matter what race or tribe he belongs to—Negrito, Moro, or Igorote—if he has property of the value of $250 he can vote. Although he may not be able to read or write a word of any language, if he pays $15 taxes he can vote. In my judgment there is no justification for this, and if this amendment is adopted it will be stricken out.

Now, as to the third class, Mr. Chairman, it would seem to me that the time has also arrived when we should not deliberately put into the language of the law classes of citizenship. It is the boast of American citizenship that there are no classes, and yet in the terms of this bill here we have three classes enumerated, and distinctions are made between them, all of them establishing separate qualifications for the right of suffrage. The third class, class (c), is composed of those who are able to read and write either Spanish or English or a native language, according to the terms of the bill.

In my judgment, Mr. Chairman, the words "or a native language" ought to be eliminated. There can be no possible justification for that. If we give suffrage to those who are able to read and write either the English or the Spanish language, then we are extending suffrage as far as it ought to go. All the proceedings of the house of representatives and all of the proceedings probably of the senate that is to be created by the passage of this act, if it shall ever pass, will be conducted in the Spanish or English language. To-day the language that is being taught to children in the schools is the English language. There are more people who speak English in the islands to-day than any other language because of that fact.

If we take under consideration the further fact, Mr. Chairman, that there are 74 different dialects spoken in the Philippine Islands, so that the people of one community can not understand the language spoken in another, we can see that this very necessary qualification for suffrage ought in this instance to be insisted on. We go far enough when we say that anyone who can speak and read the English language or the Spanish language shall have the right of suffrage.

It would seem clear that one who is only able to read and write a native language ought not to be considered qualified for suffrage, because such a person can not understand what is transpiring on the islands or understand what political issues are involved in any election or be able to form an intelligent judgment as to any political question.

This provision is wrong in two respects. It makes an office qualification and it makes a property qualification and it does away with that particular requisite—the necessity of understanding what is transpiring in the islands regarding the politics and governmental affairs of the islands. For that reason I make the motion to strike out, so that we shall have only these qualifications left—that they shall be male citizens of the islands; that they shall be residents of the islands for one year and of the municipality for six months, and that they shall be able to read the English or the Spanish language. That is simple and that is sufficient, and I hope will be adopted.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I desire to very earnestly oppose this amendment. It proposes to restrict the exercise of the right of suffrage in the Philippines to a much greater extent even than does existing law. Now, one who held either of certain enumerated positions under the Spanish régime, or who owns real property to the value of ₱500, or who annually pays ₱30 or more of the established taxes, can vote, even if he can not read either English of Spanish. If this amendment is adopted, although he may have held the highest positions under the Spanish Government or may be one of the wealthiest and most capable of the business men in the islands, he will not be permitted to vote unless he can read and write either the English or the Spanish language. The bare statement of the purpose and effect of this amendment is to condemn it in the estimation of every just and fair-minded man. Can it be possible that those who support this amendment realize its full scope and meaning? Can it be possible that it is the purpose and deliberate intention of the gentleman offering it to deny the right of suffrage to the professional and business men of the Philippines who can not read and write one of two foreign languages, who can not read and write either English or Spanish? Mr. Chairman, a very small percentage of the adult males in the Philippines read and write the Spanish language.

The knowledge of English, whilst more general, is confined largely to the younger Filipinos—to boys and girls and young men and women who have grown into manhood and womanhood within the last 8 or 10 years. The older generation of Filipinos, very few of whom can read and write English and a large proportion of whom can not read and write Spanish, will not be permitted, if this amendment is adopted, to participate in the elections provided for in this bill. So I repeat, this proposition is the very refinement of cruelty, and I can not conceive of its adoption.

I would like to ask the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] a question. I do not know whether or not there is any educational qualification for voting in his State, but I would like to ask him if there were one which denied the right of suffrage to those citizens who could not read or write one of two prescribed foreign languages; for instance, either Spanish or French; how many qualified voters would there be in Iowa?

The suffrage provisions of this bill greatly broaden the suffrage. They are vastly more liberal than those of the present law, whilst, as I have said, this amendment would abridge the suffrage to a far greater extent than does even the present law. The bill we are considering permits all those who can read and write either English, Spanish, or a native languag to vote. Permitting all Filipinos who can read and write a native language to vote will greatly extend the suffrage, as must be obvious to every one.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Virginia has expired.

Mr. JONES. I ask for five minutes more, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. JONES. At the last general election in the Philippine Islands there were only about 240,000 persons who voted out of a total population of about 9,000,000. This may seem a fairly good proportion to those who are familiar with Mexican history. There are some 15,000,000 people in Mexico, and yet when Madero was elected President of that Republic he received less than 20,000 votes. One of the staple arguments used by those who contend that the Filipinos are incapable of governing themselves is that only 240,000 of them voted at the last general election. That argument has been used time and again upon the floor of this House. It is now proposed through this amendment, which still further abridges the right to vote, to reduce the number of those who actually vote to a minimum. Once that has been accomplished we shall be told that it is proof positive that the Filipino people are so universally ignorant that they can never be safely given their independence.

It seems to me, therefore, Mr. Chairman, that it is absolutely cruel to propose to deny the ballot to those Filipinos who, possessing large means accumulated as the result of great energy and business capacity and thoroughly educated in one of the principal native languages, yet are so unfortunate as not to be able to read and write either English or Spanish. Those educated Filipinos, and there doubtless are such, who can neither read English nor Spanish, but who are thoroughly conversant with some other foreign language, such, for instance, as French or German, could not vote were this most obnoxious amendment adopted.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. JONES. Certainly.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Under which plan—that proposed in this bill or that suggested by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER]—would there probably be the greatest number of electors?

Mr. JONES. Under this bill the number of those who can now vote would be immensely increased whilst under the proposed amendment that number would be greatly decreased. Under the provisions of this bill those who are entirely illiterate can vote if they own real estate of the value of $250 or pay taxes to the amount of $15 annually.

Mr. Chairman, if we accept as correct the statements of those who have, during the course of this debate, asserted that only 15 per cent of the Filipinos are literate, the adoption of this amendment would mean that the number of those who could vote would be reduced to about 1 per cent of the total population.

Mr. MILLER. I hope the gentleman will not leave the subject in that exact form. After the matter was thrashed over I think it was clearly stated on this side that there was no intention to say that only 15 per cent of the entire people of the islands were literate.

Mr. JONES. I am glad the gentleman has made that statement. I am aware that he stated a few days ago that he had not made the statement attributed to him by one of his colleagues. That gentleman, it will be recalled, not only gave the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER] as his authority for the statement made by him that only 15 per cent of the Filipinos were literate, but he declared that the gentleman from Minnesota had subsequently confirmed it.

Mr. TOWNER. The gentleman who made that statement misunderstood the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. MILLER. If the gentleman will permit, the gentleman [Mr. FESS] heard a remark I made at the time, which was that I did not believe more than 15 per cent of the people in the islands had an adequate conception of the responsibilities of voters, and the gentleman from Ohio did not quite understand what I said

Mr. JONES. The gentleman from Ohio used the word "literate," but I now understand the matter.

Mr. MILLER. Yes.

Mr. JONES. But up to this time the gentleman from Ohio has not publicly acknowledged his error. I concede that the gentleman from Ohio misunderstood the gentleman from Minnesota.

Now, Mr. Chairman, in closing I wish to repeat what I have already said, that this amendment will restrict suffrage in the Philippines to a far greater extent than it is restricted now, whilst this bill will so liberalize and modify present law as to confer the ballot upon tens of thousands of educated Filipinos who to-day can not vote simply because they can not read and write in one of two foreign languages.

Mr. HELM. Mr. Chairman, the real liberalizing feature of this bill is that portion of subsection (c) that permits those who can read or write a native language to participate in the election of their elective officers. I venture the statement that an overwhelming majority of the inhabitants of the Philippine Islands do speak a well-defined native language. There are a number of dialects that could hardly be classified as a language, but there is a very large part of the country where all of the people do speak what may be properly defined as a native language.

I do not understand from these sections that they are restrictive of each other. It certainly is not the intention of the gentleman from Iowa to be understood as saying that the man who has the capacity to hold, and who has held, an office of trust and of honor, even though he can not speak or write English or Spanish, but who can read or write his native language should not be permitted to vote. Nor do I understand that the second subsection (b) is restrictive of subsection (c). I can see how a person who has taxable property of the amount set forth in that subsection, though he can not read or write the Spanish or English language, or even a native language, if he has the property qualification, that of itself takes him out of the other classes and permits him to exercise the right of suffrage.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HELM. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Does the gentleman believe that a person should have the right to vote who can not read or write Spanish or English, even though he has the property qualification provided for in class B?

Mr. HELM. If I understand the gentleman's question, yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. I am following out the gentleman's argument that he believes the three classes are separate and distinct.

Mr. HELM. Does the gentleman consider it a disqualification?

Mr. STAFFORD. I do not think the fact that a man owns property is a qualification for suffrage.

Mr. HELM. Every man that can read or write English or Spanish or a native language, no matter whether he does not own a cent, should and, under the provisions of this bill, does have the right to vote.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman goes further than that.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman have five minutes more.

Mr. HELM. I do not want five minutes; one minute will do.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Kentucky may have one minute more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HELM. Mr. Chairman, under subsection (c) of this bill, I undertake to say that any male 21 years of age in the Philippine Islands who can read or write English, Spanish, or the native language, if he is as poor as Lazarus, can exercise the right of suffrage, which he can not do under existing law.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I am in favor of an educational qualification for suffrage of Filipinos. I am not in favor of the provisions as reported by the committee giving suffrage to certain persons who have held some office in times past, and also particularly not to those who happen to own either real property to the value of ₱500 or who annually pay ₱30 or more in taxes. I can not conceive how a person is entitled to suffrage unless he is able to read or write the Spanish language or the English language.

Mr. JONES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. JONES. Is there any educational qualification in the gentleman's State?

Mr. STAFFORD. There is not.

Mr. JONES. Then a man there who owns $10,000 worth of property can vote?

Mr. STAFFORD. He can because he is educated. We have a private and a public school system, and all the electors are presumably qualified.

Mr. JONES. The gentleman is assuming that all citizens of his State are educated. Not having any educational qualification in your State, a citizen who owns $10,000 worth of property, if he is not a criminal or feeble-minded and is 21 years of age, can vote irrespective of whether or not he is literate.

Mr. STAFFORD. We have universal manhood suffrage in Wisconsin.

Mr. JONES. Then why should you refuse a man who may own $10,000 worth of property in the Philippine Islands the right to vote, although he can not read or write the Spanish or English language?

Mr. STAFFORD. The conditions in the Philippines are so entirely different from conditions in the Northern States that there is no comparison. I would not say that they are totally different from some other parts of our country. I will ask the gentleman if they have an educational qualification in the State of Virginia?

Mr. JONES. We had at one time.

Mr. STAFFORD. I can conceive how it is necessary to have educational qualifications in many of the Southern States, but I venture to say that there is no educational qualification for electors in the Northern States.

Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts. The gentleman is wrong about that. We have an educational qualification in Massachusetts.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. And we have had since 1857.

Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts. An educational qualification, but no property qualification.

Mr. JONES. If the gentleman will permit me, I will say that the payment of poll taxes are required in Virginia as a prerequisite to voting.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is there any property qualification in the gentleman's State so that he can vote if he does not possess the educational qualification?

Mr. JONES. At the present time only poll taxes are required to be paid.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, assuming that the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa, which seems to require an educational qualification precedent to the right to vote, would restrict the suffrage, because many of the people do not understand the foreign languages, do not classes A and B broaden the franchise, increase the number of electors over what it would be under the gentleman's proposition?

Mr. STAFFORD. I am in favor of extending the franchise to all who can read and write the native languages.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I am not. Of course I am not speaking of the Philippines at the present time.

Mr. STAFFORD. Of course we are considering this question solely as to the Philippine status. We are not considering it from the standpoint of Texas or Wisconsin.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I thought the gentleman was stating a broad principle.

Mr. STAFFORD. No; I am speaking exclusively of the Filipino.

Mr. CLINE. Originally some New England States had a property qualification.

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes; Rhode Island, for instance.

Mr. CLINE. And have yet, although it is probably a dead letter.

Mr. STAFFORD. I hardly think the gentleman will claim that that is an American principle.

Mr. CLINE. I do not think it is.

Mr. STAFFORD. Even though he may find it in Rhode Island or in some of the Southern States.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from the Philippines [Mr. QUEZON] may be permitted to address the committee for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. QUEZON. Mr. Chairman, I am against the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER], because it restricts the right to vote in the Philippine Islands. In the first place, I wish to reiterate to the committee what the chairman of the Insular Affairs Committee has said, to wit, that paragraphs (a) and (b) are literally copied from the present organic act. If the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa be adopted, many who have to-day the right to vote and who have for many years exercised that right would be deprived of it. I do not believe, Mr. Chairman, in taking away from anyone a right he already enjoys. The number of Filipinos who held office under the Spanish Government is, moreover, decreasing; so that even if there were some merit in the contention of the gentleman from Iowa there would still be no real necessity for adopting that part of his amendment bearing on this point. It is best to act generously toward those old men, who will soon be unable to take part in our public affairs.

Paragraph (b) is justified by the reasonable presumption that men who own property are interested in the government and possess ordinary intelligence. Otherwise they would not know how to procure property or how to conserve it once it was acquired.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. QUEZON. Yes.

Mr. MILLER. Does the gentleman not think that nearly all of those in class A, those who have held office under the Spanish Government, can qualify under class B; that is, that they are capable of writing either English or Spanish?

Mr. QUEZON. I think so.

Mr. MILLER. So that, as a matter of fact, if class A were cut out entirely, all of them would be able to vote under class B?

Mr. QUEZON. Perhaps that is true; but if it be true, what is the necessity for striking it out? To leave it would do no harm, according to that theory, and to strike it out may deprive some one of a right he now enjoys. Mr. Chairman, there are two propositions on the question of manhood suffrage that deserve attention. You either believe in allowing everybody to vote or you believe in confining this right to those who are qualified to vote. This bill does not propose to implant universal suffrage in the Philippine Islands. So the question to be decided is, Who are presumably to vote? I can not agree, Mr. Chairman, that the ability to read and write is the only test of the capacity to vote. Certainly it is by no means a guaranty that this right will be exercised patriotically. Many who misuse the privileges of citizenship are among the best-educated men. The assumption in giving to Filipinos who own taxable property or who pay a certain amount of taxes the right to vote is that such Filipinos as these, though they may not know how to read and write, are intelligent enough to discriminate between good and bad policies, and they must be interested in public affairs because of their property and its interests. As to paragraph (c), I do not see any reason why those who do not read and write the English or Spanish language, but who do read and write the native language, should not be allowed to vote. The principal native tongues in the Philippines have a rich literature, and a man may be very well informed through knowledge of these literatures. Many newspapers are printed in these languages.

Mr. Chairman, let me add that the inclusion among the electors of those who know how to read and write any native language is one of the reforms in the electoral law most urgently demanded by the Filipino people. Therefore, I hope the amendment will not be adopted. If adopted in its entirety, or even in part, suffrage will be more restricted than it has been, and the restriction will result in placing in the hands of a few people the government of the Philippine Islands.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. QUEZON. Yes.

Mr. BRYAN. Does the gentleman think that paying a tax on a horse or on personal property ought to be any more of a qualification for voting than paying taxes through the tariff, the man paying perhaps just as much taxes for himself and the members of his family as the man who owns property?

Mr. QUEZON. I do not; but the trouble is that you can not find out how much a man is paying under the tariff. [Applause and laughter on the Democratic side.]

Mr. BRYAN. Why not take some other means than this property qualification?

Mr. QUEZON. Because the property qualification is based on accurate knowledge of who is and who is not paying.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. QUEZON. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Why not universal manhood suffrage, since it could not be woman suffrage? Why not everyone?

Mr. QUEZON. Mr. Chairman, I should not care to express an opinion on that proposition, inasmuch as it is not before the House.

Mr. MANN. But it is before the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from the Philippines declines to yield.

Mr. MANN. Oh, the gentleman yielded to me.

Mr. QUEZON. I yielded to the gentleman, Mr. Chairman. I said the question is not before the House, because the amendment which I am discussing does not propose universal suffrage.

Mr. MANN. But the question before the House to which the amendment is offered is one restricting suffrage, and it seems to me to be a legitimate question to ask why the gentleman is opposed to universal manhood suffrage.

Mr. QUEZON. Doubtless it is a fair question, but since there is no proposal for universal suffrage I prefer not to discuss it.

Mr. MANN. That is beating about the bush; the question is before the House.

Mr. QUEZON. I prefer not to discuss the question now.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of the provisions of this bill as it came from the committee, and I am particularly in favor of the restrictions that are thrown around the franchise. I believe that in the Philippine Islands, as in this country and in every other country, there are some people who are not qualified for an intelligent exercise of the franchise privilege. I do not believe that if one-tenth of what the opponents of this measure have said here about the people in the Philippine Islands is true that there ought to be any liberalizing of the measure as reported from the committee. Now, the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa is deceptive. It purports to be a liberalization of the conditions. In point of fact it will lessen the number of electors in the islands. It restricts the privilege of franchise in a large way, and the consequence of its adoption would be to have fewer voters in the islands than there would be under the measure as proposed from the committee. I have not had the privilege of visiting the Philippine Islands; it is a pleasure I hope some time to have; and I can not pose as an expert, but I have every reason to believe from what the Philippine Commissioner himself has said, what I have read, what I have heard from other Members of this House who have had the privilege of traveling in the Philippine Islands, that there as here there are a number of people who are not entirely qualified for the right to vote.

Mr. JONES. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SLAYDEN. Yes.

Mr. JONES. How many States in the Union have what is called manhood suffrage?

Mr. SLAYDEN. Really, I do not know, but I think most of them have it.

Mr. MILLER. Every one north of Mason and Dixon's line.

Mr. JONES. No qualifications at all, property or educational?

Mr. SLAYDEN. I think the gentleman from Minnesota is mistaken about that.

Mr. TALCOTT of New York. What about Rhode Island?

Mr. SLAYDEN. Every man 21 years of age not convicted——

Mr. JONES. I would like, if the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] will permit me to do so in the time of the gentleman from Texas, to ask him a question. I would like to ask him whether or not there are any restrictions upon suffrage in Illinois?

Mr. MANN. Only in the matter of registration. There are no property or educational restrictions.

Mr. JONES. Can a man register without property or educational requirements?

Mr. MANN. Oh, yes; there are no property qualifications and no educational qualifications, as gentlemen can see by looking——

Mr. JONES. No poll-tax payment required?

Mr. MANN. No; and we have a very intelligent electorate.

Mr. JONES. An absolute manhood ballot?

Mr. MANN. Full manhood suffrage and a good deal of woman suffrage.

Mr. JONES. The gentleman knows that in some of the States they require those who desire to vote to register, and they have to exhibit some degree of education in order to register.

Mr. MANN. There is nothing of that sort in Illinois. You have to be registered a certain number of days.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. You have to mark the ballot personally?

Mr. MANN. The law does not require it; but, on the other hand, if you do not know how to mark a ballot you can ask the judge of election to send one of the judges into the booth to mark the ballot for you.

Mr. JONES. In many of the States the voters must possess either educational or property qualifications.

Mr. CULLOP. I desire to ask the gentleman if they do not have a period of residence necessary as a qualification?

Mr. MANN. Oh, yes; 30 days in a precinct, 90 days in a county, and a year in the State.

Mr. CULLOP. Nearly all the States have something of that sort.

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. CULLOP. We have that in our State.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I hope the gentleman's time will be extended for five minutes. Most of it has been consumed by others.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I only ask for one minute more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, if I understood the gentleman from Illinois correctly, every man 21 years of age unconvicted of a crime, not a penal slave, and not insane, or anything of that kind, is entitled to vote in that State. Is that correct?

Mr. MANN. I did not hear the gentleman.

Mr. SLAYDEN. As I understood the gentleman, every man 21 years of age, not disqualified by crime or non compos mentis, is entitled to vote.

Mr. MANN. Every citizen. No man can vote with us if he has not been naturalized.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Does not the gentleman think that a good many people coming under that qualification ought not to be allowed to vote?

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman wants my opinion, I think that giving full manhood suffrage has a tendency to make the State educate the people and is a good thing. I think it works well in our State.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I am asking sincerely for the gentleman's opinion.

Mr. MANN. I think it works well in our State. I do not know how it would work elsewhere.

Mr. SLAYDEN. It would not in mine.

Mr. CLINE. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana is recognized.

Mr. CLINE. Mr. Chairman, I want to occupy but a few minutes. I am in favor of this provision exactly as it is written in the bill. I am in favor of it, gentlemen, because it is the American idea of qualification for suffrage. As you know, one of the reasons why we broke away and established our own Government in this country was because we did not have representation in legislation. We had taxation without representation. And another theory is—and it is the prevailing opinion with a great many citizens—that a man that has property ought to have a right to have that property represented by his franchise when it is taxed for public or private improvements. That is what we do in this bill, and we enlarge the privileges or enlarge the number who may be qualified to vote. Why, gentlemen, what have we been spending a vast amount of money in the Philippines for in the last 14 years if it was not to educate the people and give them an opportunity to know how to rightfully and intelligently exercise the right of suffrage?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLINE. Yes.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Do I understand the gentleman to say that he is in favor of property and educational qualification for voters?

Mr. CLINE. I say I believe it has been the American theory that property ought to be represented in some way when it is taxed for public improvements.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. You do not have the American theory in Indiana.

Mr. CLINE. We have; and it is one of the stock arguments of the gentleman from Washington and his associates that the franchise ought to be extended to women because they are taxed without representation.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. In what respect?

Mr. CLINE. There is not a man in Indiana but that has a right to vote. I call the attention of the gentleman from Washington to another proposition, and that is that the State of Illinois, the State of Indiana, or the State of Ohio can not be adduced as a proper ground for drawing a conclusion as to what ought to be done in the Philippines. It would be reproachful upon the States of Indiana, Illinois, or Ohio if after 150 years we had not been able to educate the people so that the educational qualification alone would not encompass everybody who had a right to vote in those States. I can speak for my own section of Indiana and say that there is scarcely a man there but who can register in his own name in his own handwriting and qualify to vote under an educational test of any character that might be submitted to him.

Now, I say that that is one of the reasons, gentlemen, why I am following your side of the proposition in this matter. You say that the people in the Philippines are not qualified, that they are illiterate, and that the right of franchise ought not to be extended to them. I say that the very purpose of expending the amount of money we have there has been for the reason that we want them to have that knowledge of public questions and affairs that will enable them to intelligently express themselves at the polls on public questions. I want to enlarge the classes who may safely vote, so I support the bill as it stands. If I wanted to restrict franchise in the Philippines, I would vote for the amendment.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Chairman, while I am in favor of educational qualifications of voters, it does seem to me it is rather an unusual position for the distinguished gentleman from Indiana to occupy. Unless I am very much mistaken, they have no qualification in Indiana except that a voter must be a male person 21 years old. Not only that, but in all the years I resided in Indiana—and I think it is true yet—they did not even have to be a citizen of this country in order to vote in that State.

Mr. CLINE. Oh, well, if the gentleman will permit, he is mistaken in that.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I am not mistaken as to how it was when I lived there.

Mr. CLINE. That was so long ago that you have not any recollection as to the real conditions that exist now.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. And I think that is the condition now. I think they have a vote in your State after they take out their first papers and before they are American citizens. If the gentleman will look, he will find out I am right about it.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I ask, in my own time, to have read a short editorial from the Daily Iron Trade on the subject of this bill.

Mr. JONES. Is it on the subject of this amendment?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. It is on the general subject of this bill, but not on the subject of this amendment. It will take only two or three minutes. I am sure that is the quickest way to get through with it. In fact, I am absolutely certain on that point.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

"WHENCE WILL COME THE MODERN JOHN A. DIX?

"Nearly everyone who will read this, read his Sunday paper yesterday

"Before he went to church.

"Probably he took general notice of that item concerning the supreme effort that is being made by the present national administration to pass a so-called 'Philippine bill'—

"A device that, devoid of temperamental terms, philanthropic phraseology, and gregarious generosity, is designed eventually to haul down the American flag now floating over the Philippine Islands—

"The greatest possible unkindness to the islands and the people who live there.

"Something that we would regret until eternity; and "Something for which some of the people in high places would be remembered when otherwise they would be forgotten.

"Not so many years ago, either

"Another national administration actually sent a 'commissioner' to the Hawaiian Islands, who actually did pull down the American flag, which the Hawaiian people themselves desired to have float there.

"Mr. Blount is remembered in American history for that one act.

"But the American flag to-day floats over the Hawaiian Islands; and "A Hawaiian Delegate sits in the American Congress.

"No more talk now of hauling down the American flag in Hawaii.

"Nor will be.

"And there was another item in that Sunday paper

"To the effect that

"English, French, and German ships, formerly carrying mails, passengers, and freight down the west coast of South America, had discontinued all their sailings

"Because of the danger of capture from English and German warships in that locality—

"And we have not a single American ship to take their place.

"And no one doubts that we are suffering

"A gigantic loss

"As a result.

"In spite of the Panama Canal, built exclusively for the use of foreign shipping interests

"As we have none of our own engaged in the over-sea trade to use it.

"And the pity of it is that

"Our National Government should be trying to keep in session a badly disorganized, disgruntled, and worn-out Congress

"To pass with such needless haste

"This 'pull-down-the-American-flag' legislation—

"While it promises—

"As had so many other previous Congresses

"Since long before the Philippine Islands came under our flag

"To pass

"Merchant marine legislation
"'Next session!'
"A stranger to our shores might well imagine that
"Our national legislators were obsessed by some peculiar form of malady that make them fear the day when the United States commercially should become—
"As some strong European countries have become—
"A power in foreign trade.
"Would this guess be inaccurate?
"'If anyone attempts to haul down the American flag, shoot him on the spot.'"

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, debate on this section seems to have been exhausted, and I hope we may have a vote now.

Mr. MONDELL. I would like to have five minutes.

Mr. JONES. I ask, Mr. Chairman, that all debate on this amendment be concluded in five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent that debate on this amendment be concluded in five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I rise to support the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa. Clearly the provision at the bottom of page 11 should go out. The fact that a man has at one time held office should not qualify him to vote if he is not otherwise qualified. I want to discuss particularly the provision with regard to property qualification. It is a very questionable one, although I am willing to admit conditions are different in the Philippines than they are here at home. There may be some little argument for that sort of a thing in the Philippines, but very little, in my opinion. I agree entirely with the gentleman from Iowa in his amendment with regard to the ability to read and write. The State constitution of the State I have the honor to represent here contains a provision in the form of an educational qualification. No one is eligible to vote who is not, in the first place, 21 years of age, a citizen of the United States, and able to read and write. For some years that was interpreted to mean ability to read and write in any written language, and we had some people in our section who are quite well educated in European languages, but who, when they came to the State, were not able to read and write English. In a test case that came up some 10 or 12 years ago the supreme court interpreted the language in the constitution to mean ability to read and write English. I think there were but very few people who were disqualified by that interpretation. I have heard no criticism of the decision. We find that those who are educated in any written language—and if we are not going to change this provision in any other way we should insert at least the word "written"—that those who are educated in any civilized language soon acquire the ability to read and to write in the official language of the country in which they live. I think that would be the case in the Philippines, although I do not pretend to be as fully informed in regard to the matter as the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. JONES. Does the gentleman know what is the official language in the Philippines?

Mr. MONDELL. Well, we in effect make English and Spanish the official languages of the Philippines.

Mr. JONES. No; we do not.

Mr. MONDELL. We do by this act.

Mr. JONES. No; we do not by this act.

Mr. MONDELL. Of course that is a question of definition.

Mr. JONES. I will say to the gentleman, for his information, that up until recently Spanish had been the official language. A law was passed making English the official language after a certain date, but it had not gone into effect up to a short time ago. Whether or not it has yet gone into operation, I do not know.

Mr. MONDELL. What I meant is not so much the official language as the language in which official business is transacted in the main.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. SLAYDEN. It is a wild hypothesis, of course, but suppose Russia should make war on this country and conquer it and determine to administer our affairs according to Russian laws, in the Russian language, how many Members of this House do you suppose could acquire a knowledge of that language?

Mr. MONDELL. I do not think that is an analogous case at all. These people, the educated people, mostly read and write English or Spanish now.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wyoming has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I ask for two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. By agreement it was determined that the amendment should be voted upon in five minutes. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington [Mr. BRYAN] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 12, line 1, after the word "those," insert the words "of either sex, whether male or female."

Mr. BRYAN. Now, Mr. Chairman, if that amendment is adopted——

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order on that.

Mr. BRYAN. This just refers to the property qualification. It is an entirely different amendment from what was submitted before.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I make the point of order, Mr. Chairman, that that has already been voted upon.

Mr. BRYAN. But, Mr. Chairman, I contend that——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair holds that it has been.

Mr. BRYAN. Will the Chair hear me and allow me to explain the fact?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. BRYAN. Originally there was an amendment proposing the cutting out of the word "male" on the other page, affecting all these classifications. My amendment merely extends the property qualification before a woman shall have the right to vote. It would not establish universal suffrage for women. That is not at issue here. No ruling or point of order could make it the same amendment, even if the rulings were piled up mountain high. It is an entirely different amendment.

Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROBERTS] moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, do I understand that the Chair ruled on the point of order raised by the gentleman from Tennessee?

Mr. PAYNE. He did.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the Chair hear me on that?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming asks to be heard on the point of order.

Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts. I understood the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] to say that the Chair had ruled on the point of order

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair ruled, but the gentleman from Wyoming asked to be heard.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BRYAN. Does that waive my right to appeal from the decision of the Chair?

The CHAIRMAN. No.

Mr. MONDELL. I am sure, Mr. Chairman, that neither the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT], who made the point of order, nor the Chair gave this matter sufficient consideration to come to a sound conclusion. I am sure that neither of the gentlemen desire to have a precedent established that would rise to plague us in the future.

While I realize that the amendment that the gentleman from Washington [Mr. BRYAN] proposes may not be adopted, still it is clearly in order, for this reason: That the former amendment was a general provision—a general provision under which any woman coming under classes A, B, or C could have voted; a general provision under which all of the women in the Philippine Islands otherwise qualified in those classes could vote.

Now, this is an entirely different proposition, to wit, that the women of the Philippine Islands that are possessed of property, who are holders of property, real estate, real property, may vote. I am sure that both the Chairman and the gentleman who made the point of order will admit that that is an entirely different question. That is all I care to say, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be heard on the point of order. Let me call the attention of the Chair to the fact that the general language of section 15 is found in the beginning of that section, and then we come down to the consideration of those who shall have the right to vote. There are three classes given the right to vote, and if any citizen of the Philippine Islands qualifies under either of those three classes he shall have the right to vote.

Now, the first, changing the word "male," in the beginning of section 15, would make it, of course, apply to all three of those classes. This amendment, offered by the gentleman from Washington [Mr. BRYAN], applies only to this one class; that is, no female can vote; no woman can vote under the first classification; no woman can vote under the third classification, even if she can read or write a language. But this proposition is that a woman may be allowed to vote if she shall have a property qualification. It does seem to me, Mr. Chairman, that is not a repetition. As the Chair understands, it must be exactly the same question that was before determined. This is not the same proposition, and therefore I think that the point of order is not well taken.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, if the point of order be not well taken, if this amendment is disposed of, then the gentleman from Washington [Mr. BRYAN] could offer precisely the same amendment to subsection (c) and subsection (a), which would bring the whole proposition which was voted upon once again before the committee, which has already passed fully and completely upon the subject.

It is true that this is general; but when it was disposed of by the House it disposed of all of the propositions contained under the general terms.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman allow me to ask a question?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Certainly.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman realizes that while the House might not desire to extend the right proposed to cover all these classes, it might be disposed to extend that right to one class or to two classes. This is the qualified suffrage that is provided in some of the States, and I am sure that the gentleman does not want to be put in the position of establishing a precedent that will certainly plague us in the matter of amendments in the future.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I will say that that amendment would have been in order if offered at the proper time. If the gentleman from Washington had offered his amendment to this particular section before the gentleman from Illinois had offered his, I will not undertake to say that it would not have been in order and that the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois would not also have been in order. But there has been a reversal of that proposition. It was not offered at the right time. The general question has been voted upon and settled by the House. The gentleman had his opportunity; or at least if it had been offered at the right time——

Mr. BRYAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. BRYAN. If the gentleman——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has ruled that the point is well taken. The Chair ruled that way because the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] disposed of this whole question, and disposed of the question of female suffrage in the Philippine Islands; and to test it over and over again would be to go over the same ground that had already been gone over.

Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD excerpts from the remarks of certain members of the House and Senate.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD certain remarks of Members of the House and Senate.

Mr. KEATING. On what subject?

Mr. JONES. Will the gentleman state upon what subject?

Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts. With regard to the Baltimore platform. It has nothing to do with this bill.

Mr. JONES. I hope the gentleman will not press the question while we are considering this bill. Why can not the gentleman ask that just before adjournment this evening?

Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts. I will further ask that the remarks be printed separately, and not in connection with the debate on this bill.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I hope the gentleman will not press that. He can not do it in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts. I understand I can do it.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I have not been objecting to these political matters on either side going into the RECORD. I never have, according to my recollection, made an objection to anything of that kind; but objection has been made on both sides of the House, and I hope the gentleman will not make that request in connection with the debate on this bill.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I object for the present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee objects.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment. I move to amend, page 12, line 5, by striking out the comma after the word "Spanish" and inserting the word "or," and to strike out the comma after the word "English," and the remainder of the sentence, and insert in lieu thereof a period.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 12, line 5, after the word "Spanish," strike out the comma and insert the word "or"; after the word "English," strike out the comma and the remainder of the sentence and insert a period.

So that the paragraph will read:

(c) Those who are able to read and write either Spanish or English.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I make the point of order that that has been voted upon.

Mr. MILLER. I shall be glad to be heard on that point of order.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The Chair has ruled already.

Mr. MILLER. Certainly, the Chair has not made any such ruling.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Is not this a part of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa?

Mr. MILLER. The gentleman from Iowa moved to strike out two or three paragraphs preceding.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. But did it not include this?

Mr. MILLER. Very true; but while the committee might not feel inclined to strike out all that he asked to have stricken out, it still might be inclined to strike out a portion. If the Chair is inclined to rule against me, I should like to be heard on it for a moment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, the point of order can not be sustained against the amendment unless the committee voted on the precise question. Now, the precise question is whether or not we intend to extend the franchise to the people of the Philippine Islands who can read and write a native language. Now, that is the question and that is all there is to it. The question which was previously voted upon by the committee, contained in the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER], was to take the franchise from several classes, first those who had held petty offices under the Spanish régime, enumerated in classification "a," on page 11. It also proposed to strike out the property qualification throughout the Philippine Islands. In addition, it proposed this elimination. Therefore, in the proposition submitted by the gentleman from Iowa, there were a number of different features. This is one. The committee might well feel disinclined to adopt the entire amendment striking out all of those qualifications, and yet be entirely willing to accept the amendment in respect to one; and it seems to me that it would be out of harmony with every principle of parliamentary procedure to sustain such a point of order as that.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the Chair hear me a moment?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. STAFFORD. I wish to direct the attention of the Chair to paragraph 7 of Rule XVI, which provides as follows:

A motion to strike out and insert is indivisible, but a motion to strike out being lost shall neither preclude amendment nor motion to strike out and insert.

The amendment proposed by the gentleman from Iowa was a motion to strike out. It was lost. Now comes the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota, which is to strike out and insert. I think that clause 7 of Rule XVI makes the present amendment in order.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, that is precisely the same question that was presented a moment ago in the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa.

The CHAIRMAN. The direct question was voted on and decided by the committee in the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa, and the Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, if this is going to be the intent of the committee to prevent these amendments, you are going to be a long time finishing this bill.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that no quorum is present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington makes the point that no quorum is present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Thirty-one Members present—not a quorum.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and Mr. HAY having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. FLOOD of Virginia, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 18459, the Philippine Islands bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS IN THE RECORD.

Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD excerpts from remarks by certain Senators and Representatives in Congress in regard to the Baltimore platform.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to print in the RECORD certain remarks by Members and Senators on the Baltimore platform. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend remarks in the RECORD upon our President.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to extend remarks in the RECORD on "Our President." Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, I will say that the editorial which the gentleman wants to print has been already printed in the RECORD. Does he want to print it again?

Mr. RAKER. Printed by some one who got unanimous consent?

Mr. MANN. It was printed in the RECORD in the Senate.

Mr. RAKER. Very well, then; once is enough. Having been printed already in the RECORD, Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my request.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the subject of tobacco.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. BRISTOW:

A bill (S. 6628) granting an increase of pension to George F. Weitzel (with accompanying papers); and

A bill (S. 6629) granting an increase of pension to John G. Avery (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. TOWNSEND:

A bill (S. 6630) granting an increase of pension to Smith C. Hotchkin (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. JAMES:

A bill (S. 6632) granting a pension to Benjamin Matlock (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. For the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE] I introduce a bill which is regarded as very important, and I ask its reference to the Committee on Foreign Relations. The report which I made at the third session of the Sixty-second Congress, being Senate Report No. 1267, accompanies the bill, which is similar in form to the one reported at that time.

The bill (S. 6631) to regulate the practice of pharmacy and the sale of poison in the consular districts of the United States in China was read twice by its title and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT LA JUNTA, COLO.

Mr. SWANSON, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 12665) to increase the limit of cost of public building at La Junta, Colo., reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 817) thereon.

EMERGENCY REVENUE LEGISLATION.

Mr. HITCHCOCK submitted two amendments intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 18891) to increase the internal revenue, and for other purposes, which were ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

HEARING BEFORE COMMITTEE ON AGRICULTURE.

Mr. SHAFROTH submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 470), which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate be authorized to approve a voucher for reporting a hearing before a subcommittee of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry held on April 17, 1914.

HEARINGS BEFORE THE JUDICIARY COMMITTEE.

Mr. REED. I ask unanimous consent to call up a resolution which I submitted on Saturday last and had referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, which was subsequently reported favorably by me from that committee.

It is the ordinary resolution authorizing the Judiciary Committee to take evidence. The original resolution as it now is upon the record is so drawn that the evidence can only be taken while Congress is in session. This resolution proposes to extend the authority to take some evidence during vacation; it proposes to confer that general right; but, as a matter of fact, it is only to be exercised in one case in reference to a bill which is before the Judiciary Committee. Probably the taking of the evidence which is proposed will not consume a day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I shall not object, provided there is no discussion; but after this matter is disposed of I shall insist upon the regular order.

Mr. REED. The Senator from North Carolina will understand that I spoke to him about this matter on Saturday.

Mr. SIMMONS. But I did not understand that it was going to give rise to any debate.

Mr. REED. I think it will not. I think the matter will go through by unanimous consent.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be stated.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 469) reported by Mr. REED from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate on October 8 (calendar day, October 10), 1914, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary, or any subcommittee thereof, be authorized, during the Sixty-third Congress, to send for persons and papers, to administer oaths, to employ a stenographer, at a cost not to exceed $1 per printed page, to report such hearings as may be had in connection with any subject that may be pending before said committee, and to have such hearings printed for the use of the committee; that the expenses of such hearings be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate, and that the said committee and all subcommittees thereof may sit during the sessions of the Senate.

Resolved further, That the said committee or any subcommittee thereof is hereby authorized to conduct said hearings and investigations in the city of Washington or elsewhere as it may deem proper, and may continue such hearings and investigations during any recess of said Congress.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. May I ask the Senator from Missouri a question?

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I ask if the resolution is directed with reference to hearings which have already been begun before a subcommittee?

Mr. REED. Yes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to.

AMERICAN VESSELS AND WATCH OFFICERS.

Mr. JONES. If the Senator from North Carolina will yield for a moment, I wish to state that on Saturday last I submitted a resolution calling for certain information from the Secretary of Commerce. The Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] objected to its consideration, and thinks that the resolution should be referred to a committee. I simply desire to ask that the resolution be taken from the table and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. SIMMONS. There will be no objection to that.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution referred to by the Senator from Washington will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 467), as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of Commerce be requested to furnish to the Senate the following information:

1. How many Americans were shown by reports from the various customs districts to be available for watch officers, including masters, mates, and engineers, when the order suspending the requirements of the navigation laws relating thereto for a period of seven years was issued.

2. Copies of letters and communications on file with the department relating to the supply of Americans available for watch officers on ships admitted to American registry.

3. A list of the vessels admitted to American registry under the emergency act, with a statement as to where and when built, by whom owned, what flag heretofore flying, and the number of American vessels and watch officers employed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

THE COTTON SITUATION IN THE SOUTH.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I received this morning a letter from a lady constituent of mine in Alabama bearing on the cotton situation in the South. I think it is the most interesting and instructive letter I have read on the subject, and I ask to have it printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The letter referred to is as follows:

TUSKEGEE, ALA., October 8, 1914.

DEAR SIR: I have read quite a great deal about the cotton situation and the plans for financing the crop and reducing the acreage for 1915. It seems that no plan has been devised that meets the requirements of all the parties concerned, and unless the acreage reduction is made on a basis fair to all growers, great and small, it will not only be very unsatisfactory but prove a failure, for doubtless many who talk reduction will perhaps reduce their apparent acreage, but have an interest in the acreage of other parties who will not reduce—so as to offset their apparent reduction and to not plant any cotton at all is a course too improbable to be worth discussing.

It seems to me a better plan would be to concentrate all efforts on a system of bonded warehouses in all the cotton-growing States for the purpose of holding enough cotton off the market to materially raise the price of what remains to be sold.

It is said that cotton a year old is better for spinning purposes than raw cotton, and that cotton does not deteriorate in three to five years. Then it seems to me it would be a wiser course to set aside what is estimated to be a surplus of this year's crop, take it completely off the market, and not sell it under any condition. Then, when the spinners and manufacturers find that to wait for low prices or an unloading of "distressed cotton" on the market is useless, they will begin to buy, and a fair price will be obtained.

This could be accomplished by forming "cotton-holding corporations" in each State, with bonded warehouses and sufficient capital to buy up and properly insure such cotton at at least 10 cents per pound, which price has been obtained by the "buy-a-bale-of-cotton" movement. The number of bales in this reserve supply should be a certain per cent of each State's production, so as to be fair to each State; and when selling begins at a fair price the reserve cotton could be released by certain per cent from each State so that one State would not profit more by the "holding movement" than a sister State. Also arrangements could be made for a planter to store his cotton with this "holding corporation" for a reasonable charge, without selling outright.

Don't you think a system like this would be worth more than futile attempts to decrease next year's cotton acreage 50 per cent or even 25 per cent? Because it won't be done systematically or satisfactorily.

As to leaving out cotton and raising foodstuffs in large proportion, Mr. Tait Butler in (September 26) Progressive Farmer covered that ground to my idea. There would be "no market," and the South has no facilities to handle such crops, no machinery to work such farms on a large scale, no storage houses, etc., and the cost of such things would be prohibitive of such experimenting in raising foodstuffs. Besides foodstuffs won't keep like cotton, and there would be too much competition to guarantee the South a market for foodstuffs in one year. Cotton is the South's money crop, and a small farmer could manage better with cotton at 7 cents a pound than on foodstuffs for which he had no sale.

Diversification of crops is all right and ought to be preached day in and day out, but to expect to revolutionize a whole section's crop system in one year is chimerical. The tenant farmer pays his rent in cotton; the price cuts no figure with him as far as the rent is concerned. He pays in a certain number of bales. What is over the rent is his concern. A great many tenants couldn't grow enough foodstuffs to pay rent equal to cotton, nor would a landlord rent land on those conditions. Nine out of ten would "take a chance on cotton."

Now, with the plan to form "holding corporations" in each State, all surplus cotton could be brought up and stored for next year's sale—unless some unprecedented demand arose at such price as to cause a sale a little later on. Then next fall sell the 1914 reserve, or 1-year-old cotton, and put back a like reserve out of 1915 crop for 1916 sales; thus you could handle the situation and be a crop ahead each year, so if the boll weevil becomes a disturbing factor it would be better to have next year's crop and store it than not to make any crop or a small crop and then be confronted with a demand for cotton, due to expanding trade relations and a cessation of the present war and a resumption of trade on the part of foreign countries. As Mr. W. P. G. Harding said he believed underproduction next year would be worse than overproduction, etc. True, it would be better to have the crop and store in the bonded warehouses with proper insurance, and be ready to meet any trade emergency, rather than—to quote Mr. Harding—make "the trade dependent upon the present crop for the greater portion of its two years' supply."

For this plan would not disturb farmers in their plans for next year, and the time wasted on preaching acreage reduction could be better spent gathering information as to the farmer's actual needs and to show farmers the best way to get started in a small way to diversify their crops, for nine out of ten are going to hang to cotton, for it pays the rent regardless of price, and has been and will be the money crop of the South.

To tax cotton production will not answer, for few would agree to the right of State or Government to tax one's individual right to raise what he pleased. Such a tax would about crush the small grower, for while cotton may be low in price, he would have to pay high for foodstuffs and manufactured articles, etc., besides the tax.

As to live-stock raising: Very few farmers could buy the cattle to stock a farm or could find them to buy in this section, and then it is three to five years before much can be expected from that investment, and the element of death by disease and uncertainty as to increase of herd would make many hesitate. Scattered efforts here and there would not count for much.

A holding corporation in each State, if properly managed, would eliminate all this talk and multiplicity of plans and could be made a permanent factor in handling the cotton crops of the future. When farmers know they have an organization back of them strong enough to sustain the price of cotton, and manufacturers know that cotton can be bought only at fair prices, the disposal of the cotton crop would not be "haphazard," as it is now, and the price low until it is out of the farmer's hands and into the "middleman's." This holding corporation, composed of farmers, manufacturers, bankers, financiers, etc., could deal directly with the farmer and directly with the manufacturers through their agents, not in the sense of the so-called middleman, but as an avenue of trade, be a means to an end.

Now, with other uses for cotton being thought out, such as bagging for baling cotton, sacks for produce, and the demand for cotton-made goods, etc., all of which will increase the demand for cotton—why reduce the 1915 crop, when cotton properly stored does not deteriorate in value in three years or more, and the boll weevil promises to be a factor in reducing the crop for the next year or two, and the demand may exceed the supply, should the war end soon; "it would be better to have a reserve supply with these facts before us rather than a reduced crop in 1915."

I should not think it would be difficult to form these "cotton-holding corporations" of responsible persons in each cotton State, with uniform rules and sufficient capital to insure success of the movement. These corporations would be more or less profitable according to the rules governing their formation.

Responsible persons could be found in each county to boost this movement and explain to farmers and landlords and others what the movement means to the cotton producer now and in the future. Then let the farmers register by counties the number of bales they want to sell, the number they can hold, etc., and in what way they can and will diversify their crops. Find out about the man who is the actual producer, then you will know better how to relieve the situation for him and for all others interested. Farmers will be willing to register if given the assurance from responsible sources that their interests will be protected.

And I should think industries begun now in the United States to make the articles formerly imported—which supply has been cut off by the war—should be protected from foreign imports, even should the war end soon, until they are in a position to compete with foreign-made goods. Such assurances of protection would build up new industries for America and make her, as she should be, independent of every foreign nation.

"Made in the United States of America" should be our slogan from now on. "Home production for home consumption."

EMERGENCY REVENUE LEGISLATION.

The Senate, as in Committee on the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 18891) to increase the internal revenue, and for other purposes.

Mr. SMOOT obtained the floor.

Mr. SIMMONS. Before the Senator from Utah begins his speech, I desire to give notice that after he has concluded I shall ask unanimous consent that a vote be taken upon the pending measure on Thursday of this week.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. One moment. May I ask the Senator from North Carolina if he is prompted in that suggestion by the desire to obtain an early adjournment?

Mr. SIMMONS. That is my motive; yes.

Mr. OVERMAN. Do I understand that the Senator from North Carolina is going to ask unanimous consent for a vote at the conclusion of the speech of the Senator from Utah?

Mr. SIMMONS. I have not now asked for that unanimous consent; but, in order that Senators might be present, I simply gave notice that I should ask it at the conclusion of the speech of the Senator from Utah.

Mr. OVERMAN. I wish to say that if unanimous consent is asked I shall object. I am not going to agree to unanimous consent unless something is done to relieve the cotton situation in the South.

Mr. JAMES. The sooner we can get a vote on the pending bill the easier it may be to get relief for the cotton planters of the South. There is to be no condition in this unanimous-consent agreement, for which the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] intends to ask, that we shall adjourn on Thursday. It is merely that we shall vote on the pending bill on Thursday.

Mr. SMOOT. I want to say to the Senator from Kentucky that, if the Senate is to be kept here for the next two months in the discussion of the question of relief for the cotton growers of the South, perhaps that will have some bearing upon how quickly we shall get through with the pending measure.

Mr. OVERMAN. I want to say to the Senator that there is an amendment being prepared to be presented to the pending bill which will, I think, help our people in their distressed condition. All we want is time to prepare that amendment to be submitted; and as soon as it is voted on, if it is voted down, we will make no further objection.

Mr. JAMES. I did not suppose the Senator from Utah would take the position that he would oppose the consideration and passage of just and proper legislation because he was opposed to some other legislation.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I do not know why the Senator should construe what little I said in that light.

Mr. JAMES. It is susceptible of no other construction.

Mr. OVERMAN. I think I understood the Senator from Utah. His impression was, I understand, that I referred to a separate bill; I did not.

Mr. SMOOT. That is what I understood the Senator to mean.

Mr. OVERMAN. What I mean is that there will be an amendment offered to the tax bill which we think will solve this question. All we want is a vote on it, and when the vote is taken we are willing to quit and adjourn.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I want to say this——

Mr. OVERMAN. Until that amendment is prepared and ready to be offered, I will not agree to fix a time to vote on the bill; and so far as Thursday is concerned, I will not now consent.

Mr. JAMES. I presume the Senator could have the amendment ready by Thursday.

Mr. OVERMAN. We will have it ready; yes. But I do not want to be bound so that we can not have a vote on that amendment.

Mr. TOWNSEND. The Senator will have an opportunity to secure a vote on the amendment to which he refers.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Let me ask the Senator from North Carolina if the amendment to which he refers is being prepared by the Finance Committee?

Mr. OVERMAN. No; it is being prepared by some Senators from the South.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. And are we to be given to understand that until that amendment is considered the tax bill will not be passed?

Mr. OVERMAN. I mean that I am not now going to consent to a vote on Thursday, because if we did we would be bound by the unanimous consent and precluded from the discussion of the amendments; if we are ready and the amendments can be discussed, then we will vote on Thursday. In other words, I do not want to be bound in such a way so that we can not be heard on an amendment to this bill; that is all.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I do not understand, Mr. President, how the Senator would be precluded from offering an amendment to this bill even if unanimous consent is given to vote on Thursday.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator can offer an amendment to this bill at any time he desires.

Mr. OVERMAN. If I agreed to a vote on Thursday, the amendment might not be prepared and ready to be offered on that day, and then it would be cut off. I will probably not offer the amendment myself, but it will be offered.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I understand the question of unanimous consent is not now before the Senate.

Mr. SIMMONS. I simply gave notice that I would make the request.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I call for the regular order.

Mr. SIMMONS. I call for the regular order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Utah is entitled to the floor.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the claim that this bill to raise over a hundred million dollars in the way of direct taxes on the people is solely attributable to the war in Europe is not true. It is due greatly to the condition of affairs in this country, brought on by the mistaken legislation of the Democratic Party in Congress and the unjustifiable extravagance in appropriations. If the tariff law as it existed before the passage of the Underwood Democratic measure had been left alone and business carried on under a Republican administration and with a Republican Congress, there would have been no trouble whatever. The country was unusually prosperous when the Democrats, by a division in the Republican ranks, secured control of the Government. They promised all sorts of reforms and have kept Congress in almost continuous session, with a result of imposing enormous additional burdens in the way of direct taxation. In addition to the income tax, they now propose to levy considerably more than a hundred millions on the plea of the war in Europe. The United States is not at war with any country. With the war preventing exports from Germany and Austria, and limiting those from the United Kingdom, France, and Russia, the United States should be in a position to profit instead of adding this enormous burden of taxation. But it is not in that position simply because of the absolute failure of the Democratic tariff law and other legislation enacted since that party came in control of the Government. The plea that the war in Europe makes this legislation necessary is a shameful pretext.

I will admit that the outbreak of the European war at a time when the Democratic Party's fiscal policies had proved a failure and brought the administration to a point where, in order to meet the extravagant and ever-increasing appropriations, the usual Democratic bond sale had to be made or additional direct taxes imposed upon an already overburdened and overtaxed people, has given the party a new hope against a severe rebuke at the polls this fall. All hope of success had vanished before the declaration of war. War is to be the excuse in this campaign for every Democratic blunder, every extravagant appropriation, every piece of vicious legislation. It is to be the Democratic Mother Hubbard, to cover everything and touch nothing. The evil effects of the Democratic economic policies were acknowledged by millions and felt by all long before the war. While the Democratic Party finds itself the beneficiary of the unjustifiable and wicked war, I want every producer of goods in the United States to know that he, too, will be a temporary beneficiary, and I hope that the producers of commodities of every kind will prepare to take advantage of the opportunity, even though it comes to them through no action of the party in power, but through the misfortunes that have befallen the people of Europe. Never in the world's history has there been such a dreadful sacrifice of human life and wicked destruction of property. America will be called upon to furnish goods to the former customers of the belligerent powers. She will be expected to furnish food and supplies to the belligerents themselves, and, greater than either, we must produce the goods required by our own people. Horrible as the war is, it will temporarily neutralize the blight to our own manufacturing institutions caused by the Democratic tariff law. American producers should have prosperous times for months to come and until the war ceases and European industrial plants again become productive. But when that time arrives there will be made a renewed and vigorous effort on the part of the warring countries to capture the American market. We may think we have had sharp competition in the past, and we have; but it will be keener and sharper after the war, for the poor people made poorer and the rich and well-to-do reduced to poverty by the ravages of war will be compelled to work, and the question of the amount of wage will be a secondary consideration. No Senator has quoted more approvingly the editorials of W. R. Hearst, a prominent Democrat, than has the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST], and while he was addressing the Senate last Friday, picturing the wonderful accomplishments, as he thought, of the present administration, and offering most ingenious excuses for its failures, I thought several times like asking him to read the signed editorial by Mr. Hearst appearing in the Chicago American September 20. I concluded it would hardly be fair to him to do so; but the editorial gives such good advice to his party, and covers the war excuse for imposing another burden on the American people of over $100,000,000 so well, that I will present it to the Senate myself and beg that my Democratic friends will ponder over it well. I now quote it:

MOST PEACEFUL NATION IN THE WORLD IS ASKED BY FREE TRADERS TO PAY A WAR TAX OF A HUNDRED MILLION DOLLARS.

[William R. Hearst, in Chicago American, Sept. 20.]

The most peaceful nation in the world is to be asked to pay a war tax of a hundred million dollars. The United States is not at war, and is not in reality a sufferer from the European war.

The necessity for this tax is not created wholly by the war in Europe, or even mainly by the war.

The deficit in the income of the United States Government is due partly to the reduction in the amount of the imports into this country, but also largely to a reduction of the tax upon imports into this country.

The reduction in the amount of the imports the party in power at Washington is not responsible for, but the reduction in the amount of the tax on imports the party in power in Washington is responsible for.

The reduction in the amount of foreign imports is not a disadvantage. On the contrary, it is in many respects a distinct benefit to our country. The reduction in the amount of income from these imports is obviously a disadvantage and a distinct disadvantage at this time.

It would appear, therefore, that the party in power in Washington was not responsible for such benefits as there are in this present situation, but was and is responsible for the disadvantages of the situation.

Why can not the Democratic Party frankly confess that its free-trade theories are a mistake, have always proved to be a mistake, and are now proving to be a mistake?

Why can not the Democratic Party, which has many claims upon popular confidence, abandon the visionary and impractical policies which will, if persisted in, forever deny it popular confidence and support?

War or no war, the Democratic Party's tariff policies were proving failures.

Before war in Europe was declared or even contemplated, the balance of trade was showing immensely against this country. Our export balance had decreased over a quarter of a billion dollars in seven months.

Gold was being exported in quantity.

The income tax had proved insufficient to compensate for the reduction in the tariff revenues.

Foreign goods were coming into our country, perhaps not in sufficient quantities to raise an adequate governmental revenue under the reduced rate of taxation, but certainly in sufficient quantities to deprive our American laborers of employment.

American men out of employment were parading the streets.

American business men in bankruptcy were putting up their shutters.

American factories were closing and discharging their employees, and, instead of America shipping more goods abroad than before the reduction of the tariff, America was importing more and shipping less, with the balance of trade going more and more to our disadvantage.

Then comes the European war, and through no effort or merit of our own, European goods are withheld from our markets and our home markets are again open to our home manufacturers.

Another consequence of this European war is the opening of foreign markets to our products.

Markets which were formerly supplied with goods from England and France and Germany and Austria will not be supplied from those nations, and must be supplied with goods from the United States.

The advantage of markets is clear and conclusive. Markets are merely the demands for our products. Without the demands there can not be a sustained supply, and with enlarging demands there must ever be enlarging supply, increasing production, increasing employment, and increasing prosperity.

We could have kept our home markets with legitimate protection.

We could have gotten enlarged foreign markets with judicious reciprocity.

We did neither.

But what we failed to do for ourselves the war will do for us.

Yet to take full advantage of the opportunities which the European war offers to this neutral Nation those opportunities should be made as permanent as possible by intelligent legislation and diplomatic negotiation.

If home markets are desirable and advantageous, as they obviously are, let us retain them for American producers by a tariff admittedly for protection.

If foreign markets are advisable and advantageous, as they clearly and surely are, let us retain them and enlarge them for our American manufacturers by reciprocity treaties.

A tariff for revenue only has proven to be a tariff for insufficient revenue only.

A tariff for judicious protection would prove a tariff for sufficient revenue as well.

If a frank policy of judicious protection intelligently coupled with reciprocity were adopted by the Democratic Party, the business men of America could proceed confidently and competently to take advantage of their present unexampled opportunities.

They would know that those opportunities and advantages would not be temporary, but permanent.

They could build factories, not to operate for the period of a war lasting only a few months, but for periods of years, guaranteed by the fostering care of a wise and farseeing Government.

There would then be no need for continual levies of new taxes.

There would then be no occasion for parades of unemployed or business proceedings in bankruptcy.

There would then be no need of foreign wars or such regrettable calamaties to others for us to glean a prosperity which should be naturally our due.

With our home markets secured through legitimate protection and foreign markets obtained through intelligent reciprocity our production would be immense and our prosperity correspondingly great.

Then with a merchant marine to carry our products to all parts of the world and a mighty Navy to protect our ships and our shores America could be in the dominant position which the enterprise and intelligence of its people, if not of its Government, entitle it to hold.

Why can not the Democratic Party abandon its theories, which have proved false, its policies, which have proved fatal?

Why can it not cease forever taxing our producers, forever restricting, restraining, and retarding our production? Why can it not embark upon a new and enlightened policy of intelligently encouraging our production, of adequately transporting our production, and of constantly enlarging and retaining the markets for our production at home and abroad?

In this way lie progress and prosperity for the party, for the Government, and for the Nation.

When the Democratic Party took control of the Government there was a balance in the general fund of the Treasury of nearly $150,000,000. With the proper administration of the Government that balance would have increased, instead of falling off, as has been the case. The Democrats reduced that balance to $74,151,000 on May 31, last. It is considerably more than that now, and is quite ample to meet the legitimate needs of the Government until long after the next session of Congress begins, even at the present rate of extravagance. But the Government has $75,000,000 of this general fund on deposit in national banks at call. If there were any need of additional revenue, that money could be used to much greater advantage than to tax the already overburdened taxpayers. Business has been greatly depressed under the effect of the Democratic tariff law and other legislation, while taxes have been enormously increased. Why add to them at such a time? The answer is that the Underwood tariff law has been a disastrous failure and the Democratic Congress a most extravagant one. The administration foresees the need of additional revenues while that law remains on the statute books. They can not repeal it without admitting the terrible mistake they made in its passage. The law authorizes the President to borrow money on certificates of indebtedness, so far as may be needed, up to $100,000,000. It has never been the policy of the Government to raise by way of taxation all funds necessary in such a case as that now presented. It would be much better to use that $75,000,000 deposited in the banks as it might become necessary, as it would almost immediately return to circulation, than to impose additional taxes. It would be better to issue temporary certificates of indebtedness than to impose taxes with the present condition of the country and with the enormous increase in taxation already imposed upon the people. The administration fears naturally that money could not be borrowed at a creditable rate of interest, as was shown under the Cleveland administration. Hence they make a pretext of the war in Europe to impose this further great burden of taxation.

Business was much better in September than in August owing to the increase in exports as the result of the European war. The revenues had been decreasing under the Underwood tariff law for months before the war in Europe was thought of. In July there was a decrease in the revenue of $4,818,189, as compared with the corresponding month of last year under the protective tariff law. In February there was a decrease of nearly $10,000,000. There was no talk at that time about a war-revenue measure and no war was even foreshadowed. But in August the total loss of revenue was $11,503,689. Deducting from that the loss in July the utmost that could be attributed to the war in Europe was $6,700,000, though in fact not all of that loss was caused by the European disturbance. The difference between the loss in February and the loss in August was only about $1,500,000, and that is the pretense for bringing in this bill to impose an additional taxation of over $100,000,000. There is no reasonable excuse for this measure. The President insists that the Government deposits in banks must not be used. But even if this $75,000,000 were left in the banks, there is no need of taxation when money can be borrowed as provided for by law. Before the next session of Congress there will be no need of any more money than is now in the possession of the Treasury and what will be derived in the ordinary manner. The whole trouble is the extravagance of the party in power and the wretched effect of its

It is well known that appropriations already made by this Congress exceed those of the last Republican Congress by nearly $100,000,000. Appropriations for pensions decreased $11,150,000 from last year because of the death of old veterans, and the expenditures for the Panama Canal were very much less because of its practical completion. The sale of two war vessels put $12,500,000 in the Treasury, and over $3,000,000 more were credited from the Postal Service this year that really belonged in the receipts of last year. And yet, notwithstanding these "windfalls" and the imposition of the income tax, the condition of the country is such, according to the President, that it was deemed necessary to impose over $100,000,000 more in taxes. The Senator from Washington illustrated a type of these lavish appropriations when he called attention the other day to the request of the Department of Commerce for an appropriation of $30,000 to protect life and property in Alaskan waters where the channels need special care. That small appropriation was refused, but $400,000 was appropriated to secure additional land for the public-building site in Richmond, Va. In the latter case it is a matter of local pride, while in the former case it meant the possible saving of life and property through the improvement of channels by a small appropriation not one-thirteenth as great as that made for additional land in Richmond, which could be obtained at some future time as well as now.

The administration asks us to appropriate $25,000,000 to pay to Columbia as a gift without our receiving any return. Colombia sought to make us pay an unjust sum for the privilege of digging the Panama Canal, and her blackmailing attempt, as Mr. Roosevelt calls it, led to the revolution in Panama, which resulted in our building the canal under much more favorable circumstances. As the canal is open to all the world on the same condition as to the people of the United States, the Democratic Party having shamefully violated their platform—which approved of the law exempting our coastwise vessels from the payment of tolls—by repealing that act, the United States now has no special privilege in the canal, which has cost us in the neighborhood of $400,000,000. This administration has granted to Colombia, in a treaty which we are asked to ratify, the freedom of the canal for its vessels, while our own must pay tolls. This has been done, notwithstanding the pretext that such a grant was in violation of our treaty with Great Britain, under which plea the law was repealed that granted freedom of tolls to American coastwise vessels. How can we give to Colombia what we have no right under the administration plea to take for ourselves? But not only has the administration agreed to such freedom from tolls for Colombia, but it proposes to make a gift to that country of $25,000,000, which amount is to be raised by this iniquitous so-called war-revenue measure. Then the Chief Executive has recommended the spending of $30,000,000 to permit the Government to buy ships to carry on trade with South America, although ships now operating between the United States and ports of South American countries are unable a good part of the time to secure more than half a cargo. The river and harbor bill need not have been passed at this session of Congress, as there was no pressing demand for it. There was a balance of an appropriation for such improvements sufficient to carry on the work until the next session of Congress. Those are some of the kind of appropriations for which this additional tax burden of over $100,000,000 is asked.

The exports for 10 months under the new tariff, ending with July this year, which was before the war in Europe really began, were $158,526,289 less than for the corresponding months last year under the Republican tariff law. But the imports for the same time were $102,323,309 greater. The loss in that time to the people of the United States aggregated $260,849,598 on the foreign trade alone, to say nothing of the tremendous loss at home caused by the great army of idle workmen and by closed mills and factories, with universal business depression and with a balance of trade against us so that gold exports increased 140 per cent in six months. Commercial failures were $85,000,000 greater in six months under this new tariff than they were in the corresponding time last year under the Republican tariff law, an increase of 71 per cent. Banking failures increased 60 per cent, railroad earnings decreased 8 per cent in five months, and idle cars increased 212 per cent. That is the condition of things which calls for additional taxation, for which the war in Europe is made a pretext. This country has to pay to Europe about $500,000,000 annually in interest on bonds, dividends on stock, and so forth. We have been able to meet that situation by the large balance of trade in our favor, which amounted to $656,897,103 for the months of October, 1912, to and including August, 1913, under the protective tariff law. In the corresponding months under the Democratic tariff law there was a balance of trade in our favor of only $326,391,262, showing a loss of trade under the Democratic tariff to the extent of $330,505,841 in 11 months. That tremendous loss was the result of the Democratic tariff legislation. How are we to meet this demand on us from Europe with such an adverse change in the trade situation? The increase in taxation as provided for by the pending measure and the income tax are partial results of the shameful legislation that has brought about that unfortunate condition of affairs.

All Democrats were loud in their demand for publicity in the public business before control of the Government was secured by them. Now secret methods are the rule. Notwithstanding the denunciation of the Republican House because of its rules as to legislation, the record of this Congress has been more czarlike than anything before in the history of this country. Secret methods of levying taxation are illustrated in the preparation of the pending measure. It was prepared by the Democratic members of the committee of the House without allowing their Republican associates to know anything whatever about it. It was put through that branch of Congress under a gag rule that did not permit of a single amendment. Then it was brought here, and the Democratic members of the Committee on Finance took possession of it, gave secret hearings in some cases, and refused any information to their Republican associates as to what was being done. Could there be anything more different from what the Democrats demanded in the way of publicity than that followed in the preparation of this bill? Like the tariff bill, it is largely a sectional measure. The revenue derived from this bill, as in the case of the income tax, will come largely from the Northern States.

The tax of 20 cents on sweet wines would equal the price of such wines in California, and wines are not used exclusively for drinking purposes. Beer is taxed additionally, but distilled spirits, a large product of the State of Kentucky, is excluded from taxation. It is true that a paltry tax of 5 cents per gallon on rectified whisky was imposed by a Senate amendment. Whisky was protected to a very large extent by the Underwood tariff law, the excise tax in this country being very much less than the duty imposed on foreign whisky. And now whisky virtually escapes from this so-called revenue bill. Why this great favor to the Kentucky product? Probably our energetic free-trade representatives from the State of Kentucky can explain this tender solicitation and protection of their product against this so-called war tax in time of peace, though they are not likely to undertake the task. It might be interesting to inquire why a tax upon rectified spirits and none on distilled spirits was imposed by this Democratic measure. I was suspicious that the same old system of sectional taxation had been agreed to when the smiling countenance of the senior Senator from Kentucky emerged from the Democratic caucus and announced that the opponents of the bill should make no further complaint, as whisky would be taxed and carry a large part of the burden of this bill. In looking at the bill as reported my attention was called to the fact that the tax was upon rectified spirits and none on distilled spirits. I turned to the Government reports to see the quantity of each produced in the United States and where produced. I found there was produced in the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, 185,353,383 gallons of distilled spirits and 108,678,542 gallons of rectified spirits. Strange as it may seem, Kentucky produced 43,308,931 gallons of distilled spirits, or 24 per cent of the production of the United States, and produced but 7,586,458 gallons of rectified spirits, or 7 per cent of the United States production. With a tax of 5 cents per gallon on distilled spirits Kentucky would be compelled to pay $2,165,446.55, while with the tax of 5 cents per gallon imposed by this bill on rectified spirits Kentucky will pay but $379,322.80 out of a total tax to be collected of $5,433,927.10, based on the production for the fiscal year 1913. New York, Pennsylvania, Illinois, and Ohio are the great producers of rectified spirits. Each of these States produce more than Kentucky. No wonder the senior Senator from Kentucky smiled. I might also add that Mississippi produced none for the year 1913.

I received a letter from the Monsanto Chemical Works, of St. Louis, referring to the subject of chloral, for which product they requested a rate of duty at the time the Underwood law was under consideration that would enable them to remain in business as a manufacturer of that product. But such a rate was refused, and as a result they were driven out of that business; and because of the war in Germany the United States now finds it imposible to import chloral, though it is one of the medical products bought for use in the Army. When the importers had driven the St. Louis house out of business, so far as this product was concerned, they put up the price so that the wholesale cost was not less than before competition was destroyed. That illustrates the result with a number of other chemicals, to which I called attention at the time the tariff bill was under consideration. Dyes and other products used by our manufacturers are now cut off because of the war, although the Democrats either abolished the duties or reduced them below the protective point in this country, thus making us wholly dependent upon European countries for these important and necesssary products. Coal tar and benzol derived from it are the raw materials for dyes, and we have plenty of that material in this country; but the German Government has in every way helped the manufacturers in that country to build up an enormous trade, even supplying them with coal at what might be called gift prices. Wages are four times as much in this country as in Germany, and the cost of capital is more, while the German patent laws favor the home producer, which is not the case in this country.

The tax on precious stones was doubled by the Underwood law on the pretense that it would increase the revenue. But in nine months the revenue from that source decreased $373,695, although the duty had been doubled. I told the Senate at the time the Underwood bill was under discussion that this very thing would happen, and explained that precious stones can be easily smuggled, and doubling the duty encouraged such violation of the law.

A Washington dispatch to the New York Sun on June 15 predicted that the administration would have to authorize a bond issue or ask for tariff revision to raise the necessary revenue to meet the extravagant expenditures of the Government. That statement was based on facts, and has been repeatedly made in Congress. This revenue measure is an outcome of the situation as it existed then, long before the war in Europe began. We have not by any means yet felt the full effects of the shameful Underwood tariff law, nor will we until after the war is over and the warring countries get to producing goods for export. Over three months of the last fiscal year had the benefit of the Republican tariff law, and the duty on wool and woolen goods was maintained for some two months longer. The duty on sugar was not reduced until March, and that duty will not be removed altogether until 1916. The full sugar duty was in effect for eight months of the last fiscal year. When the loss of revenue from sugar takes full effect it can easily be seen what will be the result; in fact, there is even a probability now of another alleged emergency revenue measure at no distant date. The Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD], an old and experienced Democratic Member of Congress, declared not long ago that "no man can tell how long it will be before there will be another emergency that will require an additional levy." The "emergency" in that case simply means the failure of the existing tariff law to produce sufficient funds in addition to those derived from other sources to meet the appropriations made by Congress, and this further "emergency" will require an additional sum to this $100,000,000 and more than provided for by the existing bill. The Government is the only one not cutting expenses at the present time. Congress has been piling up expenditures to an hitherto unknown amount. The securities of the insurance companies and savings banks shrunk in value to the extent of $500,000,000 in 18 months, and for that shrinkage Congress and the Democratic Party are responsible.

The effect of the Democratic tariff was not materially felt until April, 1914, as orders could not be placed by American importers and goods made and shipped by the foreign manufacturers much before that date.

I now call attention to the total loss to our commerce by the increased importations and decreased exportations for the months of April, May, June, and July, 1914, the four months preceding the war, as compared with the same months of the year 1913:

Loss for April, $63,890,849; loss for May, $63,562,901; loss for June, $32,812,561; loss for July, $27,467,352; or a total loss for the four months of $187,733,633.

What a wonderful difference it would have made to American workmen and to American business if this vast amount of merchandise had been made by the unemployed of our country.

Ninety per cent of the average wholesale cost of manufactured goods, according to the late Abram S. Hewitt, an eminent Democrat and manufacturer, is the labor expended in their production in one form or another. Hence when the goods are made in this country that money goes to workmen and others here. The raw material is valueless until labor makes it useful. For instance, if it is ore, it has to be dug from the ground and transported before it becomes of any use, so that practically 90 per cent of the cost of the article is paid to labor in one form or another. When we import goods we pay that money, or in fact the whole cost of the goods, to the foreign seller and to the transporting company, while when the goods are produced at home their whole cost is retained in this country. Hence the effect of the tariff law in increasing imports and decreasing exports means loss to the American people, distributed among all classes, though the workmen suffer the most. If the ratio of loss for the above four months were to continue for a year, it would mean a loss of $563,200,989. But the army of idle workmen, thrown out of employment because of the increased imports and decreased exports, means a vast loss to merchants, manufacturers, and the people in general. The condition of the country during this whole year is ample testimony to that unfortunate situation caused by the change in the tariff.

Extravagance in the appropriations is another unfortunate feature of the Democratic control of the Government. Last year there was an increase over the aggregate of the appropriations made by the Republicans, and this year there is a large increase over last year's appropriations. In this connection Mr. President, I ask permission to print in the RECORD a comparison of appropriations for the fiscal years 1913 and 1915, showing an increase for the year 1915, under Democratic control, of $90,006,066.35, and the end is not yet.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BRYAN in the chair). Without objection permission to do so is granted.

Mr. WEST. Mr. President, I will ask the Senator from Utah does that statement include the $35,000,000 which was appropriated for the Alaskan Railroad?

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that that is not included in the amount given. I can call the Senator's attention to some of the increases if he so desires; but if he will take the time to read the RECORD, he will see just what they are.

Mr. WEST. Mr. President, I will look over the statement in the RECORD.

Mr. SMOOT. Therefore I will not take the time of the Senate to read the figures at this time.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. JONES. I simply wish to suggest to the Senator from Utah that I suppose his statement covers the million dollars which we appropriated for the Alaskan Railroad?

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator refers to the original appropriation?

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. SMOOT. But the Senator from Georgia asked me whether the statement included the $35,000,000 appropriated for the Alaskan Railroad.

Mr. JONES. I thought I would call attention to the fact that it did include the million dollars first appropriated for the Alaskan Railroad.

Mr. SMOOT. I thank the Senator from Washington for calling my attention to that.

The country ought to know that the increase in appropriations of nearly $100,000,000 would have been enormously increased if it had not been for the determined opposition of the Republican minority. This stupendous amount has been appropriated notwithstanding the Republicans of the Senate led by that splendid man, worthy citizen, and acknowledged statesman, Senator BURTON, of Ohio, forced a cut in the Democratic "pork barrel" river and harbor bill of over $33,000,000 direct appropriation and prevented the Government from being saddled with a future obligation of $40,000,000 more, and that the appropriation for the Panama Canal, which is nearly completed, was about $15,000,000 less than the appropriation for 1913. There is also a decrease in the appropriation for pensions for the fiscal year of 1914, on account of the large number of deaths of our old soldiers, of about $11,150,000.

In addition to the appropriations already made, there are obligations created by this Congress, either as passed or recommended as administration measures, if reports are true, and for which no appropriation has as yet been made, as follows:

Purchase of ships	$30,000,000
Alaskan Railroad	35,000,000
Good roads	25,000,000
Colombian treaty	25,000,000
Nicaraguan treaty	3,000,000
Total	118,000,000

Those figures will illustrate how the Democrats have carried out their promise of retrenchment and economy and how idle were their charges of "profligate extravagance" against the Republicans. We must not forget that direct taxes to the amount of $71,386,156 were filched from the people during the last fiscal year, consisting of a corporation tax of $43,079,819 and an income tax of $28,306,337, and still the administration is demanding $100,000,000 additional for this fiscal year. The vast decline in railroad revenues and in the income of all great business organizations dealing with the public in general accumulate the proof of the great mistake that was made when the Underwood tariff law was passed.

Chairman FITZGERALD, of the House Committee on Appropriations, declared in that body that—

The Democrats have unnecessarily piled up public expenditure until the Democratic Party is becoming a laughing stock of the country.

Such increase in expenditure and in imports naturally brings about a refutation of many Democratic charges against the Republicans. One of their chief accusations in the campaign of 1912 related to the cost of living, which they promised to reduce materially by the change in the tariff. Everyone knows that the cost of living has increased instead of decreased. According to the New York Times, which is eminent Democratic authority, the cost of 25 food products used by the average family was much higher in July before the European war began than in January. The junior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL], who has long been a Member of Congress, declared in this body on September 14:

All kinds of food products are high, higher than usual. The cost of living in this country has constantly increased. The wages of our people have not increased. Most of our laboring men are obliged to support their families on exactly the same wages as formerly, though the prices of food are higher. They are going to suffer more or less.

They have been and are now suffering, not only because of the increased cost of food paid the dealer, but on account of decreased earnings or none at all. The chairman of the Ways and Means Committee of the House was very emphatic in his promise, when that bill was under consideration, that it would reduce the cost of living, but the Senator from Louisiana, an equally eminent Democrat, shows how false that promise was. It was like the promise of simplicity so often made and so freely discounted. As the junior Senator from Iowa stated in this body not long ago—

You can hardly go along the streets without being run over by a Government automobile in which is riding the wife of a Government officer, or somebody else, at Government expense, to make calls.

That illustrates the promised simplicity. The senior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE], who is one of the most radical free traders of this body, in a speech he delivered in Texas some years ago, criticized the Democratic Party in the following words:

The trouble with the Democratic Party is it is a party of statesmen without statesmanship, patriots without patriotism, heroes without heroism. Their policy begets farmers without farming, laborers without labor, freemen without freedom. * * * The Fifty-second Congress had a Democratic majority of a hundred and forty-eight; and if it redeemed a single pledge, absorbed a single promise, kept a single command, or discharged a single obligation made to the people of the United States, I will quit the stump and retire from the canvass. In the matter of economy that Congress exceeded the Republican $1,000,000,000 Congress by $40,000,000.

The latter part of the quotation in part will apply to the existing Congress, of which the eminent Senator from Oklahoma is a Member. But the excess appropriations made by this Congress over those made by the last Republican Congress are much greater than those mentioned by the Senator from Oklahoma in that speech. The eminent Secretary of State, three times a Democratic candidate for President, declared last year that—

The representative who secures office on a platform pledge and then betrays the people who elected him is a criminal worse than he who embezzles money.

It would be interesting to know what the Secretary would do in the way of punishment to his party, who are now in control of the Government, and who promised to reduce the cost of living, but have increased it, and who promised to extend our foreign trade, increase employment for our workmen, and do many other things which they have absolutely failed to do. They secured office on such a platform and have betrayed the people.

This session of Congress has not yet ended, and if the eminent chairman of the Committee on Rules of the House has his way—and we have just received notice from an eminent Democrat of the Senate to a similar effect—it will not end until provision has been made for the benefit of the cotton growers of the South, so that the Government will guarantee them against loss. He wants the Government to deposit $250,000,000 in National and State banks in the cotton States, to be advanced to the producers of cotton or the owners of land on which the same is produced at a rate of interest not to exceed 3 per cent per annum.

Mr. President, I am in sympathy with the conditions existing in the South, as I am with the conditions existing all over the United States. In my own State our copper industry is languishing. Not half of the usual number of men are employed in that industry in the West, and the operators are trying to divide up the time of employment between the men who have families depending upon them, hoping conditions will right themselves in the very near future. The cotton producers are entitled to sympathy, and so are the farmers of the North and all other producers. Why should we make a discrimination in favor of one section of the country over another? But "the South is in the saddle," according to Mr. C. S. Barrett, of Union City, Ga., president of the National Farmers' Union, who, at a joint conference held at Fort Worth, Tex., on August 31, said:

The United States must buy three or four million bales of cotton at not less than 10 cents a pound from the farmers of the South. Three or four hundred millions of dollars is all that will be required. The South is in the saddle at Washington, and can do whatever it wants to do. The boys at Washington will do whatever you tell them to do if you give them to understand that you mean business.

Some such idea seems to have prevailed in forming the new tariff. Almonds, dates, figs, filbert nuts, garlic, lemons, oranges, pecans, peanut oil, pepper, pineapples, peanuts, rice, and other southern products were carefully protected. But the farm products of the North were put on the free list or duties reduced below the protective point. Hence we have had imports of corn, potatoes, barley, oats, wheat, eggs, dairy products, and so forth, to a great extent, while prices have not been reduced in the least to consumers. We have had an increase in the imports of cattle in 11 months to the extent of $11,968,347; corn, $9,775,179; oats, $7,984,053; meat and dairy products, $30,453,388; vegetables, $4,791,525; wool, unmanufactured, $30,136,171; wool, manufactured, $22,596,828; and wheat, $1,473,040; and I might continue. Nearly all of those products are furnished in great plenty in the United States, but our farmers were deprived of the home markets to a very large extent for the benefit of the foreigners, and certain trusts in this country, without a particle of benefit to American consumers.

Mr. President, I have prepared a table showing the imports entered for consumption in the United States during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914, of the following articles: Cattle, oats, wheat, fresh beef, lumber, sugar, and wool. This table shows the rate of duty under the Underwood-Simmons tariff bill, and also under the Payne-Aldrich bill. It shows the quantity imported; it shows the value; and it shows the duty collected. I have also prepared a column showing the loss to the United States on these imported articles under the rates of the Underwood-Simmons bill applied, instead of the rates of the Payne-Aldrich bill. I want to say that there has been a loss upon this basis to the Government of the United States on cattle of $4,524,566.25; on oats, $1,933,449.70; on wheat, $154,396.52; on fresh beef, $2,579,178.80; on lumber, $1,238,811.11; on sugar, $7,509,226.11; on unmanufactured wool, $26,027,862.91; on manufactures of wool, $12,562,788.24; or on these eight items alone a loss to the United States of $56,530,279.64; and no one dare say that the American consumer has received one cent of benefit.

I ask permission to have this table printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SHEPPARD in the chair). In the absence of objection, permission is granted.

(The table referred to is printed on following page.)

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the American Sheep Breeder, a publication of Chicago, Ill., addressed certain letters to the principal clothing manufacturers of the United States, also to the wholesalers of clothing and to the retailers, asking them if woolen goods—clothing, if you please—had decreased or increased in price since the passage of the Underwood tariff law. I have a copy of those letters in the way of answer, and I want to say to the Senate and to the country that universally they say there has been no reduction. I might refer to the answer made by Hart, Schaffner & Marx, the largest clothing manufacturers in all the world, who state that there has been a slight increase.

Mr. President, with those facts staring us in the face, we must admit we have a fiscal policy now in force in this country that has lost to the American Treasury, upon wool and manufactures of wool alone, $38,500,000, and the American consumer has received no benefit.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. And with no corresponding benefit to anyone.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, 80 per cent of the articles in value put on the free list were agricultural articles. Eight months' increase of imports of manufactured products showed an increase of about 9 per cent, but agricultural products showed an increase of 149 per cent.

Imports entered for consumption in the United States during the year ending June 30, 1914.

The Agricultural Department gave as one reason for the increase in value of meat animals on farms the increased cost of production. It is somewhat amusing for the Secretary of Agriculture to assert that it costs more under the Democratic tariff to produce things on a farm than it did under the Republican tariff, but we will take his word for it. The Bureau of Labor Statistics, in a bulletin issued a considerable time before the war in Europe began, gave prices of 15 common articles of food in 40 important industrial cities, showing that 13 articles had advanced in price and only 2 declined. That is the way the Democratic tariff law reduced the cost of living after they asserted the tariff was the cause of high prices. The Government lost in revenue in eight months of the new tariff $12,414,133 because of putting cattle, beef, veal, prepared meats, sheep, mutton and lamb, and corn and oats on the free list. The Beef Trust and the Corn Products Co. may have benefited by that legislation, but the consumer did not. We know that the Corn Products Co. profited, because its president has stated in a letter over his own signature that the corn imported from Argentina enabled them to buy it much cheaper than they would have had to pay for corn grown in this country. But no one can point to the reduction in the prices of the articles made out of that corn by this well-known trust.

The senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] showed himself a prophet at the very beginning of this administration when he said:

> The Biblical quotation I used a few days ago will become historical: "The wild asses of the desert, thirsty and hungry, have broken into the green corn." That applies all along the line, from top to bottom. The Democrats have been out in the cold so long * * * that they are simply wild.

Mr. President, the party has created many thousands of new places which it controls in nearly all cases, free from civil-service regulations, as well as the old places, and of course that costs money. Col. George Harvey, editor of the North American Review and a distinguished Democrat, who was called to the city recently in order that the President might confer with him, emphasizes the economy of this administration in these words:

> I would direct attention to the fact that only the other day the Secretary of State appeared before the Senate Committee on Appropriations and announced with pardonable pride that, while he had been conducting the affairs of his department with all the fire and dash of an angleworm, he had reduced the estimated expenditures of his department so as to make a net saving of $120 per annum. By a simple method of dropping a clerk, who had been drawing $900 a year, he was enabled to employ a footman, and added somewhat pathetically, "You gentlemen of course know that you can not get along with a driver alone when engaged in the matter of returning cards." The Senators granted the allowance. So, too, finally did the House, though there was objection to the appropriation for "a footman" and also to the appropriation for equipment for drivers, which it was insisted meant livery, and nothing else. Nevertheless, since nobody seemed to know what is considered a suitable costume for a footman, where footmen are unheard of, and the only cards known are euchre decks, the protest passed unheeded, and the appropriation was made with one condition, that "equipment" should not comprise "skin-tight pants," thus completely demolishing the theory of the peacham philosopher that "it is not the coat that makes the man, it's the pants."

Mr. President, much more of a similar nature might be quoted from Mr. Harvey, and the fact that he was invited recently to the White House would seem to imply that the President recognizes the force of what Mr. Harvey has had to say about the administration.

For the first 23 days in September the loss of revenue was only $1,730,446. From July 1 to September 23 there was an increase in revenue over last year, but disbursements were nearly $8,000,000 greater. The trouble with the administration is that they need economy in practice and not in words only. If reliance were made on the issue of bonds to meet any possible need in the way of revenue, the issue would only have to be large enough to meet the absolute necessity, but by this method of additional taxation the money is taken from the people whether or not needed. In other words, the administration has put money in the banks, and will keep it there so that the banks can loan it to the people to pay their taxes with.

This demand for taxation is on a psychological basis; in other words, it is on an imaginary basis; but the money is to be used for a definite purpose, and that is to make up the deficit caused by the disastrous legislation put through by the party in power.

If the Republican Party regains control of Congress, or of either branch of it, we will stop this useless extravagance and this dangerous legislation threatening business men with its disastrous effect. There will be no need of increased taxation with Republican control in either branch of Congress, and when the Republicans again come in control of the entire Government there will be a resumption of the prosperous times that prevailed when we were in control before and a decrease in taxation. There will be work for all. We will stop this increase in the importation of articles that can better be made in this country. The mills will start up, labor will be employed, confidence will be restored, and this unceasing assault on business, which has been carried on for months in Congress, will come to an end. Idle workmen will not ask for bread and in answer be given greater burdens to bear in the way of taxation.

There would be no trouble with business to-day excepting for the Democratic assaults on it in various directions. We could establish the industries, such as the manufacture of dyes and dyestuffs and various other things which we now rely on Europe for, if we only gave such protection as was given in Europe in the past.

You now propose by this bill to tax conveyances, contracts, leases, etc., most of which taxes will fall on the comparatively poor. You tax the merchandise broker under this bill four times, as follows:

First. Tax of $20 for doing business.

Second. Ten-cent stamps on each and every contract, which is, in a great number of cases, for very small quantities, as the article dealt in is frequently purchased by the jobber every day on which the commission is very slight, amounting frequently to less than $1.

Third. A tax on telegrams.

Fourth. A tax on telephone messages. There are other provisions in this bill just as absurd as the latter, to which I shall call attention when we reach the bill for consideration by paragraphs. There will be more of this taxation if the Democratic Party remains in control of the Government. The income-tax receipts were only about one-half the sum that was estimated, and those receipts were on the business of 1913. When the tax comes to be assessed on the business of this year it will be a very different story, and that is one reason why the administration wants this $100,000,000 and more of taxation.

Mr. President, we have imported more from Canada and sold her much less under the existing law than was the case under the protective tariff. In imposing new rates to raise war revenue—and Canada is actually engaged in the war—she has imposed rates that will still further hurt many of our products. Turkey has repudiated her treaties and is increasing her tariff rates, which will affect our trade with that country to some extent. We all know how Japan has taken away our cotton trade in Manchuria and excluded many of our products from Japan by increased tariff rates. She is also becoming a great competitor with us, even in our home markets, in many lines of trade. China wants to increase her tariff rates. The tendency the world over is to increase tariff rates on products that can be made at home, instead of decreasing them. It is only the Democratic Party, with its Bourbon teachings and traditions, that kills home industries by opening the markets of the country to foreign products made with cheap labor and under conditions which the workmen of our country can not compete with.

There is no end to the wild policies which the Democratic Party has put forth since it came into power. It made a great outcry against the rules of the House when the Republicans were in control. But we never had such a dominion of gag rule as we have had under Democratic control. All important legislation has been brought out of secret caucus and put through the House under gag rule that would not even, as in the case of this so-called war emergency revenue measure, permit of a single amendment. The promotion of American interests by the Panama Canal, so far as our merchant marine is concerned, has been wantonly destroyed without a shadow of sound reason.

The importance of rural credits for the benefit of the agricultural interests of the country was another subject the Democrats advocated, and the President only last December spoke of such legislation as an "urgent necessity." The subject was considered and a bill reported, but no action taken. Good roads was another one of their platform promises, and after a continuous session of 18 months nothing has been done to carry out that promise. The workmen generally demanded improved immigration laws to keep out undesirable aliens; but the bill has been shelved in this body, although the workmen's organization asserts that 73 Senators have written favorable letters in regard to such legislation.

There has been no legislation in regard to the transportation of convict-made goods. Nothing has been done in the way of a compensation act for workmen, though such legislation was promised.

Contrast that record with the legislation of the Republicans. We gave the Interstate Commerce Commission authority to fix rates on railroads in the interest of the public. We passed the postal savings bank law, one providing for the parcel post. We initiated legislation that enabled the income tax to be imposed, though we intended such a law only for use under extraordinary circumstances and for a limited time only. We did not anticipate relieving foreigners of taxation, as the Democrats have done, and then imposing the burden of an income tax upon our own people. The Department of Labor was created under a Republican administration, and also the Bureau of Mines and the Children's Bureau, while the white-slave act, another Republican measure, has proved of great benefit. A workmen's compensation law was defeated by a Democratic filibuster, and they have prevented any such legislation since they came into control of the Government. That is the record, and I have mentioned only a few of the important measures that the Republican Party can well be proud of.

The Democrats promised a wise, systematic, and comprehensive system of river and harbor improvements. Beyond a vast increase in appropriations for that purpose and a more reckless method of making them the party has done nothing. Like so many other of its promises, they have been repudiated. They promised to increase the merchant marine. One step they took in that direction was to repeal the law that would allow our coastwise merchant vessels the free use of the Panama Canal. They have put our ships at a disadvantage with those of foreign nations, which have their tolls paid by their respective Governments or which receive large subsidies. The Democrats promised to uphold civil-service reform and strengthen the laws in that respect. They have taken the opposite course whenever they have had opportunity. They promised to decrease the number of officeholders, while they have increased it many thousands. Deputy marshals, income-tax collectors, commercial attachés, and many others are now entirely outside of the civil service regulations, and a great effort has been made to exempt all post-office employees and utterly demoralize that service by returning it to the spoils system. There is scarcely a department that has not made inroads in the way of demanding more money and more places. The Democrats promised to reduce the number of places in the Treasury Department, whereas they have increased them to the extent of 938, whose salaries will cost the Government over $1,750,000.

Five new offices, with salaries of $12,000 each, were created by the banking law, and at the same time the salary of the Comptroller of the Currency was increased from $5,000 to $12,000. Five commissioners at $10,000 each and a secretary at $5,000 were created by the Trade Commission act. A new board of appeals, consisting of three members, with a salary of $4,000 each, has been created in the office of the Secretary of the Interior. Our diplomatic representatives to Argentina, Chile, and Spain have had their salaries raised from $12,000 to $17,500 each per annum. The assistant to the Attorney General received an increase of salary from $7,000 to $9,000. The salaries of six Assistant Attorneys General in the Department of Justice are raised from $5,000 to $7,500. The private secretary to the Secretary of the Treasury received an increase of salary from $2,500 to $3,000, and you can depend upon it that the private secretaries of the other nine Cabinet officers will be increased.

The sum of $100,000 was appropriated for commercial attachés to be appointed by the Secretary of Commerce, and a clerk to each attaché is allowed. The mission to Paraguay and Uruguay is divided, and a new minister authorized with a salary of $10,000. Five special examiners, at $1,300 each, who are not under the civil service, but are political appointments, are provided for. Mr. President, I could continue along this same line for hours, but why continue; the aggregate amount of appropriations tell the story.

But the Government clerks, who have not had their pay increased in half a century, have in many cases been demoted or dismissed altogether to enable partisans to receive larger salaries without regard to their merits.

A law was passed in this Congress to permit foreign vessels to be registered as American ships, and the provision was made that, if necessary, the President might suspend the law requiring the watch officers to be American citizens. He did not wait for any necessity to act, but promptly suspended the law for seven years, although there are said to be hundreds of Americans qualified to act, who are now without employment. Such a suspension of the law requiring American officers for so long a period is without a shadow of excuse.

Mr. JONES. If the Senator will allow me, I will state in this connection that it was known to the department before the suspension was made that some five or six hundred American officers on the Pacific coast were available for this service.

Mr. SMOOT. I thank the Senator. It is simply a part of the policy of the Democratic Party to compel Americans to accept the low wages, or salaries, paid to Asiatic and European workmen and officers. If American workmen want that policy continued, they will vote to keep the Democratic Party in power.

It is a little singular that the Democrats should have brought in this bill enormously to increase taxation, when there is no war in which the United States is engaged, nor any likelihood of this country becoming involved in such an unfortunate situation. But when we did have a war, in 1898, and a necessary bill was brought in to increase the revenues, the Democratic Party fought it with all the power at its command. The chairman of the Ways and Means Committee of the House, who was chiefly instrumental in drawing up this bill for the consideration of that body, declared that he had copied after the Republican bill of 1898. But in that year he attacked the bill viciously, and declared that it did not allow the wealth of the Nation its share of the taxes, though he now admits that he copied that same act. He complained of the increased tax on beer, and yet this bill adds 75 per cent. He complained that the Republican bill increased the taxes on tobacco, and yet that is one of the things they have done in this bill, and he said:

This tax will fall almost entirely on the hard-working and industrious artisans, merchants, mechanics, farmers, and professional men of the country, but not on idle wealth.

It would be interesting to know what excuse he could make now for copying that act, which he so denounced at that time. But that is the way of the Democratic Party. It has no regard for its platform, and no thought of its record on public questions in the past. It is a party of contradictions and of reckless blunders, costly to the country, and this measure is one of the worst of its many blunders committed at this session of Congress.

ALASKA COAL LANDS.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, the Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH], one of the conferees on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses upon the bill (H. R. 14233) to provide for the leasing of coal lands in the Territory of Alaska, and for other purposes, has left the city to return no more during this session, I understand. I ask that he be relieved from further duty upon the conference committee in charge of that bill, and that the Senator from Kansas [Mr. THOMPSON] be appointed a conferee in his place.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CAMDEN in the chair). Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Montana?

Mr. SMOOT. My attention was diverted and I did not hear the request of the Senator from Montana. Will he repeat it?

Mr. MYERS. The Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH], one of the conferees on the part of the Senate on the Alaska coal-land leasing bill, having left the city, as I understand, to return no more this session, I asked that he be relieved from further service. The next Senator in line for service on the conference committee would be the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS]. I spoke to him about it, and he told me that he is too busy with other matters to serve. The next is the Senator from Kansas [Mr. THOMPSON], and I ask that he be appointed in lieu of the Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

EMERGENCY REVENUE LEGISLATION.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 18891) to increase the internal revenue, and for other purposes.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Johnson	Oliver	Thomas
Bankhead	Jones	Overman	Thornton
Camden	Kern	Page	Townsend
Chilton	Lane	Perkins	Warren
Clark, Wyo.	Lea, Tenn.	Poindexter	Weeks
Colt	Lee, Md.	Shafroth	West
Culberson	Lewis	Sheppard	White
Gronna	McCumber	Simmons	Williams
Hitchcock	McLean	Smith, Ga.
Hollis	Myers	Smoot
James	Norris	Swanson

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WEST in the chair). Forty-one Senators have answered to their names. There is not a quorum present. The Secretary will call the roll of absentees.

The Secretary called the names of absent Senators, and Mr. FLETCHER, Mr. POMERENE, Mr. REED, Mr. SHIVELY, Mr. THOMPSON, and Mr. TILLMAN answered to their names when called.

Mr. BRISTOW, Mr. BURTON, and Mr. STONE entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President. I gave notice this morning that at the conclusion of the speech of the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] I should make a request for unanimous consent to vote upon this bill on Thursday next. I now think it would be better to postpone making that request, with a view to seeing whether or not we can not come to some agreement. I think to make the request now would result merely in a waste of time, and I shall not, therefore, carry out the purpose I then expressed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the bill for the purpose of amendment.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, I desire, first, to make some general remarks on this bill, and then to take up some specific items before the bill is read.

I am firmly of the opinion that what is needed at this time is not more taxes but more economy. If there was any one thing which inspired confidence among the people in the Democratic Party it was the promise that they would establish greater economy in our national affairs. It was proclaimed from the stump that the Republican administration had been prodigal in expenditures; and in repeated platforms of the Democratic Party they declared that if they were intrusted with power they would inaugurate an era of frugality. But what do we witness?

The first session of the present Congress, in which appropriations were made, witnessed a larger total than at any time in the history of our Government, unless perhaps during the last year of the Civil War, when vast armies were being maintained in the field and conditions were most exceptional. We have here the contrast between promise and performance. It is so easy for a political organization which seeks power to make promises, but so much more difficult to perform them when the people, relying on those promises, have intrusted power to them. Without any spirit of partisanship, I give due credit to that period of economy which prevailed after the election of the Democratic House of Representatives in 1874. In the prior Congresses there had been some tendency toward decreasing expenditures, but under the control and direction of Mr. Randall, in the first year for which that Congress made appropriations, there was a marked decrease in our national disbursements. The total expenditures, exclusive of those required for the Post Office Department, fell to $238,000,000 for the fiscal year 1877, $20,000,000 less than for the preceding year. That, Mr. President, was a record of which to be proud; but what has the present Congress to show in comparison with it? Not only are the appropriations the largest ever made, but they were so before we disposed of the river and harbor bill, that would have carried some $43,000,000 in cash, together with $10,000,000 in authorizations and a committal to nearly $40,000,000 more, if it had been adopted in the form in which it was recommended here in the Senate.

Mr. President, I do not think the people will be unmindful of the contrast between the promises made and the record written by this Democratic Congress.

The one fault I have to find with the specific items of this bill is that there is a maximum of annoyance in comparison with a minimum of revenue. By restoring the duty on sugar, $10,000,000 of revenue additional could have been obtained; and I question whether it would not have been best to impose the taxes upon objects which are already subject to taxation, especially in view of the fact that by the express terms of the bill its operation is to terminate on the 31st day of December, 1915. That is the form in which it is recommended to the Senate, although many will apprehend that when December 31, 1915, shall have arrived the same expanding appropriations which have marked this Congress will be so in evidence that these taxes must be made permanent.

This bill provides for the taxation of so great a variety of articles as to make it exceedingly vexatious. I will read here a few selected telegrams which I have received in regard to this proposed revenue bill:

COLUMBUS, OHIO, October 7, 1914.

Hon. THEODORE E. BURTON,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

The receivers of Central Union Telephone Co., operating 117,000 telephone stations with a system of connecting toll lines in 72 counties of Ohio, protest against proposed tax of 1 cent on each telephone toll message on which the toll charge is 15 cents or over. This is a tax of 7 per cent on a 15-cent message, 5 per cent on a 20-cent message, 4 per cent on a 25-cent message, and so on. Such a tax would place a serious burden on 15 and 20 cent messages, and, if a tax is to be imposed, the minimum toll subject to tax should be not less than 25 cents and the period allowed for payment should not be less than 30 days.

E. A. REED,
General Manager for Receivers.

The bill as amended by the Senate committee gives the additional 30 days' time, so the complaint in the latter portion of the telegram is not now applicable. But, Mr. President, this tax of 7 per cent on the cheaper messages, which should certainly receive as careful consideration by the Senate as any, is a most burdensome imposition. It may be thought that it will fall on the telephone companies—this telephone company, by the way, is in the hands of a receiver, and does not seem to be making any very great profit—but it is sure to be reflected either in diminished service or in some other form, so that it will operate to the disadvantage of the public.

I insist that on the cheaper messages, at least, the tax is too burdensome. Why should this Government, which has so many sources for obtaining revenue, go into the business of levying a cent on every telephone message? It seems to me absurd.

The mere matter of bookkeeping imposes a burden on the managers of the telephone companies, and indirectly it is a burden on the revenue officers altogether out of keeping with the amount to be derived from the tax.

The next telegram which I desire to read is one which I conjecture has been received by other Members of the Senate, and is from the president of the Chicago Board of Trade:

CHICAGO, ILL., October 8, 1914.

Hon. THEODORE E. BURTON,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

We would respectfully call your attention to a fact which we think is not understood by our Senators and Representatives. This is that the effect of that part of the revenue bill on page 22, lines 18 to 23, will be to impose a tax on every bale of cotton and on every bushel of grain shipped from any country point to be sold in the principal markets of the country, on any chamber of commerce, board of trade, or similar place. It is a direct tax on sales of both cotton and grain, whether for domestic consumption or export. We believe that all the State grain dealers' associations and producers who are aware of this section are in favor of its elimination. We do not believe the Congress desires to impose a tax on cotton and foodstuffs.

C. H. CANBY,
President of Board of Trade of the City of Chicago.

I have another telegram on this same subject from a commission firm in the city of Cincinnati, as follows:

CINCINNATI, OHIO, October 9, 1914.

Senator T. E. BURTON,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Would appreciate the elimination of that section of the revenue bill, page 22, lines 18 to 23, taxing every bushel of grain shipped to any of the leading terminal markets for sale on grain exchanges of this country, as do not believe the people of this country favor a tax on foodstuffs and cotton.

ROBERTS, HALL & CRISS.

Again, I have a telegram from the Ohio Shippers' Association, dated Columbus, Ohio, October 9:

COLUMBUS, OHIO, October 9, 1914.

Hon. THEODORE BURTON,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Supplementing our former mail and telegraphic communications to you we again protest on behalf of our membership against the provisions of H. R. 18891, imposing a stamp tax on bills of lading or other evidence of receipt and forwarding of shipments of all classes; also the proposed tax on sales of grain, either for present or future delivery, which would impose an additional, unjust, and unreasonable burden on the producer and consumer of the chief necessity of life.

OHIO GRAIN DEALERS' ASSOCIATION,
OHIO SHIPPERS' ASSOCIATION,
J. W. MCCORD, Secretary.

I have a letter from a firm in Toledo which goes more fully into detail. It is as follows:

TOLEDO, OHIO, October 8, 1914.

Hon. Senator T. E. BURTON,
Senate Chamber, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: We notice the Senate bill for tax on all sales of grain on exchanges of 1 per cent. This tax means 60 cents on 5,000 bushels of wheat, 25 cents on 5,000 bushels of oats at present price, and 35 cents on 5,000 bushels of corn. Taxing a legitimate business out of all precedent—

This letter was written before the bill was in its final shape, and the writer labored under a misapprehension as to some of its provisions—together with the tax on checks, etc., which sometimes amounts to $2 or $3 per day, makes a heavy penalty upon the trade that moves the great business of the country. Supposing, for instance, the grain exchanges had closed, the same as the stock exchanges, what would have happened? There wouldn't have been a grease spot left of any of the banks in the country. You would have had a panic that would have swept everything before it, together with the war conditions. They didn't ask the Government to carry their trades or to issue warehouse receipts, etc., but they pluckily stood and started to move the crop, equal in value to one billion in wheat, one billion or more in corn, and five or six hundred millions in oats. They have met their obligations, and are moving the stuff abroad despite the obstacles they have before them in trying to export, and are relieving the country by furnishing bills of exchange in place of gold. These are facts that can not be disputed and we are willing to pay our share of any reasonable tax, although we think the war tax is unnecessary at the present time, when we are at peace. In addition to this, we are obliged to pay a brokerage tax, which, seemingly, is an oppressive burden upon one single branch of business.

Trusting this tax can be obviated, and that you can see your way clear to work against same, we remain,

Yours, truly, W. H. MOREHOUSE & CO.

Before passing from the matter of the tax on sales of grain, I will say that the amount of revenue that could be realized from it is trivial in comparison with the inconvenience to which the dealers will be subjected and the burden which it imposes upon the farmers of the country, the producers of grain and of cotton. Indeed, I can hardly think of a place where a tax could be imposed which seems more vexatious and irrational than this. I can with perfect consistency criticize any provisions derived from the act of 1898, because I tried at that time to point out that the articles taxed were too varied and too numerous, and that it imposed an immediate burden on too large a number of people.

I have received numerous letters from druggists and others protesting against the tax on proprietary medicines, one of which I quote as follows:

CINCINNATI, OHIO, October 8, 1914.

Senator THEODORE E. BURTON,
The Senate, Washington, D. C.:

The Ohio State Pharmaceutical Association in special convention assembled at Columbus, Ohio, does most strenuously object to proposed taxing of proprietary medicines which in many instances are necessities. Similar tax was placed on proprietary medicines during the Spanish-American War, which resulted in the manufacturers increasing the cost of same to the retail druggists by 6 per cent. This proposed tax would again increase the cost on proprietary medicines and add to the burden already borne by the druggist through the increased cost of all drugs, caused by the war. On account of conditions under which these proprietors are listed there is no chance for the consumers to share this tax.

THEO. D. WETTERSTROME,
Secretary O. S. P. A., 2,000 Members.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. BURTON. I do.

Mr. BRISTOW. I should like to inquire of the Senator if he knows why this bill has been styled the "war-revenue bill"?

Mr. BURTON. Certainly, the occasion for it arose not so much from the war as from the swollen appropriations of the Democratic Congress and the disappointing results of the Underwood tariff. I suppose the term is given it because it is contemporaneous with the war in Europe and perhaps is by way of imitation of the act of 1898.

Mr. BRISTOW. But in 1898 we were engaged in a war that was calling upon us for increased expenditures for war purposes.

Mr. BURTON. Certainly.

Mr. BRISTOW. And we then passed a war-tax bill. Now, however, we are at peace with all the world, and, in fact, we are profiting to a certain extent by the war in some lines.

Mr BURTON. In some lines of production.

Mr. BRISTOW. Because Europe is engaged in a war, why should we, in passing a revenue tax to make up a deficit in our Treasury caused by things entirely foreign to the war, style it a war tax?

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, I certainly can see no justification for it, and no adequate reason for the imposition of any such tax. Before this war commenced, before the declaration of war, before the ultimatum to Servia, before the assassination of the Austrian crown prince, conditions of depression arose which have caused economy in almost every home. At such a time, instead of breaking records on appropriations, Congress should recognize the situation and adopt something of the same economy which the circumstances have forced the people to adopt in their homes.

I have here a letter in regard to chewing gum. This article seems to have been a sort of football in the way of taxation, judging from the duty imposed on the raw material in the first place. People have been prone to ridicule it as a form of luxury not altogether to be commended. At the same time a very strong showing is made by the manufacturers. I read this letter:

CHICAGO, October 7, 1914.

Hon. THEODORE E. BURTON,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: The proposed stamp tax of 4 cents per box on chewing gum we believe to be absolutely unfair, unjust, and class legislation. Why single out one confection from all the others, such as candy, chocolates, bonbons, etc., which are our competitors, especially when one of our principal raw materials, chicle, now pays over 66 per cent duty? Said duty was increased, as you know, 100 per cent in the Underwood tariff bill passed last fall. We will also have to pay our portion of the other taxes assessed.

We respectfully submit this protest.

Very truly, yours,

WM. WRIGLEY, JR., CO.,
A. G. COX, Vice President.

In view of the fact that they pay a 66 per cent duty on their raw material—I do not at this minute recall whether it is an ad valorem or a specific duty, but I take it this figure is correctly given—it is not fair to impose on them this discriminatory tax when similar articles are allowed to go free.

If there were time, I should discuss the tendency of all taxation to diffuse itself. It was taken as an axiom by Adam Smith and many of the older economists, including the President of the French Republic, M. Thiers, that all taxation, in its ultimate burden, rested upon consumption or upon expenditure. The later theories on that subject do not, however, sustain this theory as an absolute rule. It was maintained, for instance, that if a tax was placed upon houses, and the rental previously was a certain figure—say, $20 per apartment or house per month—and a tax of $2 per month was imposed upon it, the owner immediately raised the rental to $22, and the one who incurred the expenditure for rent, the occupant of the house, must pay that tax. It was said that otherwise building enterprise would cease or improvements would be allowed to run down, so that the value of the property for renting purposes would be recouped from the tenant; that is, he would have a less valuable house for his $20, or he would pay an extra $2 for the house. With regard to the taxation of mortgages, this same general rule prevails, though it does not apply to all forms of taxation.

I do not desire to go into that question at this time, but I want to call attention to one thing, namely, the tendency of taxation in most forms to diffuse itself. In that, it seems to me, the old economists were right. This, however, is claimed to be merely a temporary tax, and it will be impossible to adjust it in one year so that it will fall fairly on anybody. At least, with this multitude of items here, such, for instances, as taxes on different kinds of insurance policies, there can be no fair, no equitable adjustment of the burdens of a temporary tax of this nature.

My objections, then, go to the necessity for this tax; to the neglect of the proper method to cure the situation, namely, by greater economy; to the varied classes of taxation provided in this bill, making it exceptionally vexatious; and to the onerous provisions which punctuate its pages. I also call attention to the fact that, in view of its temporary nature, a proper and equitable division of its burdens can not be accomplished. I do not argue that it would be better to make it permanent, but I call attention to this feature of the measure.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. BURTON. I do.

Mr. STERLING. I should like to ask the Senator a question. Granting that under a proper fiscal or revenue policy there would have been no need for this legislation, is the Senator clear in his mind that even under the Democratic policy there is a necessity for this so-called war-revenue tax?

Mr. BURTON. I am not sure of that. If there were, I should think it altogether better to impose it on a more limited number of articles. I do not believe in scattering it in this way. It is true that if this bill becomes a law the people will realize that burdens are imposed upon them, and some insist it is best to make taxes so varied that they will bear on the largest possible number, or at least on a very large number.

Mr. STERLING. The Senator, I think, recognizes on what the demand for this legislation is largely predicated, namely, that it would be injurious to business, and perhaps cause embarrassment to the national banks in which $75,000,000 of Government funds are deposited to call in those deposits. Suppose the $75,000,000 thus deposited in Government banks, according to the message of the President, and according to the report of the House committee, were available, would there be any necessity for this tax?

Mr. BURTON. No.

Mr. STERLING. I should like to ask the Senator a further question. Under the Federal reserve bank act and the facilities supposed to be afforded by the provisions of that act in the way of furnishing money for times of stress, for crop-moving periods, and so forth, might not the banks be in part supplied, and they thus be furnished the money that would take the place of the $75,000,000 that would be called in, or that is subject to call now by the Government, and which is in the hands of the banks?

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, it was hoped that before this time the Federal reserve system would be in operation, so as to provide for all the needs of the different parts of the country a different currency. We have resuscitated the Aldrich-Vreeland Act, and a very large amount of currency has been issued upon it. I trust that the withdrawals will be made just as soon as possible.

Of course everyone recognizes what was the origin of this system of depositing in banks. The subtreasury system was established some 70 years ago, and very large amounts of money were lodged in the Federal Treasury or Government depositories, and at times the amount of currency there was so great as to interfere very materially with the ordinary course of business. In view of that the Treasury commenced the system of lending to banks. No one can blame the policy that brought that about; but I regard the fact that we are going to do away with it entirely as one of the greatest benefits received from the establishment of this new system.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WHITE in the chair). Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. BURTON. I do.

Mr. CULBERSON. If I understood the Senator from Ohio correctly, at the outset of his remarks he stated that the mistake here was in levying taxes instead of reducing the expenditures of the Government.

Mr. BURTON. I think so.

Mr. CULBERSON. Does the Senator believe that is practicable now, in view of the passage of the appropriation bills for the next fiscal year?

Mr. BURTON. In answer to that I will say that, for instance, there are appropriations for public buildings. Everyone knows that the Supervising Architect is some years behind in his work, perhaps three or four; and there are, no doubt, other departments of the Government where a certain amount of money could be held back. I would not believe in that as a general policy; but we hope that in a very few months, perhaps within a very few weeks, the $75,000,000 deposited in the banks by the Treasury may be called in and made available for the payment of expenses.

Mr. CULBERSON. I simply wanted the opinion of the Senator on the proposition whether we could reduce expenditures now, rather than raise taxes.

Mr. BURTON. Oh, we can not repeal the appropriation bills; no.

Mr. CULBERSON. The issue, then, was presented to the party in power to levy this tax or not. There was no revenue from which the expenditures could be paid, in view of the appropriation bills.

Mr. BURTON. You are intending this tax, however, not merely for the payment of appropriations already made but for the payments of appropriations hereafter to be made.

Mr. CULBERSON. It is to cover expenditures for the next fiscal year ending in July, 1915.

Mr. BURTON. Not all of it is for that period. Do I understand that the Senator expects that this whole amount will be expended between now and the 30th of June, 1915?

Mr. CULBERSON. Oh, not necessarily.

Mr. BURTON. There is still a chance for economy between now and the 4th of March that would in a great measure obviate the necessity of any tax of this kind, and for any so-called war-revenue bill.

Of course I join with others in my dislike of this method of bringing in a bill here, after consideration by a caucus or conference, or whatever the dominant party may prefer to call it, and when we are led to understand that the bill must be passed in this form, and that whatever protests are uttered against it will be futile.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I should like to ask just one further question of the Senator from Ohio. I note that he read a telegram in regard to a tax on proprietary medicines, and so forth. I note by the report of the committee that the sum of $4,000,000 is expected to be raised from this tax. I think it is stated in one of the telegrams read by the Senator that this tax will fall upon the consumers or users of the medicines. I should like to ask the Senator what, in his opinion, is the class of people that will be most affected by this kind of a tax, as to their financial conditions or circumstances?

Mr. BURTON. They are by no means among those most fortunate in the possession of means. I am inclined to think that in the earlier enforcement of the law, if this tax becomes a settled part of it, the druggists will bear a very large part of this tax.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I suppose we all are anxious to get through with this legislation, as it is supposed to denote the end of the school. I am therefore going to say what I have to say without very much preparation or previous consideration. I would have preferred to speak on so important a subject more in detail and after more thorough investigation, but I am not willing to prolong the agony of the inevitable, for the bill is to pass.

Mr. Gladstone, in one of his great budget speeches, made in 1861, used this language:

> But I think that when in an extended retrospect we take notice of the rate at which we have been advancing for a certain number of years we must see that there has been a tendency to break down all barriers and all limits which restrain the amount of public charge. For my own part, I am deeply convinced that all excess in the public expenditure beyond the legitimate wants of the country is not only a pecuniary waste—for that, although an important, is yet a comparatively trifling matter—but a great political, and, above all, a great moral evil. It is a characteristic, sir, of the mischiefs which arise from financial prodigality that they creep onward with a noiseless and a stealthy step; that they commonly remain unseen and unfelt until they have reached a magnitude absolutely overwhelming; and then at length we see them, such and so great as they now appear to exist in the case of one, at least, among the great European States—I mean the Empire of Austria—so fearful and menacing in their aspect and so large in their dimensions that they seem to threaten the very foundations of national existence. Sir, I do trust that the day has come when a check is beginning among ourselves to be put to the movement in this direction. I think, as far as I have been able to trace the sentiments of the House and the indications of general opinion during the present session, that the tendency to which I have adverted is at least partially on the decline. I trust it will altogether subside and disappear.

The great English statesman did not live to see the realization of his hope as to a decline in public expenditures. On the other hand, he lived to see an accentuation of the extravagant spirit of his age, and if he were alive now he would find his country enmeshed in a system of expenditures which are so stupendous that it becomes a matter of necessity each and every recurring year for the chancellor of the exchequer to find some new thing upon which to levy a new tax. He searches the industrial world like a watchman on his beat, and if he finds any line of life not taxed to the limit he lays on another burden. Even before the present conflict in Europe the English people were weighed down with taxes to meet the expenses of an ever-growing budget. What the cost which will fall upon them now means in suffering and misery one shudders to contemplate.

Samuel J. Tilden is one of the few public men in America who earned the right to speak upon the subject of public economy. He sealed his professions by his acts. No one understands the rule or can unravel the judgment or decrees of the court of fame. If it were otherwise, it would be interesting to know why Samuel J. Tilden has never taken a more prominent place in popular favor. He had many of the qualities, the clear vision, the steady purpose, the unwavering courage, and the undoubted patriotism of that exceptional group of men who organized the Government. He was a statesman in the broad and most wholesome sense of the term. Upon an important occasion he used these words:

Another evil of such a system of excessive taxation is that it creates and nourishes a governmental class, with tendencies to lessen services and to enlarge compensation, to multiply retainers, to invent jobs and foster all forms of expenditures, tendencies unrestrained by the watchful eye and firm hand of personal interest which alone enable private business to be carried on successfully. In other countries such a class has found itself able, sometimes by its own influence and sometimes in alliance with the army, to rule the unorganized masses. In our country it has become a great power, acting on the election by all the methods of organization, of propagating opinion, of influence, and of corruption. The system, like every living thing, struggles to perpetuate its own existence.

Every useful and necessary governmental service at a proper cost is productive labor. Every excess beyond that, so far as it is saved by the official, merely transfers to him what belongs to the people. So far as such excess is consumed, it is a waste of capital as absolute as if wheat of equal value were destroyed by fire or gold were sunk in the ocean.

There is a great deal of wisdom in that paragraph which most statesmen deem it good politics to ignore. But Tilden lived close to his faith, and our people would be happier if we would apply with more sincerity and with greater determination his teachings.

Mr. President, the power to tax is the power to destroy. There is no power of the Government more unrestrained and none so illy and unsystematically, inequitably, and harassingly used. The private citizen is perfectly powerless to defend himself against the taxing power if his representatives betray him. The tax if levied must be paid, and the taxgatherer has neither discretion nor conscience. The tax is either enforced by that subtle method which collects it at the time the citizen pays for his food or his clothes or summarily. It leaves him no appeal from its injustice or its inequitableness. The citizen has no other source of protection than the intelligence, conscience, and wisdom of his representative. There is no function which is performed about which he should proceed with so much caution, deliberation, and consideration as that of levying a tax. And yet I venture to say that there is no business about which we proceed with such reckless disregard of the interests of those whom we represent.

No better or fitter illustration of the power through taxes to destroy or the bungling use of the power could be found than is now before us. At a time when we are boasting that we are at peace with all the world, including both our friends Carranza and Villa, and at a time when the people of our country are, many of them, out of employment, when business is depressed, salaries being reduced, and worry and anxiety are accompanying many a man to his home at night, we are stealing about here and there trying, like the fomenters of the French Revolution, to find something to tax. At a time when the business world and the citizen are curtailing all expenditures possible and looking wearily for relief our Government is reveling in a riot of extravagance. I am reminded of some lines from one of the historians recounting conditions just before the French Revolution:

Taxes ran into everything. The minister who could invent a new tax was lauded as a man of genius. * * * The imposition of the tax was entirely arbitrary. No man could tell when or what his tax would be next. There was no principle in the assessment, except to extort as much as possible. The taxgatherers would be sent into a district to collect one year one million francs and perhaps the next year it would be two millions.

We are not nearing a French Revolution, but we have already approached the time when those who can invent a new tax are looked upon as men of genius. We have approached a time when the imposition of the tax is entirely uncertain and arbitrary, when the citizen does not know anything about what his burden is to be from one month to another. We have reached the time when there is no principle in the assessment, except to extort money and pay for our extravagance. I look upon this whole scheme of this special tax as indefensible and intolerable and as the culmination of a series of months of unwarranted and indefensible extravagance in governmental expenditure, and if the people of this country had any means or method by which to reject it or protect themselves they would employ it at once.

Mr. President, ours is at best an expensive Government. We have our Federal Government and our State governments, with their separate officers and their body of taxes. This double government must necessarily be expensive, but it is worth all we should in sound economy have to pay for it. Then we have our county and city governments, with their separate officers and their body of taxes. But no citizen, nevertheless, would ever have cause to complain if we would practice economy in public affairs to the slightest extent. It is not too much to say that we are a profligate and wasteful Government. It seems to be considered very generally that an appropriation secured is an evidence of statesmanship, while too often it is an evidence of the most shiftless and irresponsible kind of politics. Extravagance is the most persistent enemy of government, and has destroyed the happiness and prosperity of more people than war or pestilence. And, moreover, extravagance is a thing which does not seem to abate with the growth of civilization. It is more vicious in modern times than it was in ancient times. We are in every sense extravagant to a degree that is discouraging. No better proof of that could be had than the present situation.

Mr. President, I claim the right to discuss the subject of extravagance to some extent without being charged with partisanship, although I have no objection to being considered a partisan, for the reason that more than once since I have been here I have undertaken to call attention to it. The first debate in which I took any part of any moment in the Senate Chamber was in regard to this very subject, at a time when the party of which I am a humble member was in power. But there can be no better evidence of the reckless extravagance of this Government than that which we have before us at this time. Not only do present conditions accentuate our tendency to spend without regard to those who pay, but it discloses a most remarkable exhibition of party duplicity.

I am going, in the first place, to call attention to the standard which was given us at the time when we were about to pass into the hands entirely of a new party, or rather a new administration under a party which had long been out of power. It was believed that if there could be a check in this extravagance it would occur immediately afterwards and at least for a time after the new broom was invoked. But how powerful and how strong this tendency is can be shown in no better way than by calling attention to the situation as it was at the time the party went into power, the standard which it set up for itself, and the record which it has made since. I shall take its own standard, its own record, and the facts furnished by its own people in order to present the view of it which I propose to present. The record is its own, unchallenged and unimpeachable.

When they announced their platform at Baltimore our friends used this language:

We denounce the profligate waste of the money wrung from the people by oppressive taxation through the lavish appropriations of recent Republican Congresses, which have kept taxes high and reduced the purchasing power of the people's toil. We demand a return to that simplicity and economy which befits a democratic government and a reduction in the number of useless offices, the salaries of which drain the substance of the people.

If our friends had no more than approached the amount of expenditures which had preceded their inauguration into power, if they had no more than equaled the amount which had been expended during the immediate previous Congresses, what would be their position with reference to this subject of extravagance? It would seem that they would still be clearly within the inhibition and within the anathema which they had assessed upon their predecessor. But what is the situation? It is not that it has been equaled, and thereby is subject to their own charge of extravagance, but it has far exceeded during the last 18 months that of the previous Congresses or the previous months of the previous administration. That which they denounced as shameless waste approaches economy in the light of the record of these past 18 months. With this stern denunciation fresh upon the lips of Democracy we find all about the indisputable evidence of her insincerity and her want of candor.

I call attention, Mr. President, before presenting some figures, to some previous statements in regard to their view of extravagance and their purpose to inaugurate an era of economy such as "befits a democratic government." Mr. FITZGERALD, in his speech of 1910, says:

Controlling both Houses by substantial majorities, the responsibility for the appropriations belongs to the Republicans. Try as they may, they can not be other than wasteful, extravagant, inefficient. * * * There can be no hope for any reductions from the Republican Party. The best interests of the country and the people demand a Democratic House. In no other way can expenditures be brought back to their normal level and taxes levied and collected for the sole purpose of defraying the legitimate expenses of the Government economically administered.

We have, I think, as demonstrated by this condition of affairs, a right to say that this is perhaps the greatest Government in the history of the world, because it has the capacity apparently of running itself and running itself against the mistakes of those who have been selected to administer it. When Mr. FITZGERALD made this statement in the House of Representatives, he made a solemn appeal to the people of this country and, as one of the leaders of his party, a solemn pledge that in case the party was placed in power there would be retrenchment and an economical administration of the Government.

It is not, Mr. President, because of the politics alone which may be said to lie in the charge, but it is a broader and deeper question than that, and that is whether we have arrived at the time when, in spite of pledges and promises, we are utterly unable to check this tendency toward such unwarranted and riotous extravagance.

Is there no confidence to be placed in the men who are selected from time to time and from year to year, and will this extravagance ever cease until such a condition of affairs arrives as that it may be more costly in the manner chosen to get rid of this extravagance than the extravagance itself?

I read, also, from a statement of the premier made at the Minnesota fair in 1908. He said:

The Democratic platform makes Republican extravagance one of the issues of the present campaign. The Republican platform is silent on the subject, and naturally so; to have promised economy would have been a mockery and to have defended the appropriations made by the last Congress would have been impossible.

At that time, Mr. President, the appropriations amounted to five hundred million. Now they amount to almost a billion two hundred million.

Why is it that the Republican Party is so much more extravagant than the Democratic Party in the expenditure of the public money? There are two reasons: First, because the Republican leaders are more intimately associated with the tax eaters than the taxpayers.

I am wondering if that situation has been in any degree reversed. I am reminded of a cartoon which I saw about the time the Democratic Party went into power. It represented a coon leaving the Republican tree and making his way as fast as he could for the Democratic tree. That coon was supposed to be the special interests, or the tax eater. Whether he has solidly and securely locked himself in the branches of that umbrageous tree or not I do not know, but a person could almost convict the party upon the statement of the distinguished leader of the Democratic Party himself. Then he goes on to say:

They hear the hungry clamor of the men who spend money more than they do the protest of the masses who contribute revenue.

I have no quarrel with the distinguished and able leader of his party in the announcement of his principles; I do not even complain of his bitter arraignment, but I leave those who essay the task to reconcile the statement with the actual conditions as they now exist.

I now quote from the able Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON], long a most able advocate of the tenets of his party on this floor:

Mr. President, this record of extravagance under the administration of President Roosevelt is astonishing. It should arrest public attention, whether it does or not, and it should provoke immediate and thorough reformation in our governmental expenditures, for it is a menace to the Treasury.

The Government of the United States is rapidly becoming paternalistic, the people office ridden, and the Nation itself threatened with the blight of militarism.

This is from a speech in the Senate on May 29, 1908. Col. Roosevelt's administration was one which accomplished great things and was calculated to be an extravagant one, but the figures there denounced as indefensible and menacing are millions below those figures which now mark a return "to that simplicity and economy which befit a democratic government."

Now, Mr. President, let us take the language of the same gentleman upon the situation in order that we may be fair upon this proposition and that there may be no misrepresentation and in order that it may not with truth be said that these are but partisan attacks. Mr. FITZGERALD said during this session of Congress:

In a few months I shall be called upon in the discharge of my official duties to review the record that this Democratic House shall have made in its authorization of the expenditures of the public money. Whenever I think of the horrible mess that I shall be called upon to present to the country on behalf of the Democratic Party I am tempted to quit my place.

Fortunately for the country the distinguished leader did not resign, as he is really one of the true friends of economy.

I quote further from the same leader:

I am looking now at Democrats who seem to take amusement in soliciting votes on the floor of the House to overturn the Committee on Appropriations in its effort to carry out the pledges of the Democratic platform. They seem to take it to be a huge joke not to obey their platform, and to make ridiculous the efforts of the members of our party who do try to live up to the promises they made to the people. * * *

We charged the Republicans for 12 years of my service in the House under Republican administration with being grossly extravagant and reckless in the expenditure of the public money. I believed that charge to be true. I believed that my party, when placed in power, would demonstrate that the charges we had made in good faith were true. We are entitled to the help and to the support of the Members on this side of the House in honest efforts to carry out the pledges of the Democratic Party and in our attempts to show that what we charged in order to get into power was true. We have not had that support. Our Democratic colleagues have not given that support to us thus far during this session of Congress. They have unnecessarily piled up the public expenditures until the Democratic Party is becoming the laughing-stock of the country.

Mr. President, in commenting upon this statement of Mr. FITZGERALD, a most distinguished leader of true democracy, who bears the same relation to the present administration, it is generally believed, that Christopher Columbus does to America, said:

Primarily, the blame for wastefulness, so gross and deliberate as to constitute flagrant violation of a positive pledge, must attach to the House of Representatives, which brazenly ignored the repeated admonitions of Chairman FITZGERALD.

* * * * * * *

Democratic Senators have been hardly less heedless, and we believe it to be a fact that the only reduction effected by an executive department was $120, reported to have been saved by the Secretary of State.

Everyone familiar with current literature will recognize that this is from the trenchant and fearless pen of Col. Harvey, editor of the North American Review. I think the charge here made must have been taken as not only true, but kindly and modestly expressed, for the print carries the information that immediately after its appearance Col. Harvey appeared at the White House to discuss "conditions in Europe"—a wise counselor—but many will regret if the consultation did not include some matters which happened before the war and which will be here after the war is closed.

But that was a mistake, Mr. President, about the $120 in the State Department. There was an original saving of $120, but finally, before the bill passed, it was changed, and that reduction was eliminated. So they are entitled to a straight record; there was no change in the program, no ground for such a charge of inconsistency.

Mr. President, these are earnest statements upon the part of those who are in a position to know and who are not prejudiced, I presume, against their party. I am going to support their statements in a few moments by a few facts and figures.

But I want to say this now, that the only thing in the world that the war had to do with this tax is the christening of it. This tax would have been necessary within a very few months at the rate that we were going had Europe been as peaceful as the District of Columbia. It would not have come so soon, but the rate at which we were spending, the recklessness with which we were creating offices and providing salaries, would have brought it on in due time.

Take their own figures, Mr. President. We are seeking here to raise $105,000,000 by taxation. If this $105,000,000 is about $205,000,000 more than the amount which the Republicans expended and if, according to the statement which you have made time and time again, the Republicans were extravagant, will it not be admitted without further argument that the logic of the situation is that this $105,000,000 is due to an extraordinary expenditure of Government funds? If we had reached the limit, as you said, where we were subject to condemnation, and you have exceeded it by $105,000,000, will anyone have the temerity to say to the people of this country that the excess of levy is due to the war in Europe? If you are spending nearly two hundred million more than the amount which those now in power declared to be grossly extravagant, how can you justify this tax? If you had practiced the economy even of your predecessor in power, you would not now be raising this hundred million, and the fact that revenues decreased would not have hurt your Treasury—you would have had sufficient in the Treasury, notwithstanding the falling off of revenues.

But that is not all. The Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD], in discussing the river and harbor bill, said that this was but the beginning and there is more to follow. He said:

I believe it is the duty of the Senate to have some regard for the condition of the Treasury. We are now preparing to go out into the highways and byways and levy additional taxes. We are now engaged in the selection of items upon which we can raise additional revenue to the extent of $100,000,000. No man who does me the honor to listen to me on this occasion can tell how long it will be before there will be another emergency that will require an additional levy.

And that is true. This does not include the $25,000,000 that we are to pay to Colombia. This does not include the $3,000,000 that we are to pay Nicaragua for another right of way for a canal, the purpose of it being, I presume, that, having built one canal and given it to England, we feel now under the necessity of building another canal and giving it to Germany.

This does not include, Mr. President, the contemplated $30,000,000 for ships. This does not include the forty-odd million dollars which, we are told upon the side, it has been scheduled shall be put through at the coming session to cover a rivers and harbors bill. This does not include the deficit which will be made up by an emergency bill after the close of this Congress. I venture to say that we will have another levy, regardless of what goes on in Europe, and I venture to say that when the books shall have been closed out, instead of being $105,000,000 in excess of the Government expenditures of the preceding Congress, this Congress will have incurred liabilities and expended in excess of $250,000,000 over that of the previous Congress.

Yet we say that it is due to the war. The war might have had something to do with the amount which we have collected, but it has had nothing to do with the amount which we have expended or which we should have expended.

The total appropriation up to date, as near as I can secure accurate figures, is not less than $1,117,468,777. This does not include, as I have said, the rivers and harbors bill nor the other expenditure to which I have made reference. No one places the amount at less than $1,089,408,777, which is not less than $60,000,000 at the present time in excess of the last Republican Congress.

But, Mr. President, this extravagance has just begun. We are inaugurating with marvelous speed and remarkable inconsiderateness a system of government which will devolve upon the people of this country a burden of taxation the like of which the people have never for a moment contemplated. We propose now, sir, to have an expert, a special agent, an investigator, to accompany every citizen and to oversee every business and every line of industrial activity. The present thus being presented to the people may be what they want, but I warn them now it will be costly beyond anything they have contemplated. Such a system fattens by what it feeds upon. It creates a governmental class always complaining of too much service and too little pay; it invents jobs and fosters all forms of waste and expenditures. We have to-day in the Federal service near 500,000 employees, and we have laid the basis for 50,000 more at this session.

Let us read a portion of the platform again:

We demand a return to that simplicity and economy which befits a democratic government and a reduction in the number of useless offices, the salaries of which drain the substance of the people.

I would be interested to know, Mr. President, what office has been abolished, what number of salaries have been disposed of, and wherein the principle of economy has been invoked in this system of creating offices and providing salaries which drain the substance of the people.

There have been more offices created and more salaries provided for in the last 18 months than during any three years in the history of this Government; and, in my opinion, we have just started. Let me call attention to some of the facts in regard to that, in the matter of detail.

When our Democratic friends came into power there were 3,183 persons employed in the Treasury Department. Instead of this number being reduced it has been increased by 358 in the city of Washington alone. When they came into power there were in the field force of the Treasury Department 1,407 persons, and under this economy program the number has been increased 678 persons more. In these two instances the economy of our friends will cost the Government $1,750,000.

The new currency law created five new offices, with salaries of $12,000 each, and increased the salary of the Comptroller of the Currency from $5,000, at which sum it had remained for 50 years, to $12,000. The new Trade Commission act creates five commissioners at $10,000 each and a secretary at $5,000, and that is only an intimation of what that will be.

The Interstate Commerce Commission deals with about 2,200 corporations. The cost of running the Interstate Commerce Commission last year was $1,833,269. We have in the United States about 305,000 corporations. Out of this 305,000 about 163,000 will come under the Trade Commission's jurisdiction, if it sees fit to exercise the jurisdiction.

So, Mr. President, if we should provide or make an allowance such as is based upon the expenditure of the Interstate Commerce Commission the operation of the Trade Commission alone would amount to $1,367,000,000 a year. But suppose it only amounts to one-half that, and if it ever amounts to anything at all in the way of effective service it will have to amount to at least one-half of that.

Those things, Mr. President, it may be the people desire and will approve of, but there should be no longer any complaint about extravagance in the way of the operation of the Government, because if the people of the United States want their entire business done at Washington they will have to pay for it. If they want these matters to be overseen and controlled and regulated 1,000 miles or 2,000 miles from their homes they will have to pay for it. But whether it shall prove satisfactory to the people or not, this much is true: The amount of the governmental expenditures heretofore in the operation of the Government at Washington will be comparatively small and modest compared with the amount of expenditure which will be made in all future years if we continue to enlarge upon these bureaus.

Already for this year the actual expense of our departments at this time is $3,000,000 a month in excess of the last year of the Republican administration. That is not by reason of the fact that there has been any defalcation or anything of that kind, but it is because of constantly enlarging and creating offices, providing salaries, and providing for those people who shall do those things that ought to be imposed upon the individual citizen himself to do under the observance of some law which had been passed for his guidance. That is only a beginning of what we may expect in a very short time if these bureaucratic practices continue.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. Just a moment. As I said a moment ago, it may be that we have less to spend; but no one can disclose here, in my judgment, a single fact to show that any of the expenditures made thus far have been by reason of the European conflict.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MCCUMBER in the chair). Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, the Senator from Idaho has just said that we are spending $3,000,000 a month more than in the corresponding period of last year in the departments of the Government. He is unusually modest in that statement, because I have before me a Treasury statement to the effect that the expenditures from the 1st of July to the 8th of October of this year were $228,602,000, while for the corresponding period last year they were $215,325,000, or more than $13,000,000 greater this year in three months and eight days than they were in the corresponding period last year.

Mr. BRISTOW. Were those expenditures for the departments alone?

Mr. WEEKS. These are the general disbursemnets of the Government.

Mr. BORAH. I was speaking of departmental expenses alone.

Mr. WEEKS. I did not so understand the Senator.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. BORAH. I do.

Mr. BRISTOW. If the Senator will observe, the figures referred to by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] show an increase of over $4,000,000 per month in the expenditures for this year. Then I wish to inquire of the Senator if anyone who defends this new system of taxation, and urges that it is necessary on account of the European war, has undertaken to set forth what revenue has been lost because of that war? Of course no one will claim that there has been any increase in expenditure because of the war, except the money which the Secretary of State has taken from the Treasury to bring back some people who had been visiting in Europe and who were slightly inconvenienced because of the hostilities. I have not been able to see why those of the American people who are compelled to stay at home and labor for a living should be taxed in order to bring people back from Europe who go there on pleasure. I suppose the Secretary of State can explain that. But has anyone shown that the Government has lost any revenue, and if so, how much, because of the European war?

Mr. BORAH. I have not seen any figures to that effect.

Mr. BRISTOW. Does not the Senator from Idaho think that before these are styled "war taxes" there ought to be some evidence of some kind before the Senate that the deficit in the Treasury has resulted from the European war?

Mr. BORAH. Well, Mr. President, I look at it in this way: Suppose there had been a decrease in the revenues. Assume, for the sake of argument, that there had been. That has nothing to do with the amount which we have expended. If we have expended $200,000,000 more than we should have expended under an economical administration of the Government, the fact that the revenue has been cut off so as to limit the continuation of this extravagance is one question, but it does not have anything to do with the other proposition, although, of course, I see the pertinency of the Senator's suggestion from another standpoint; but as to the question of how much we are expending, and as to whether or not this is due to extravagance, can be proven by showing how much we have expended, regardless of how much we would have expended if the revenue should have held out. I think that the decrease in the revenue was evidenced quite conclusively before the European war began.

The decrease in revenue began some six months ago, and there has been a decrease each month since then. I do not know whether the percentage of decrease has increased each month, but the decrease continued each month up to the beginning of the European war. It might be, possibly, that the war when it came accentuated to some extent that condition, but that does not reach the question that we have already expended this year more money than we should have expended if we had had millions of dollars coming into the Treasury.

But I proceed. A new board of appeals, consisting of three members, at $4.000 each, has been created in the office of the Secretary of the Interior.

For commercial attachés, to be appointed by and compensated at such salaries as the Secretary of Commerce may fix, and a clerk for each, at $1.500, and for traveling expenses, the sum of $100,000 was appropriated for a year.

The salary of the private secretary to the Secretary of the Treasury was increased from $2,500 to $3.000, which means that the salaries of the private secretaries of the other nine Cabinet officers must also be increased from $2,500 to $3.000.

The salary of a chief of division, created less than a year ago under the income-tax law, has been increased from $2,500 to $3,500.

Six Assistant Attorneys General in the Department of Justice have had their salaries increased from $5.000 to $7.500 each.

The salary of the assistant to the Attorney General was increased during the extra session on an urgent deficiency bill from $7.000 to $9.000.

The salaries of our diplomatic representatives in Argentina, Chile, and Spain were raised from $12.000 to $17,500 each per annum, and the salaries of the three secretaries of the legations to those countries were increased from $2,625 to $3.000 each.

The mission to Paraguay and Uruguay was divided and a new minister authorized, with a new salary of $10,000.

In the Pension Office 40 special examiners, at $1,300 each, heretofore employed to facilitate settlement of claims for pensions for old soldiers, and whose appointments were controlled by civil-service law, were abolished. In their places five special examiners, at $1.300 each, who are not under the civil service, but are political appointments, were provided for.

I have no doubt, Mr. President, that this bill will pass as it has been written, but it is only another milestone in the terrific rate which we are traveling along the highway of extravagance. But if it is to pass, let us be candid with the people and tell them why it is passing and why it is necessary to pass it—to meet our vast expenditures, to meet nothing less than brazen and unrestrained and unblushing extravagance. Let us be candid with those who put up the money.

Now, what are the conditions of the country from a business standpoint? What is the situation of the people upon whom we are imposing this tax? There is no occasion for exaggeration. A plain, simple statement of facts is quite sufficient. The securities of insurance companies and savings banks have shrunk in value during the last 18 months, and prior to August 1, $500.000.000. We are advised that on August 1 the railroads of this country had defaulted in their bonds and notes to the extent of $600.000.000. We are advised also that railroad revenues fell off during the last fiscal year to the extent of $44,700,000. We are advised that business failures during the month of August, 1914, were to the amount of $43,000,000, as against $20,000,000 in 1913 and $12,000,000 in 1912. We are told also by those who are in a position to know that there are laboring men out of employment to the number of two and one-half millions, and a million more working on half time. We know, furthermore, that the cost of living has not been reduced, that the balance of trade has been going against us, and that business uneasiness and distress are not at all uncommon throughout the land. But in the midst of all this, of want and enforced idleness in some places, of business depression in many places, in the midst of the citizen's worry, the Government holds on its way undisturbed, exceeding the speed limit along the highway of extravagance. Taxation seems to recognize no signs of distress. Incomes may disappear, business houses put up their blinds, profits fade, railroads default in their securities, wages decrease and disappear, but taxes increase with a steady and even imperious movement. It is a strange and unnatural situation when a Government takes no notice of the conditions of its people when it comes to lay on the burdens of government. It is a cruel and arbitrary thing for a Government to exercise a power simply because it can do so, and without regard to the interest of the people who sustain the Government. We are but the directors and those men and women out yonder in the factory, field, and mine are the stockholders. To them we are bound by every tie of conscience, by every obligation of trusteeship, and by every sense of honorable consideration. But their protests here are utterly unheeded. They send us thousands of telegrams advising us of the situation, but we go on creating more offices, providing for more salaries, and spending more money, every dollar of which must come from them. Taxation is the only jubilant spirit among us all.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. BRISTOW. Before the Senator closes, I desire to inquire what evidence have we that the $105.000.000 will be needed to pay the expenses of the Government? The difference between the expenditures and the receipts this year as compared with last year—the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] can correct me if I am wrong, as he has the figures—is about $9.000,000.

Mr. WEEKS. Thirteen million dollars for three months and eight days.

Mr. BRISTOW. The deficit is $13,000,000 greater this year than for last year at this time.

Mr. TOWNSEND. For three months.

Mr. BRISTOW. If there is a deficit of $13.000.000 in three months and eight days, which is more than one-quarter of a year, at the same rate we would need four times $13.000.000, which would be approximately $50,000.000. Why should we collect $105.000.000, when the figures submitted by the Treasury Department and the evidence now before us show that we will only need $50.000.000?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the Senator does not take into consideration the constant increase of extravagance. We want $50.000.000 to go on. We will create a new commission and some new offices when we get a little rest. There was not——

Mr. BRISTOW. The Senator is of the opinion, then, that they want to collect from the people $50.000.000 and have it lying in the Treasury for the purpose of paying it out for something which they have not now in mind?

Mr. BORAH. There is a treaty pending under which we are to pay to Colombia $25.000.000; we shall have to get that money somewhere; and there is another treaty pending, which is being urged very earnestly now, to pay Nicaragua $3,000,000. That makes $28.000.000.

Mr. BRISTOW. I was curious to know why we were collecting $100,000,000 when the record as presented by the Secretary of the Treasury shows that we do not need it. It has been intimated that the Federal Reserve Board, which is one of the new institutions which has been created and which is to cost the people a good many million dollars before it is through, want this money to put in favored banks throughout the country; that is, they want the Treasury full, and the way to get the Treasury full is to lay taxes upon the people and let this new board, which has the use of the money, dispose of it among the banks which are friendly to the administration. I wondered if that were so.

Mr. BORAH. How many members of the Trade Commission are there?

Mr. BRISTOW. I think there are five or seven.

Mr. PERKINS. Five.

Mr. BORAH. There will be expenses in connection with that board which will have to be taken care of. I understand that there is sufficient money now, according to the President's message, to meet these emergencies; but it is not deemed wise to take the money out of the banks.

Mr. BRISTOW. That would embarrass the banks. Of course it does not embarrass them any to take it out of the people's pockets; that is a good place to go to get the money, but do not take it from the banks; put more in the banks, so that the banks may loan it to the people from whom they are taking it at four times the rate of interest the Government is getting for it.

Mr. BORAH. The President's view of it was that if we took it out of the banks we would take it out of the channels of business, and therefore impair our present prosperity.

Mr. BRISTOW. But does not taking it from the people take it out of the channels of business?

Mr. BORAH. That depends on the kind of people from whom you take it. I suppose they are supposed to have located this tax where it will not hurt business.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. OLIVER. The Senator from Idaho alluded to "our present prosperity." I have been wondering what he meant by that.

Mr. BORAH. I do not pause to discuss the question now. The President says:

> The Treasury itself could get along for a considerable period, no doubt, without immediate resort to new sources of taxation. But at what cost to the business of the community? Approximately $75,000,000, a large part of the present Treasury balance, is now on deposit with national banks distributed throughout the country. It is deposited, of course, on call. I need not point out to you what the probable consequences of inconvenience and distress and confusion would be if the diminishing income of the Treasury should make it necessary rapidly to withdraw these deposits. And yet without additional revenue that plainly might become necessary, and the time when it became necessary could not be controlled or determined by the convenience of the business of the country.

Now, the Senator from Kansas will see the philosophy of the President. It is that this money is now in the hands of the banks. While it ought to be in the Treasury of the United States to pay public expenses, yet it has been deposited in the banks, and it is wiser to collect more taxes from the people than it is to pull this money back from the banks and put it into the Treasury.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, then, as I understand, the President thinks it is better to require the depositor to go to the banks and borrow the money to pay into the Treasury rather than to have the banks pay back to the Treasury the money which the Treasury has loaned them. The depositor is paying the banks from 6 to 8 per cent on the money of the Government, which is his money, which he gets from the bank, while the bank is paying the Treasury of the United States 2 per cent on it. So the financial theory of the President is that it is better to tax the depositor and get money from him to put in the banks, so that the banks may have money to loan him at 6 and 8 per cent, for which the banks are only paying the Government 2 per cent, than to require the banks to return to the Treasury the money the Government has loaned them. That is, as I understand, the theory of the President, and I wanted to inquire if the Senator has the same understanding or places the same interpretation upon his address?

Mr. BORAH. I understand that the President thinks it is unwise to withdraw Government money from the banks, because that would be to take it out of the channels of business; and that he is of the opinion that to tax the people and collect the money in that way is not to take it out of the channels of business. I may not interpret the message correctly, and I would not do the President an injustice. There may be another view.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. TOWNSEND. As I recall, some time in the thirties a transaction occurred in the United States similar to that proposed here. There was public money taken from the Treasury and loaned to the States. That money has never yet been returned to the Treasury. Inasmuch as 79 per cent of the $75,000,000 deposited in the banks is now in one section of the country, there might be some possible reason for allowing the money that has already been loaned in that way to remain where it is. I have thought that that possibly might be another reason why it was not best at this time to withdraw the money that is now deposited in the favored banks of the United States.

Mr. BORAH. I agree with the proposition that in the present condition of business affairs it might be very disastrous to call for money anywhere in large amounts. I think that it would be likely to create a condition of affairs which would be serious.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. I presume that when the money is collected under the special tax which this bill levies it will be deposited by the Government in the banks, and if it is, will it not be necessary to levy another tax. Because if it is not right to take the money that we have in the banks out of the banks it will be wrong to take the money out of the banks when we put more money in the banks.

Mr. BORAH. I presume we ought to indulge in the assumption that this amount will be kept in the Treasury. The thing could happen which the Senator speaks of, though without any change in the program which has been heretofore followed.

Mr. President, the first and indispensable principle of any righteous system of taxation is economy. Any tax, however and wherever laid, whether upon the necessaries or luxuries, upon the virtues or vices of men, beyond that necessary for the economical administration of the Government is nothing less than the exploitation of the people through the arbitrary and brutal power of the Government. It is true the people can pay this tax, and would do so were it many times heavier. But that is not the question. Economy in public expenditures makes for good citizenship; it builds up the moral fiber of the people; it strengthens their faith in their Government and augments and arouses their patriotism. It teaches economy and frugality in private affairs. It breeds confidence, and lights up the whole field of private endeavor with optimism and hope. It makes for a happy, contented, sturdy, hopeful people.

Instead, therefore, of laying more taxes, or putting heavier burdens upon the business world and upon wages, why not commence with this economy to which we have all time and time again most faithfully pledged ourselves? Extravagance has gone far enough to justly excite the alarm of the most conservative and patriotic men. The cancer spot may not be large, but it is a cancer just the same. No hour can be too early to cut it out. And even, sir, if all the honor and the glory should finally be accredited to the present leader of the Democracy, which his fondest admirers believe will be his, this excision would in the long course of the years, if followed up, exceed in glory all the rest. If he should establish the precedent of real economy and bring the Government back to a sane basis in this respect, while men might differ and disagree as to all other acts, the people would pay to him undivided homage for this.

Not a dollar of this money need be raised if we will but return to the most ordinary rules of decent public expenditures. Not a dollar of it would ever have been called for but for this riotous and shameless extravagance going on from year to year and apparently now in the high tide of reckless unrestraint. Let us concede that the war had something to do with the amount of revenue which we otherwise would have collected, yet the war has had nothing to do with the amount which we should have expended. Business men cutting salaries, wage earners unemployed, railroads defaulting in their obligations and praying for higher freight rates, enterprise hesitant, and initiative absent from the business world—certainly we can afford as a Government to stop and sober up, at least forego any further debauch until the people shall have spirit enough to in some measure tolerate it if not enjoy it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be read for amendment.

Mr. SIMMONS. I ask unanimous consent that the committee amendments be first considered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from North Carolina if he is prepared now to offer the committee amendments?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes; as they are reached. I do not exactly know what the Senator means. The committee amendments are already indicated in the print which is before us, and I will offer them just as they are now to the bill. I have no amendments to offer at present except those that are in the printed bill.

Mr. SMOOT. That is what I wanted to know.

The first amendment of the Committee on Finance was, on page 1, line 4, after the words "tax of," to strike out "$1.50" and insert "$1.75," so as to read:

> That there shall be levied, collected, and paid in lieu of the tax of $1 now imposed by law, a tax of $1.75 on all beer, lager beer, ale, porter, and other similar fermented liquor, brewed or manufactured and sold, or stored in warehouse, or removed for consumption or sale, within the United States, by whatever name such liquors may be called, for every barrel containing not more than 31 gallons; and at a like rate for any other quantity or for the fractional parts of a barrel authorized and defined by law.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from North Carolina if he has estimated the probable income from this provision.

Mr. SIMMONS. I have an estimate made by the department. The Senator will find that Senate Document No. 596, Sixty-third Congress, printed just this morning, gives all of these estimates. Does that answer the Senator's question? I will state, if the Senator has not the document before him——

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. It has just been handed to me.

Mr. SIMMONS. I supposed the Senator had the document before him.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I should like to ask the Senator if there is anything discriminatory or sectional in this provision?

Mr. SIMMONS. I know of nothing discriminatory or sectional in it.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I will state to the Senator what I have in my mind. You propose to raise about half of the internal-revenue tax from this item, about $43,000,000.

Mr. SIMMONS. A little over $40,000,000.

Mr. SMOOT. Forty-three million dollars.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I desire to call the Senator's attention to the fact that only about 3.9 per cent of this amount will be collected in the South. I do not like to use the expression "south of Mason and Dixon's line," but just for the sake of geographical exactness I should like to remind him that only 3.9 per cent of this tax will be paid south of Mason and Dixon's line, including the States of Louisiana, Texas, Kansas, and Oklahoma. Out of the total of $66,000,000 to be collected from the tax on beer, the States south of the old line, which I hope exists only in memory, including the States of Louisiana, Texas, Arkansas, and Oklahoma, will pay but $2,700,000 of the beer tax. I am watching with a great deal of interest to see where my honored friend from North Carolina will lay this whole burden of new taxes—for it is a burden unusual and unnecessary. Are you to spread it equitably upon the entire country?

I do not pose as the champion of any special line of American production; but the very first item in this bill touches the South with a soft, glovelike touch that will not be noticed or even felt in the States for which the Senator from North Carolina seems to be so solicitous; 3.9 per cent of this burden will fall on the South, 94.1 per cent upon the Northern States. I hope, before you finish with this bill, there will be some provision spreading this burden equitably throughout the whole country. It is just a little less than shameful to think that the appropriations during the last year have gone southward and the tax northward; the privileges one way and the burdens another.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I do not think a single member of the committee—certainly not a single one of the majority membership of the committee—in considering any tax imposed in this bill had in mind for a minute any question of sectionalism; nor do I believe that the bill is open to the objection that it imposes a larger burden upon other sections of the country than it does upon the South.

I do not know whether the Senator's figures with reference to the amount of beer produced in the South, as compared with other sections of the country, are correct or not. I have made no inquiry about that matter, because I will say to the Senator that it never entered my mind to make inquiry about how much beer was made in this section or that section of the country.

The tax upon beer, like the tax upon a great many other commodities, is not a tax upon the community in which the product is made, but it is a tax upon the people of the country who consume that commodity. I do not know how much beer is consumed in the Senator's State or made in the State, and I do not care. I do not know how much is consumed in the South as compared with the North or the East or the West. I suppose the American people in all sections of the country drink beer to a greater or less degree. It is a consumption tax. It is imposed finally upon the man who buys the beer in kegs and the man who drinks the beer.

But, Mr. President, I think a complete and full answer to the Senator's criticisms, if any answer were needed, is found in the fact that the war-tax bill of 1898, framed by a Republican Congress, drafted by Mr. Dingley, of Maine, passed first by a Republican House and then by a Republican Senate and signed by a Republican President, raised one-third of its revenues from a tax upon beer; and the rate fixed in that bill, instead of being $1.75 a barrel as is the rate fixed in this bill, was $2 a barrel.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. SIMMONS. Just one minute. I do not think anybody will accuse the Republican Party which passed that bill and the Republican President who signed it of any particular desire to favor the South more than any other section of the country; and if this bill, imposing a tax of $1.75, bears evidence upon its face, as the Senator contends, of a purpose on the part of its authors to protect the South and to discriminate in favor of the South against other sections of the country, then that Republican measure, passed by a Republican Congress and signed by a Republican President, was subject to a greater extent to the same charge of sectionalism in behalf of the South.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, the Senator from North Carolina, in his inability to account for the present Treasury dilemma in which his party has been placed, goes back to 1898 and calls attention to what Mr. Dingley and President McKinley did. I was in Congress in 1898 and voted for that bill; but the author of the present deficiency bill, Mr. UNDERWOOD, and other Democrats, denounced that measure in vigorous terms in my hearing because of the excessive burden which he said it would impose upon the people of the country. We were then in war. War had been declared, against the wishes of President McKinley, at the instance of innumerable Democrats, both in this Chamber and in the other; and yet when a war tax was sought to be levied by an administration actually engaged in war we found no sympathy or cooperation or assistance from those who now rise and proclaim this a necessary measure because, forsooth, Europe is fighting.

I know how President McKinley tried to ward off a conflict at arms with Spain. Our friends upon the other side were fierce for war; but when it came to paying the necessary expenses of that war you voted against it. Now, when we are at peace with all the world, when the belligerent powers now engaged in war are felicitating our Government upon its neutrality—without a single cloud on the American horizon, unless it be the temporary dominance of the Democratic Party—we are asked to pass this so-called war-revenue bill.

How appealing the war-revenue bill must be to the country. The truth is, it is a deficiency bill. You have spent more money than you have taken in, and you have spent it recklessly. Now, when the administration is face to face with the necessity of issuing the bonds of the Government to get us out of the hole into which you have forced the country, Senators come in, under the guise of war, and proceed to levy additional taxes against your countrymen.

The analogy, Mr. President, is not good between the situation as it existed in 1898 and at present. Senators upon that side of the Chamber know it as well as I do. The analogy is not good. We voted Mr. McKinley $50,000,000 and placed it in his hands after the war had begun; and, as the President said then, no one could tell where it would lead, but wherever it led we must assume all the responsibility for it. Out of the great wisdom of Congress, Mr. Dingley and some of his associates proposed that we should pay the expenses of that war as it went along, and pile no burden upon future generations. There was a strong desire upon the part of Democratic Members of the House at that time to put that burden upon future generations and thus avoid a temporary tax burden.

Mr. SIMMONS. Does not the Senator know that at the same time they provided for the passage of the war-revenue bill they provided for the issuance of $500,000,000 worth of bonds and the issuance of $100,000,000 worth of Government certificates of indebtedness?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Oh, yes, Mr. President, I know that there was a provision in that bill that certificates might be issued, and that the same provision is in the bill before us. Your administration has already issued emergency money. You did not regard it as wise to pay the expenses of the War with Spain by special war taxes then. Both your leader in the House and my friend the Speaker of the House, Mr. CLARK—for he is a friend, and I value him as a public man very highly—both those distinguished representatives of the majority party today voted against the war-revenue bill in 1898. At that time, if my recollection serves me right, the revenues of our Government were coming in in excess of our expenditures. Although when we came into power we found the country demoralized, our factories closed, our farmers discouraged, and laboring men idle all over this country because of unwise tariff laws, for which your party was responsible, we gathered together under the wise leadership of McKinley and passed the Dingley tariff law, and it revived our industries instantly, gave new hope to the people. We could have paid the expenses of the Spanish War out of the current revenues of the Government under that law—a thing you could not do to-day. You can not pay the ordinary expenses of the Government out of the ordinary revenues of the Government because of miscalculation. That is what has brought you to this extremity. That is why you are so solemn. That is why no Senator within his hearing could answer the speech of the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] this morning. That is why most of you left the Chamber. That is why not a word was said in reply to the severe and accurate and forceful indictment of the Senator from Utah.

The title of that Senate document, No. 596, is misleading on its face and untrue. This is not a war revenue bill at all. It is a deficiency revenue bill, due to the fact that you did not collect enough money from your income and revenue tax and your duties on imports to pay the ordinary expenses of the Government in time of peace.

Now, you may be able to convince the country that this is a war revenue bill; but if you had the frankness which you always had while we were in power you would acknowledge it as a deficiency bill, due to your mismanagement.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Certainly.

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not know whether I correctly understood the Senator a little while ago, but I think I understood him to say that we could have paid the expenses of the Spanish-American War out of the current revenues.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. One moment—up to the time that the special tax was levied.

Mr. SIMMONS. Which was——

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Which was in June.

Mr. SIMMONS. June 13, 1898.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Admiral Dewey went into Manila Bay on the 1st of May. We had already purchased all available munitions of war at that time, and paid for them.

Mr. SIMMONS. We had purchased the munitions of war on June 13 and paid for them?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Certainly; we had purchased the munitions of war and had them on hand; we could not go to war without munitions.

Mr. SIMMONS. I think the Senator is mistaken about that.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Oh, no; I am not mistaken. I know what the then Secretary of War said about it. He had been a distinguished soldier of the Civil War and knew what war was.

Mr. SIMMONS. I was just going to express some surprise at the statement of the Senator that we could have paid these expenses out of the current revenues, and at his statement that we had purchased and paid for the munitions of war out of the current revenues. The Senator says that this is a deficiency bill, and that there never was any necessity for any war-revenue taxes in 1898, because we had plenty of money in the Treasury. Now, I want to call the Senator's attention——

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I did not use that expression at all. I did not say that we had plenty of money in the Treasury; we were just recovering from the Cleveland panic. I said that the expenses of the war could have been paid out of the current revenues.

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes. Now, I want to say to the Senator that the facts are these: At the close of the last fiscal year, after paying all of the ordinary expenses of the Government out of the ordinary receipts of the Government for that fiscal year, there was in the Treasury a surplus of $34,000,000. Thirty-three and odd millions of that was applied to the payment of Panama Canal expenses, and therefore it was not necessary to sell the Panama bonds, as the law had provided. In 1897, the year before the Spanish-American war broke out, when the Republican Party was in control of the Government, instead of a surplus in the Treasury in that year the records show that there was a deficit in the Treasury of the United States of $38,000,000.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Certainly, Mr. President—chargeable to the Wilson tariff law.

Mr. SIMMONS. Let us get a little further away from the Wilson tariff law.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. It was on the statute books at that time.

Mr. SIMMONS. Everything bad that happened five years before that act was passed the Senator thinks was attributable to it, and everything bad that has happened since that act was passed the Senator thinks is attributable to it. In 1897 there was a deficit in the Treasury at the end of the fiscal year of $38,000,000. In 1898, the year in which the Spanish-American War was declared, on the 30th day of June of that year, when the war had been in progress but a short time, the deficit in the Treasury—for there was a deficit that year, as there was the previous year—amounted to $89,000,000.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Yes, Mr. President; and there never has been a deficit since until your party came into power.

Mr. SIMMONS. That was under the Dingley Act.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Yes; but our bill had not become operative.

Mr. SIMMONS. When did your bill go into operation?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. We did not have the benefits of our tariff legislation, and when it got fully underway not a single year after the passage of the Dingley law and the Spanish-American War was there a time when we did not have a surplus in our Treasury over expenditures.

Mr. SIMMONS. So if the Senator will permit me—and then I will not trouble him any further—we would have about this situation: The year before the Spanish-American War broke out, under a Republican administration, we had a deficit of $38,000,000. The year in which it broke out we had a deficit of $89,000,000. Yet the Senator says that we could have carried on that war and could have paid its expenses without levying any additional taxes.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Yes; and I reassert it.

Mr. SIMMONS. As a matter of fact, we did levy that year additional taxes of $100,000,000. We did authorize in that year an issue of $500,000,000 of bonds. We did authorize in that year an issue of $100,000,000 of Government certificates of indebtedness. We authorized the issue of bonds and certificates and imposed taxes for the purposes of that war of $700,000,000. Yet the Senator from Michigan, with a deficit in the Treasury that year and the year before, seriously tells the Senate that we could have gone on without raising any additional taxation.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Let us see about the statement of the Senator from North Carolina. President McKinley was not sworn in until the 4th day of March, 1897. Congress was promptly convened in extraordinary session, and I think the Dingley law was passed July 31 following. I assert without any hesitation whatever that there was never a year of the Dingley law when we did not have a surplus of revenues over expenditures, and it was the wise, cool-headed, calculating judgment of Mr. Dingley that provision was made to pay the expenses of the Spanish War as it ran along. A great many of us thought that it might be appropriately spread upon future generations, but wiser councils prevailed, and that law was put upon the statute books for the sole purpose of meeting the expenses of the Spanish War. Congress promptly placed $50,000,000 in the hands of President McKinley to spend it as he desired. Now, we are at peace with all the world, and yet Senators upon the other side of the Chamber turn to our action as a precedent, when the conditions were entirely different.

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Senator will pardon me——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LEWIS in the chair). Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Certainly.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator says there was no deficit under the Republican tariff. I should like to call his attention to the fact that in 1905 there was a deficit of $18,750,000, and in 1908 there was a deficit of $20,000,000. In 1909 there was a further deficit of $58,000,000. I will further say to the Senator, and I think I could produce the evidence to show it if I had the time, that but for certain circumstances connected with the Panama expenditures there would have been a deficit during several other years.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, that is a mere conjecture and does not meet the situation at all. There is not a Senator on the other side of the Chamber who does not know that under the Dingley law we collected all the revenue needed to pay the ordinary expenses of the Government, and generally a large surplus.

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Senator will let me finish, I wish to call attention to another deficit under the Payne law, a positive deficit about which there is no conjecture, a deficit of $18,000,000 in 1910.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Was there any other time during that law when there was a deficit?

Mr. SIMMONS. That is a positive deficit that I know of.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. No, Mr. President; just the moment the country adjusted itself to the new law the revenues bounded, as they have always done to the protective principle, and we gathered all the revenue we needed and paid hundreds of millions out of current revenues for the work of building the Panama Canal.

Mr. President, we had ample revenue the year before the election of the Democratic Party to power, did we not? We were not suffering from lack of revenue in 1911 and the spring of 1912. We were not suffering from lack of revenue right up to the time the Republican Party was divided and defeated, and we are only suffering now because of recklessness in making appropriations, miscalculation, and erroneous judgment in spreading the taxes of the Government, and I reassert what I said a few moments ago in regard to the very first item in this bill, the South escapes much of that burden.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield further to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Certainly.

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Senator will pardon me, the Senator says when the Democrats came in they had ample funds in the Treasury. In the year 1912, the year before the Democrats came in, the Government borrowed $33,000,000 of Panama bonds, and while using those bonds a balance of $35,000,000 was turned over to them, but without the use of those Panama bonds they would have had a surplus of a little over $2,000,000.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Tariff reduction was imminent in the summer of 1912, after the Chicago convention. And the present administration would have been obliged to pay for that expenditure at Panama if we had not done so. They have been relieved of a great deal of the expense we underwent in building the Panama Canal, and I think it does not lie in the mouths of Senators on the other side of the Chamber to charge that there has been any mismanagement on the part of any Republican administration in conducting the affairs of the Panama Canal or in its construction. The management of the Panama Canal is most creditable to the last administration. I do not think my friend from North Carolina can question it. We have left a very small burden for this administration to bear. Most of the expense has been met out of the ordinary revenues of the Government from day to day, with the result that you take over the political management of the Government's affairs with a very large percentage of the entire cost of constructing the Panama Canal off your hands.

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not mean to attack, of course, the management of the Panama Canal under the past administration or under the present administration. The only point I was making was that we paid the entire expenses of last year's operation in the construction of the Panama Canal out of the current revenues, and during the year before we came in the Government sold its bonds for that purpose.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, I repeat what I said a little while ago, that we could have paid the expenses of the Spanish-American War out of the current revenues of the Government under the Dingley law. I did not say they had that money on hand upon the 1st day of May, 1898; but I repeat that under that law and the income derived therefrom, the internal revenue and the customs duties, we could have paid the expenses of the Spanish-American War without levying a war tax at all.

Mr. SIMMONS. If it be true, as the Senator has said——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield further to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. SIMMONS. If it be true that we could have paid the expenses of that war without any war taxes, without any increase in the issue of bonds, I ask the Senator why, then, did they impose this $100,000,000 of additional taxes upon the people? There was no contention then that there was any falling off in the imports as a result of the war conditions. If it be true, as the Senator says, that they could have paid those expenses out of the current revenue, why did his party impose this additional tax of $100,000,000? Why did his party issue $198,000,000 of the $500,000,000 of bonds authorizeed and cover that money into the Treasury, if it had no need for it?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The Senator from North Carolina asks exactly the same question that was asked in the House of Representatives when the war-tax bill was passed. There was scarcely a Democrat there who did not ask "Why the necessity for this imposition of extraordinary taxes?" and the only answer made to that question was made by Mr. Dingley, that this is an extraordinary situation, we are in war, and in order that we may spread this expense of this war, which is a just one, in the interests of humanity, in order that we may put them behind us and all the people may have the privilege of contributing toward that expense, the bill is to be passed. Senators who are on the other side of the Chamber to-day and who were at that time Members of the House of Representatives will bear me out in that statement.

But we were at war, in a vastly different situation than the one which confronts us to-day. The only war that you have on hand to-day is the warfare between your prophecies and predictions of last year when the Senator from North Carolina was making this tariff bill. We told you upon this side of the Chamber when you enacted the law that it would not bring the necessary revenue to run the Government. We voted against it and we begged you not to pass it. We told you not to forfeit the sugar duties and the duties on iron ore and lumber and wool, and many other items; but you went blindly on and did just as you have always done before—led the country direct to the pit from which you are now trying to extricate yourselves by the extraordinary imposition of $100,000,000 of special taxes.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Certainly.

Mr. BRISTOW. This is labeled a war-revenue bill, and yet there is not in the report of the committee nor has there been stated to the Senate a single fact in concrete form to indicate that the European war made necessary this additional taxation. It has not increased the public expenditures. It may have decreased the revenues, but the amount and the way in which such revenues may have been decreased has not been set forth. The amount of the revenue that can be charged to the falling off of the importations from Europe has not been concretely and definitely given us, so that we know whether it aggregates $107,000,000 or not.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, I rose for the purpose of calling the attention of the chairman of the Finance Committee, the Senator from North Carolina, to the fact that on the first page of his bill he has so arranged the law, if it becomes operative, that the States south of Mason and Dixon's line, and including the States of Louisiana, Texas, Kansas, and Oklahoma, pay 3.9 per cent of the vast amount to be collected from that source, and if the effect of this legislation is sectional, you have devised it. I do not understand that you conferred with anybody on this side of the Chamber regarding the matter.

Mr. SIMMONS. Does the Senator say that I admitted this legislation is sectional?

Mr. SMITH of Michigon. No; I said if it was sectional, you are responsible for it, because you did not confer with anybody on this side of the Chamber about the bill.

Mr. SIMMONS. Does the Senator mean to say that this act imposing a tax of $1.75 per barrel on beer could be sectional and in favor of the South?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. It works out that way.

Mr. SIMMONS. And does the Senator say the act of 1898, which imposed $2 on beer, was not sectional?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. That will not let the honored Senator away from the point I make—that the Southern States I have referred to will pay but $2,700,000 of the revenue duty levied on beer under this provision, while the other States in the Union will pay over $40,000,000 of this amount.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is now upon the amendment of the committee.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I do not conceive that anybody except the Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] believes for a minute that this beer tax is a sectional tax in the sense in which he makes the charge. I think the answer I make to him—that it is a tax upon consumption, and therefore applies to the beer drinker all over the country, whether in the South or somewhere else—is amply sufficient. But it can not be sectional in favor of the South unless the bill passed by his own party was also sectional.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Will the Senator yield for a question just there?

Mr. SIMMONS. In just a minute. So far as the amount of collections is concerned, I do not know where the Senator got his figures, but I am advised that the amount actually paid by the South under the tax on beer amounted to 13½ per cent.

Mr. TOWNSEND. May I ask the Senator just how the consumer is going to pay this tax on beer? In what way will he pay it? Will there be an additional price for a glass of beer or will it be reduced?

Mr. SIMMONS. I have not worked that out myself. It has been suggested that during the Spanish-American War they accomplished that purpose by making the glasses a little smaller. I do not know how they will do it, but I do know that it is going to be passed on to the consumer in some way or other.

Mr. President, there is one other thing I want to refer to in answer to the Senator from Michigan. The Senator says that this tax is necessary because of the breaking down of the Democratic tariff act. It is amazing to me, Mr. President, that any Senator can make a statement of that sort upon the floor of the Senate of the United States in face of the fact that during the past year the receipts of the Government under the Democratic tariff exceeded the expenses of the Government in that year $34,000,000. Undoubtedly, therefore, the receipts from the tariff last year were sufficient. So far as the present year is concerned, if there had been no European war, if conditions in this country had remained normal, as they were during the last year, the tariff law would have been amply sufficient to have provided all the revenues that the Government would have needed.

I believe it was the Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW] who said a little while ago that we had not undertaken even so much as to show why it was necessary to impose this additional tax if the tariff was sufficient under ordinary circumstances to support the Government.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. SIMMONS. I was proceeding to answer the question the Senator asked me a little while ago.

Mr. BRISTOW. I understand, and I am obliged to the Senator, but I should like to have him state particularly and specifically wherein this revenue has been lost. A general statement may be the opinion of the Senator from North Carolina, but what definite and particular articles of importation have failed to come in, which otherwise would have come in, and what revenue has actually been lost in the decline of those importations?

Mr. SIMMONS. I have before stated that, Mr. President; I stated that on last Friday. The Senator from Kansas says I stated it in general terms. The Senator is mistaken about that. I gave some facts which showed the loss of revenue. Now, let me say——

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Senator will permit me, I will answer his question.

Mr. BRISTOW. If the Senator will pardon me a moment, so that he may understand just exactly what I ask, I desire to say the Senator has stated that there had been a loss in revenue of so much per month, but the Senator has not pointed out what caused that loss of revenue.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, the Spanish-American War was a very small war; it disturbed to some extent the trade conditions of this country for a very short time. In a few weeks after that war had been begun, so far from the effect being disastrous to trade, so far from its affecting injuriously our imports as a source of customs revenue, it helped business and it helped importations. There was no necessity for a war tax in 1898 to make up any loss of revenue through the customhouse or any loss of revenue through the internal-revenue system of taxation. The necessity in that case for a tax was to provide money to pay the extraordinary expenses incident to the prosecution of the war. We had no money on hand. There was a deficit in the Treasury. War was going inevitably to greatly increase the expenses of the Government, and it was necessary to levy additional taxes for the purpose of getting that money.

When the European war broke out we were receiving, through our customhouses and through the operations of our internal-revenue and income-tax laws, ample revenue to support the Government. If nothing had transpired as a result of the war in Europe to reduce the receipts of the Government under the operation of its tariff laws there would be no necessity for this additional taxation, but, Mr. President, this is a war in which practically a whole continent is engaged, and the continent engaged in this war is the great industrial continent of this world. Ten millions of men upon that continent who have been producers of wealth, who have been producers of commodities, a part of which have come to this country and paid taxes and given us revenue, are now in the field engaged in battle. There are 5,000,000 more men upon that continent who were engaged in productive pursuits who have had to leave the fields, to leave the factories, and to leave the mines for service in connection with the war.

Mr. BRISTOW rose.

Mr. SIMMONS. I wish the Senator from Kansas would let me finish this statement, and then I will yield to him.

Mr. BRISTOW. Very well.

Mr. SIMMONS. When the European war broke out it became apparent to every man who knew what the effect of withdrawing these 10,000,000 of men from productive enterprise and these additional 5,000,000 of men from production—in the aggregate 15,000,000 of able-bodied men—everybody knew what the effect of that would be upon the productive capacity of that continent; everybody knew that would be reflected in our imports from that continent.

In June we had a falling off in revenue, but it was the normal falling off that we had had during the fiscal year 1913–14. There was a falling off in that year, but the falling off of customs revenues in that year had been anticipated and provided for. We knew when we levied lower taxes that it meant less income to the customhouses, and also less taxation upon the people, as the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] suggests. As the result of those reduced duties upon imports we did lose in the fiscal year 1913–14 the sum of $26,000,000; that is to say, our receipts from customs during that year were $26,000,000 less than they were in the previous year.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Do I understand the Senator from North Carolina to say that he knew when the tariff law was passed that by reducing the duties we were going to get less revenue? Was it not the contention of the Senator and of others that by reducing duties we were going to get more importations and more revenue?

Mr. SIMMONS. We expected more importations; but as the duties were less, we expected less revenue. If the Senator from Michigan will get the report made by the committee at that time, he will see that we estimated for a reduction in revenue through the customhouses. We expected to get less revenue.

Mr. TOWNSEND. If I remember the Senator's argument, it was that it was expected to get more revenue—not by taking the duties off, but by reducing them.

Mr. SIMMONS. I can not hear the statement of the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I have stated that I am positive that certain Senators made the argument that by reducing the duties, not by taking them off, we were going to get more revenue; that there were certain things the importation of which was prohibited under the protective tariff, and that by reducing duties we were going to get more revenue by those articles coming into the United States.

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not know who the Senator from Michigan heard declare that. The Finance Committee, speaking through the majority members of that committee, did not make that declaration; no member of the Finance Committee nor any other Senator, so far as I know, declared any such thing. Of course, if the duties are reduced, there will be less money received from a given amount of importations.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. And more goods imported?

Mr. SIMMONS. And we expected an increase of importations, but we did not expect the increase to be so large that it would equal the amount of the reduction from what we were receiving under the Payne-Aldrich law from customs revenues.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Then the argument——

Mr. SIMMONS. Let me finish. In our report we stated that on account of this reduction of tariff rates there would be a decrease in our customs revenues. We further declared that for the purpose of making up that decrease in customs revenues we had placed in that bill a provision taxing the incomes of the rich of this country, so that it would make up what we lost in our customs revenues.

As I have said, we did lose last year $26,000,000 of customs revenues. That was the result of a reduction of duty; that was normal; that was expected. We did not lose quite so much as we had expected. As the Senator will see, if he will get the estimates then made, we thought the loss because of the reduction in duties would be larger than it turned out to be. As a matter of fact, the importations were somewhat larger than we had estimated and the reduction in revenues was somewhat less than we had estimated. That was the normal loss. Now, during three months and eight days, for which I have the figures——

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

Mr. SIMMONS. I shall be obliged to the Senator if he will allow me to finish this statement.

Mr. BRISTOW. Very well.

Mr. SIMMONS. For three months and eight days of the present fiscal year—I say "eight days," for I have not the figures showing the receipts later than the eighth day of this month—which have already expired, there has been a loss of revenue to the Government from the falling off of importations—I do not mean altogether importations from Europe, because our trade with other countries has been affected by the European war, as well as our trade with Europe; not to so great an extent, it is true, but it has been affected; there has been a falling off not only in importations from Europe but in importations from other countries—during the three months and eight days the falling off in our customs revenue has amounted to $30,000,000 and something over, or $4,000,000 more than we lost in customs duties under normal conditions during the entire fiscal year 1914.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. SIMMONS. I will ask the Senator not to break in on this sentence, and I will conclude in a moment.

Leaving out the month of July, where there was no war, and taking the next two months and eight days of this year, August and September, when war conditions have prevailed, the falling off in customs receipts, resulting, of course, from the curtailment and reduction of imports, has amounted, in round numbers, to $25,000,000, or in two months and eight days within $1,000,000 as much as we lost under normal conditions during the entire fiscal year 1914.

I gave on Saturday last in the brief statement I then made to the Senate the falling off in revenue from customs for the first five days of the present month, October. My recollection now is that it amounted for those five days to $2,800,000. I will not be quite sure about that; but that is my recollection. This morning I have been able to secure the returns for the first eight days of October, three days more than I had on Saturday, and I find that the falling off in revenues and customs during these eight days, resulting, of course, from the curtailment or falling off in imports, for it could not result from any other cause, amounts to $5,050,000. So that during the last three days there has been a falling off in our revenues of $2,400,000.

Mr. President, is this going to continue? I think it is going to continue, and I think it is going to get worse. When the war in Europe began there was the accumulated stock of goods for exportation. Immediately after the declaration of war, of course, when the embargo was on, there was a sudden falling off; and then, with the channels of ocean travel and commerce open again, there was naturally a spurt in exportations. The surplus which had been accumulated in time of peace, when the industries of that great manufacturing continent were at full blast, was hurried to market; and there was for a little while an unexpected arrival of goods on our shores, not coming up to the importations of August of last year by any means—a falling off of $11,000,000 during that month—but the results were better than we have reason to expect they will be hereafter.

It is not going to be long before that accumulated stock of merchandise made for the purpose of exportation will have been sold, marketed, or consumed by the home demand. That that time has already begun to arrive to my mind is reflected by the fact that during the eight days of the present month there has been a very remarkable and a very sudden collapse of importations. I want to ask seriously, when this stock accumulated in times of peace has been marketed, where will the commodities for exportation from Europe be made? Where will they come from, Mr. President? The factories of France are practically closed; the factories of Germany are practically closed; the factories of Austria are practically closed; and the factories of England are partially closed. Will it not require all that the men and the women of those countries can produce in the field and all that the feeble who have stayed at home and escaped war duty can make in the factories and in the mines to supply the great demands of those countries and their armies, and where are the products to come from from which we are to receive revenues from imports?

In view of the fact that of our $766,000,000 of dutiable imports in 1914, $505,000,000 came from Europe, and the greater part of that $505,000,000 came from the great industrial countries that are now engaged in armed conflict, where are the products to come from in Europe from which we are to get our revenues upon imports? If you suddenly cut off $505,000,000 of our total dutiable imports of $766,000,000, how can we expect to get more than one-third of our former revenue from customs? We are not expecting that all of the $505,000,000 will be cut off; but it is expected, and reasonably expected, that the larger part of it will be cut off; and as it is cut off, of course, as a matter of necessity, we lose the revenue that we would normally derive from the tax imposed upon these imports.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

Mr. BRISTOW. I should like to ask the Senator a question. In February last, as I remember, there was a falling off of $10,000,000 in the revenues, as compared with the previous February. Does the Senator attribute that to the war in Europe?

Mr. SIMMONS. No; I do not, Mr. President; but I say to the Senator, as everybody knows, that he has done what the leader of another body here did—he has picked out an exceptional month. You may pick out almost any month in any year and you will find, comparing it with that month of the last year, that there was either an increase or a falling off. They are seldom ever the same. Sometimes for one reason and sometimes for another, the difference will be very considerable. But if the Senator will take the imports for the fiscal year 1914 he will find that the average falling off per month during that time was only about two and a half million dollars.

Mr. BRISTOW. That is, up to the 1st of October?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes.

Mr. BRISTOW. Again——

Mr. SIMMONS. I want to say to the Senator right there, as an additional reason for this falling off in February—it did not occur to me at the moment, but my attention has been called to it—that wool went on the free list, as the Senator well knows, on the 1st day of March.

Mr. BRISTOW. No; I think it was the reduction in sugar. Wool went on the free list, as I remember it——

Mr. SIMMONS. Sugar; that is right.

Mr. GORE. It was the reduction in sugar.

Mr. BRISTOW. The reduction in sugar became effective on the 1st of March. Therefore there was a decline in the amount of sugar imported. The war had nothing to do with that, but the importers were waiting for the lower duty on sugar.

Now, let me inquire of the Senator if this great falling off in the revenues for the first eight days of October, 1914, as compared with the first eight days of October, 1913, is not largely due to the fact that there were in bond goods waiting for the new tariff bill to go into operation, when there was a reduction in duties, and that the increased importations in the first part of October, 1913, show this marked difference in the amount collected during the first eight days of October of this year and last year?

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not exactly catch the point of the Senator.

Mr. BRISTOW. The bill that is now law became effective, as I remember, on the 4th day of October last.

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes.

Mr. BRISTOW. And immediately there were very large importations of goods that were waiting to come in under the reduced rates, which showed a remarkable increase in the amount of duty collected for the first few days immediately after that bill became effective. Now, the Senator is taking this abnormal condition in 1913 and drawing a comparison with the importations this year, and as a result of that comparison he is concluding that the war in Europe is responsible for the difference, but he does not give a single fact that connects the war in Europe with this decline.

Mr. SIMMONS. I will ask the Senator if it needs any facts further than the fact of the decline, and further than the fact that there are no factories running to produce these things which heretofore have been imported into this country?

Mr. BRISTOW. There was a falling off in July of $4,500,000 in our customs duties. That was before the war began. There is an average decline, from the 1st day of January down to the beginning of the war, of something over $2,000,000 a month, as I remember. Now, why should the European war be suddenly responsible for this decline in revenues?

Mr. SIMMONS. I simply want to ask the Senator this question and then I will let the matter rest there:

We have heretofore been receiving, and did receive last year, two-thirds of all our dutiable imports from Europe. Does the Senator believe that in the condition that exists in the industrial countries of Europe to-day those countries are going to be, during this war, in a condition to send us the same amount of imports that they did in times of peace, when their factories were running and when their people were at work?

The Senator can answer that question, and that is all I desire to say to the Senator upon that subject.

Mr. BRISTOW. If the Senator will show specifically—and the figures ought to be available to him—that there is a decline in importation of dutiable products from the countries engaged in war aggregating a certain amount, and that the importations of such products have not been increased from the countries that are not at war, then he will have a basis upon which his allegations may stand; but until he presents——

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Senator will pardon me, I have just shown him that two-thirds of our imports come from Europe. I have just shown him that in eight days our revenues from imports have fallen off upward of $5,000,000.

Mr. BRISTOW. Yes; in eight days; and that eight days includes the first four days of the operation of this law with the reduced duties. If the Senator has looked up the matter, he knows that those four days were probably the busiest days that the Customs Bureau of the Treasury Department ever had, because of the enormous storing of goods in bond waiting for the reduced duties. To make such a comparison now, and make that a basis for increased taxation, is unfair to the American people, unjust and misleading; and it can not be made the basis for increased taxes to collect from the people $100,000,000, which is not needed, according to the figures presented by the Senator himself.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, it is rather unusual for gentlemen to pretend to be more ignorant than they are. That sort of thing has just happened; but it seldom happens.

Of course the Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW] knows, the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] knows, and the Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] knows that when, before this war began, we reduced tariff taxes we reduced them in two ways: First, by putting several things upon the free list—wool, to go into effect at a certain time; sugar, at another time; lumber, and various other things—and that the reduction of receipts to the Treasury took place immediately upon their going upon the free list; and of course each one of these Senators knows that we Democrats were not such fools as not to know that ourselves beforehand, when we framed the bills. Nobody ever imagined or even conceived, much less contended, that putting an article upon the free list was going to raise revenue. We contended simply that it was better, in the interests of the people, that the Government should do without that much revenue in order that the people might pay that much less tax—keep that much more of their hard-earned sheckels in their pockets.

We reduced tariff taxation in another way, the second way referred to by me; that was by reducing the rates when we did not put articles upon the free list. In some cases where that was done the Treasury receipts were decreased, and in some cases where that was done the Treasury receipts were increased. Wherever the old rate was such that there was already a rather liberal importation, the decrease of the rate might lead, sometimes led, to a decrease of the Government revenue; but wherever the old rate had been so high as to be virtually prohibitive or even fairly in excess of a competitive point, then the decrease of the rate led, in the case of that particular article, to an increase of the customs receipts, thus accomplishing two beneficial results at the stroke of the pen—increasing the Government's revenues and decreasing the people's tax burdens. This is an ideal result of the "science of public wealth," which is a very good definition of political economy.

It is absurd for Senators to stand here arguing now as a fault against the Democratic Party that there was a reduction of customs receipts, when we announced to the whole world that that was exactly what we intended to have, and when we put upon the bill an income tax estimated to raise fifty millions per year for the purpose of making up for that very decrease. We would not have been foolish enough to have taxed men's incomes just for the pleasure of taxing their incomes, of course. All taxes are necessary evils. We taxed their incomes to make up the deficit in annual receipts which had been produced knowingly and deliberately and voluntarily by ourselves. We thought the wealthy could better afford to stand an income tax than all the people—the poor included—to stand a consumption tax.

When we came to consider the entire receipts—customs, internal revenue, income, all added together, of every description—we provided plenty of revenue. Senators must know it, and the report of the Ways and Means Committee and the statements of the Senator from North Carolina amply demonstrate it. But we were providing revenue only for normal times.

Now, Senators, come along to the abnormal condition. What is the abnormal condition? We pass out of the period of peace now, when we expected and experienced a reasonable and normal reduction in customs receipts, which we were making up for by other forms of taxation which, in our opinion, were more just and equitable and equal, and less discriminating, and come to an abnormal period of abnormal loss of customs receipts—a war time. We come now to the month of August, and I will take August and September and these first days of October as the three war months.

What was the reduction of revenue during the month of July, the month immediately preceding the war, as compared with July of the year previous? Why, Mr. President, it was $4,818,000, in round numbers. If that decrease were calculated for the whole 12 months, it would have made about the fifty millions we had provided to lose on customs duties.

What was the reduction during the month of August, which was the first month of war? It was $11,500,000, in round numbers—a little less than two and a half times as much as for July.

What was the reduction in customs revenue during the second war month—September? A little bit less than the previous month. Why? Because during August Great Britain opened the channels of oceanic trade and we began at least to receive importations from those countries which were neutral or which commanded the sea, and chiefly from Great Britain herself. So in September nine and a half million dollars, in round numbers, was the reduction. Note that this is still twice the reduction of customs receipts we expected and experienced during July, the last peace month.

Then, when October came and the pressure began to be felt in the old countries and neutral ships no longer had any freight at all originating from poor, down-stricken, betrodden, and destroyed Belgium; scarcely any from France, invaded; from Germany, cut off by the British fleet from the commerce of the world; from Austria-Hungary, cut off by the British fleet from the commerce of the world; from Russia, virtually cut off from our commerce by the German fleet in the Baltic and the closure of the Bosporus by Turkey—then we find that in the first eight days of that month the decreases of receipts were one million and a quarter dollars more than they were for the whole of the peace month of July, or $5,050,044 for the former as compared with $4,818,189 for the latter month.

But Senators needed no figures for this. Everybody knew this had to happen, or something very like this. The American people need no figures to demonstrate this natural, necessary consequence of a known great war factor. The American people are not fools, though sometimes, for a short while, they act like they were. Once, I remember, they were convinced that an American import or tariff tax law was passed 14 months after a world panic had caused the world panic; they were fools enough to let men whose interest it was to persuade them to believe this folly, to keep them persuaded of it for several years; and for a little while it did look, judging by that experience, as if they might be persuaded of any foolish proposition that it was to anybody's business or political interest to broach for popular consumption. They are now happily cured of that and some other like delusions. They are not such fools as to be persuaded by anybody, not even by the men who persuaded them of this other folly, that when all of Germany's varied products, all the things that "are made in Germany"—the German wines and the German beer, the German beet-root sugar, Nuremberg toys, German cloths and cutlery; everything that came to us from Germany—are cut off from us, except to the limited degree that we can yet find them stored up in neutral warehouses or bought by British and American consignees and not yet delivered, but deliverable soon after the war—when we are deprived of all that, that we could be deprived of it without a loss of revenue from taxes upon imports.

One of the very worst things about a tariff tax, one of the things which makes it the most unreliable of all taxes, one of the the things which makes it that which no Government ought ever to resort to as a fiscal reliance, is that just when you need money most the tariff taxes fail. If you are thrown into a great war stress and strain for your own life, if the peoples who surround you are thrown into stress and strain to save their lives, then, just when your Government needs money most, imports fall off, rates remaining the same, and receipts at the Treasury become less. It is a tax upon which you can not rely except in times of peace and prosperity and industrial progress.

Let the Senator turn to the great annual reports of imports from little Belgium. Let him see how that busy little hive of industry made things that came to us every day across the sea. Then let him reflect that Louvain has been destroyed; that Antwerp has just been burned up and captured; that Brussels is held in the clutch of an enemy; that Ostend is threatened; that the great manufacturing town of Liege, from which we received so many things, has been stricken from the map! When the Senator remembers France, the wines of Burgundy and the wines of Bordeaux, the silks and the velvets, the faience articles, the many beautiful things upon which France impressed her taste and sent to the world, and chiefly to rich America, and when he remembers the condition she is in today, with her workingmen in the field, her cities being balloon bombed, her fields and factories devastated and burned, her peasantry driven away, her factory hands in arms, it surely should require no figures to tell the Senators from Kansas or from Utah or from Michigan why some of our importations had ceased and why some of the customs revenues had been cut off.

Then, if the Senators had but remembered the wines and the beers of Bohemia, the sparkling red wines of Hungary, the chemicals and the dyestuffs of Austria-Hungary as well as of Germany, and then if he had thought of the glassware and table plate and articles de luxe, as they are called, that are made in Vienna and imported into this country, and had remembered that there was a British fleet between them and the American market, he would not have had much occasion to demand that we resort to figures in order to know why and how and in what customs receipts would be knocked down very largely.

What are Senators trying to do? Here not long ago the aged Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] was sitting there in his place and something was said about this war, and I said, amongst other things, that I feared the time would come when men on that side of the Chamber might attempt to attribute some of these deficits in our trade and misfortunes caused by it to "the Democratic tariff bill." He shook his head in the negative, and I said I was glad to notice it. Now it is being done, not by him, however, who is your leader, but by others.

Of course this entire hundred million dollars is not required for the decreased collections of the months of August and September and these few days of October; but Lord Kitchener is of the opinion that the war will go on for three years. I know nothing about it, nor do the balance of us know anything about it. I think from the length of time that the Battle of the Aisne has lasted and the manner in which like bulldogs they fly at one another's throats and hold their grip and refuse to let loose, each man, whether Scotchman or Englishman or Welshman or Frenchman or Belgian, believing that the very life of their nation and their nationality and their civilization are at stake—little Belgium knowing that hers is, indeed has about been extinguished—we must agree that Lord Kitchener's estimate is not an unreasonable one. So, we have attempted to provide for what we think would be the deficit through an entire year, and it will not be astonishing if we shall after that have to provide more.

Mr. President, war is not like it used to be. In the old times when Napoleon went all over Europe with his army the army was what fought. Now, except in Great Britain and America, the whole people are levied en masse for the fight. In the old times Napoleon made France prosper during his wars by keeping all her industries at work, seeing that the workmen who had given France a reputation all over the world for articles of luxury and taste kept up the old French reputation, and these very French goods were smuggled to the English dutchesses and ladies of the court and to the American people at Baltimore and New York.

But to-day it is the people who go to war. It is not only the peasant in the field who goes, leaving his wife to take his place at the plow or the hoe. It is the workmen in the factories, and their wives and children must take their places or they must be left untaken and production paralyzed. It is the man who drives the Paris omnibus, and his wife is driving it now in his stead. So it is all over the world.

This is going to be worse, both for them and for us, than it is to-day, gentlemen. It is not without warning that the decrease in receipts for the first eight days in this month of October should be over half what it was for the whole month of September, and a million and more than what it was for the peace month of July. Notice how it is growing in geometrical proportion, a decrease amounting to over 50 per cent during the first eight days of October of that of the entire month of September. It is not a time for little quibbling about taxes.

Besides that, in a great, rich, prosperous country like this what do we, what have we, put these taxes on? We put them on your beer, for one thing. Who will pay it? It is doubtful if anybody will. The brewer will not. If he did, he is able to do it. He is the richest man in America, as a rule. If you go to Chicago, Buffalo, or New York, or anywhere, the first great villa that is pointed out to you is apt to be that of a brewer. If you ask whose it is, the answer is, 'Mr. So-and-so's." "What is his business?" "He is a brewer." But he will not pay it. Who will pay it—the retail liquor dealer? No; he will do what he did during the Spanish-American War. He will simply put a little more froth, a little less beer, into a glass. Then you can take your choice. You can either consume less beer, and consuming less of it will hardly hurt you, or you can take a few more glasses in order to get your allotment of alcohol; and if so, in that case you, the consumer, will, it is true, pay it; but you will probably stick to your allotted number of glasses, costing you the same money, and burdening your stomach and bladder with less beer and more froth.

Is the slight tax upon rectified whisky going to hurt anybody anywhere particularly, except these great rectifiers, who are able to bear it and whose business, moreover, is not altogether healthful for the human nerves and stomach?

There is not an item in this revenue bill that is going to be burdensome by taxing a necessity of life or coming oppressively to bear on a poor man. The Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] was somewhat right when he said that Mr. Dingley had a very good head for levying taxes. When Mr. Dingley levied the war revenue of 1898 he levied perhaps one of the least oppressive war taxes ever levied. But I, at the other end of the Capitol, voted against it for one, because I thought there was a lot of Government money that was out deposited in the banks at that time without interest which ought to be drawn in. I am opposed to drawing that money in now, because we are in a totally different condition.

The Spanish-American War, in so far as it was a disturbance of the American people or of American industries, was hardly a zephyr in a May month as compared with a December storm off the coast of Newfoundland. Except a few of our brave boys who were killed and wounded and the few who died in camp, it hardly meant anything to American life at all. The cotton men in one State in the South have suffered already in two months and less than a half more than all Americans suffered, financially and industrially, from the whole Spanish-American War.

Do gentlemen expect the American people to believe that there would not be a deficiency of revenue from importations during this time which threatens and impoverishes everybody abroad who ever sold us goods? Do gentlemen expect the American people to believe that, no matter what were the normal decreases of revenue from customs under our bill as compared with the revenues from customs under theirs, that this bill is not necessary because of the still further increase of reductions because of the war?

Gentlemen stand up here and say to the country, "This is a lie; this is but a pretense; it is not war revenue at all. It is a normal deficiency in a normal time owing to a bad Democratic law." Suppose you could prove that—folly and false both as it is—would it not be clearly still—and, indeed, a fortiori—our duty to go ahead and provide this revenue? But you can not prove it, because it is not true. Take the entire revenue from all sources, and we had enough annual revenue under our bill in normal times to provide for our revenue necessities in normal times. There were some of our new sources of revenue this year barely gotten into working order which will next year yield three or more times as much as they did this year—income taxes and other things.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] refers in touching words to the condition of Belgium, which, of course, appeals to all, and he cites that condition as an evidence that the importations to our country from Belgium have declined, which I am prepared, of course, to admit. The same is doubtless true as from Germany, and probably as from France; but what I have been endeavoring to get the authors of this bill to submit to the Senate is a statement showing the amount of the decline in importations from those countries engaged in the war, not any general, sentimental discussion of the conditions in Europe, horrible as they are. This is a revenue measure; this is a bill which proposes to levy a tax of more than $100,000,000 on the American people upon the alleged ground that the war in Europe has resulted in that much of a decline in our revenues.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That it will result in that much.

Mr. BRISTOW. Yes; that it will result in that much. What I have been endeavoring to get submitted to the Senate is a statement of the amount of revenues so affected from the countries involved—a comparison between this year and previous years, so as to demonstrate whether the basis upon which the allegation is made is sound.

Then I call attention, again, to another feature of the condition of the Treasury, and that is that while there has been a marked decline in the amount collected upon importations there has been an increase in the amount collected from internal revenue, which to my mind demonstrates that while we may be importing less of the beer from Germany, to which the Senator from Mississippi referred, or less of the wines from France, the American consumer of these French and German products is using the products of his own country, and that is increasing the amount of taxes collected from internal revenue.

I should like for the Senator from North Carolina or any other member of the majority party, which is responsible for this measure, to submit to the Senate concrete and definite facts, not to indulge in sentimental and eloquent dissertations upon the condition in Europe. This is a practical question in finance. Let us know what has been our loss because of the war, as near as it can be intelligently ascertained, and then if we need additional taxes I will join with the Senators on the other side to levy them.

I will say in passing that I believe that what taxes are levied should be levied upon beer and alcoholic spirits. I believe it is an equitable tax. I believe it can be imposed with as little burden as any other kind of a tax. It is my opinion, if we can get definite and specific information, which is available, it will be found that all the taxes needed for the revenues that have been lost can be easily met by the taxes on the beer and whiskies referred to by the Senator from Mississippi, and these other burdensome taxes will not be necessary to impose.

Mr. SIMMONS rose.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I think if the Senator will——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kansas yield, and to whom?

Mr. BRISTOW. I yield first to the Senator from Mississippi, and then to the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I think, in view of the interruption of our commerce, if this war tax is laid, the chances are we will have less money than we need rather than more.

Mr. BRISTOW. But I call the attention of the Senator to a fact he will at once recognize, that the amount of revenue collected last year during the first eight days of October was abnormally large, because it was on the 4th day of October that the tariff bill became effective, and the goods that had been stored in bond waiting for that law to become effective were then drawn out, and that resulted, as the Senator will remember, in a greater increased collection at that time.

To make a comparison of those days is not a fair comparison. It is better to make the comparison since the war began. The Senator will find, then, that there is not this abnormal increase, but that, as a matter of fact, since England has cleared the seas and all neutral commerce and commerce with England and France has been restored the decrease is not growing greater, but possibly less.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Very frankly I will say there is some reason in the argument made by the Senator from Kansas as regards the first four days of the month of October and not the whole eight. It may be true that that particular eight days is a little bit out of keeping with what it would have been but for what happened before; but even if you discount that and allow for it, it still shows an immense decrease of revenue as compared with the month immediately preceding.

Mr. BRISTOW. I admit it shows a decrease, but the legitimate amount of the decrease that can be attributed to the war is what I am contending for. My contention is that we are undertaking to raise more revenue than is needed, more revenue than the facts demonstrate is needed, and that we can cut out a lot of these special taxes that are not necessary and that ought to be cut out.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

Mr. BRISTOW. I yield to the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator said a few moments ago that there had been an increase this year in internal-revenue taxes. I think in that statement the Senator is correct, so far as the tax upon whisky is concerned. There has been for the last month, probably for six weeks, a very considerable increase in the amount realized from the tax on whisky. The reason of that is very apparent. The whisky manufacturers anticipated that we would possibly impose a tax upon whisky and they at once began to draw whisky from the bonded warehouses. They have drawn during the last six weeks an abnormal amount of whisky from the warehouses. There has been an increase, as the Senator says, from that source; but there has been a very great decrease during the last two months in the internal-revenue taxes derived from beer. I do not know what the cause of that has been; but, as a matter of fact, there have been in the last two months a million and a half barrels less beer consumed than during the same period of time in the last fiscal year. So the loss from the beer tax and the gain from the whisky tax pretty much offset each other.

Mr. BRISTOW. But the Treasury Department's statement shows——

Mr. SIMMONS. A slight excess.

Mr. BRISTOW. I think something over $9,000,000, was it not?

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator is entirely mistaken about that; but I am not able to give the figures.

Mr. BRISTOW. I have not examined the figures.

Mr. SIMMONS. There has been an increase in whisky and there has been something over a million and a half decrease in beer.

Mr. BRISTOW. The statement of the Treasury Department shows that it is not as much as I thought, but it is an increase of approximately $4,000,000 this year.

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes; and a loss of a million and a half in beer.

Mr. BRISTOW. I do not know what particular item the loss would be on.

Mr. SIMMONS. That was temporary; that was caused by the withdrawals in anticipation of a possible tax.

Mr. BRISTOW. That has been going on during the entire year. If the Senator will notice the Treasury statement month by month, he will see that there has been a greater increase in the internal revenue collected.

Mr. SIMMONS. There has been for some years some increase in the receipts from internal revenue. I remember that we admitted that there would be an increase, because there had been a gradual increase for quite a number of years back.

I will say to the Senator that I have here a statement prepared for me by the actuary of the Treasury, giving an estimate of United States revenues from customs duties on European merchandise entering the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915. He gives the revenues received last year from each of the countries of Europe and the estimated amount that will be received this year. He estimates that as against $177,800,000 last year the receipts this year will be only $71,870,000, making a total decrease of $105,930,000.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I ask the Senator right there whether the actuary gives that by months?

Mr. SIMMONS. No; he merely gives it by the year.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. He does not give the figures, we will say, of the month of January of this year and of the month of January of last year?

Mr. SIMMONS. I can furnish the figures to the Senator.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. That, I understand, is the whole gist of the inquiry of the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. SIMMONS. I have already given the total loss actually sustained.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. But the inquiry of the Senator from Kansas is—I was very much interested in it, because I think it is very pertinent to the discussion of this bill—to find out what had been the decrease from each of the countries in Europe from which we get such large importations.

Mr. SIMMONS. I think I can get that. Those figures can be easily obtained from the Treasury.

As I have said, there have been decreases from probably other countries besides those of Europe, which are affected just as we are affected by the results of the war; but I think it will probably be an easy matter to segregate the figures from the European countries from the decrease from other countries, and I shall be very glad to do it.

Mr. BRISTOW. Of course it may take some time to get the information; but I want to call the Senator's attention to another condition. During the first month of the European war there was doubtless a decrease of exportations from England, because England's commerce was seriously interfered with; there was a general blockade; but after England's commerce had been restored to normal conditions, as it now is, that would not be the case. I was talking with a very large exporter today, who told me that they were suffering no inconvenience except in their exportations to Germany; that they could not get into Germany; but that their exportations to France and to England and their commerce with those countries was not now disturbed—that it was practically normal. So I think we should have a detailed statement, month by month, from each of the countries. In my opinion it would show that we are rapidly approaching normal commercial conditions with England, and possibly with France.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, there is not any question that England will become a great importer of products of other countries in order to supply her domestic demands, but that there will be no disturbance of English commerce and that there has not been up to this time is wholly unsustained by the facts and by reason.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, in the report made by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] from the Committee on Finance, in which he adopts the report of the House of Representatives upon this bill, I notice that the members of the committee on the part of the House claim—and the Senator reporting the bill has adopted their figures—that the estimated falling off of customs revenues during the next 12 months because of the European war is as follows:

Estimated falling off in customs revenue during the next 12 months because of the European war.

Countries.	Dutiable imports, value 1914.	Estimated falling off in revenues during next 12 months.
Austria-Hungary	$15,232,645	$5,267,000
Belgium	21,324,417	5,398,000
France	95,445,062	35,566,000
Germany	119,383,978	38,683,000
Russia in Europe	2,420,602	242,000
Servia and Montenegro	9,627	2,000
United Kingdom	132,173,220	40,653,000
Total	385,989,551	125,811,000

Now I turn to another part of this report, Mr. President——

Mr. SIMMONS. The countries whose names the Senator from Utah has read are countries engaged in war, but the Senator ought to read the notes in the report in which it is stated:

NOTE.—This estimate is made on the assumption that all imports from the European countries at war will cease during the next 12 months. The import values shown represent the dutiable articles imported during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914. The estimated falling off in revenue is computed by applying the rates of the act of 1913 to the imports for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, that does not change the point to which I wanted to call the attention of the Senate. The estimated falling off of the customs revenues during the next 12 months of the European war from those countries is, according to that estimate, $125,811,000. On another page of the same report I find this statement:

The countries now at war comprise Austria-Hungary, Belgium, France, Germany, Japan, Russia, Servia and Montenegro, and the United Kingdom of Great Britain. If it were not for war conditions and the amount of imports had remained the same as those of last year, the customs taxes levied by the present tariff act from said countries would have yielded $133,079,000.

In other words, Mr. President, the proposition on which we are basing the advisability of the passage of this bill is that all of the revenue collected from all of the countries now engaged in war will cease and that we are not going to receive any revenue from those countries, with perhaps the exception of the difference between $125,811,000 and $133,079,000.

Mr. President, such a proposition is ridiculous; in fact, we have already received in the few months during which the war has been going on more than the estimate for the full 12 months. Is there any reason for seeking to impose a burden of $100,000,000 upon the backs of the American people upon such a proposition? I think, Mr. President, it should not be done or even considered.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, the Senator read the table, but failed to read the note which I have read, and then failed to read the next observation in the report, in which it is stated:

It must be borne in mind that the above estimates are based on the assumption that all imports from the countries at war will cease. It seems certain that the imports of some articles will continue and that the falling off in customs revenue will not be greater than $100,000,000.

Mr. SMOOT. Well, Mr. President, in that connection——

Mr. SIMMONS. Just a moment; let me finish. I have just stated that the statement from which the Senator has read refers only to the seven countries now engaged in war in Europe. The estimate which I hold in my hand, and to which I referred a little while ago, refers to all of the countries of Europe, and from it, as I said a little while ago, it will appear that our revenues from imports from those countries last year were $177,800,000. It is estimated that we will receive during this fiscal year from those countries about $71,000,000.

Mr. SMOOT. This report does not so show, and I——

Mr. SIMMONS. It refers to only a part of the countries from which we receive imports.

Mr. SMOOT. I want to say to the Senator, that if all of the receipts from all of the countries engaged in war are entirely eliminated and not a dollar comes from them, there is not a country outside of the war zone that will not import more goods into the United States than they have imported in the past. China will do so, Japan will do so, and every country that has free access to the ocean will do so; and I say it is not right to load this burden of taxation upon the American people, especially upon the pretext that is being made for doing it. Why not come out openly and say that from now on the revenues will not be sufficient to pay for the enormous appropriations which have been made for the present fiscal year? Why not admit that, and why not cease to try to deceive the American people? You may deceive them temporarily, and you may be successful in doing so for a year or two, but the deception will come home to plague you just as surely as the sun will rise to-morrow morning.

Mr. SHEPPARD obtained the floor.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I yield.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, when the Senator from Utah says that we are simply levying this tax for the purpose of meeting the enormous appropriations that we have made this year, I want to say to him what I have said before, that the appropriations which were made last year were met by the receipts of our tariff law, and there was, besides, a surplus of $34,000,000. The appropriations for this year, made up to this time—and I think we have about finished making appropriations—are only $11,000,000 more than those made last year; and hence there is no enormous appropriation to be met during the next fiscal year that we did not meet during the last fiscal year, when we had a surplus of $34,000,000, after we had paid the amounts appropriated.

The Senator says, and I am amazed at his statement, that, instead of importations to this country falling off as a result of the war, they will increase. He says they will increase from China and that they will increase from Japan. The Senator knows that Japan, as well as England, is at war; the Senator knows that the industries of China are affected by the war, because the war is rapidly becoming one of invasion into the territory of China; the Senator knows that we are not the only country in the world that has been affected by the war; he knows that, as a result of the war, Brazil has had her industries prostrated.

Mr. KERN. And Switzerland.

Mr. SIMMONS. Brazil, thousands of miles away from the zone of war, has been affected worse than we have been affected. Her factories, such as she has, have closed to a large extent; moratoriums have been declared; interest has gone up in that country to 17 per cent; there is stagnation in business; and yet the Senator tells us, with the world affected, with industries crippled, with business stagnated, with finances deranged, that we may expect greater importations from those countries than we have had heretofore. I tell the Senator that there is going to be a falling off in importations to this country from most of the countries from which we have been receiving imports.

Mr. SMOOT. I have not said that there would not be.

Mr. SIMMONS. I tell the Senator that when he states here that, as a result of war conditions in Europe, there is not going to be a serious falling off in the revenue, amounting almost to a total cessation of revenues in the case of some countries in Europe, he is making a statement which the facts do not warrant.

Mr. SMOOT. I have made no such statement.

Mr. SIMMONS. I want to know how the Senator believes that it is possible for Belgium, in the condition described so eloquently and so forcefully by the Senator from Mississippi, to make and send us the $42,000,000 of imports from which we have been receiving $5,000,000 or $6,000,000 annually through the customhouse?

Mr. SMOOT. Belgium is involved in the war.

Mr. SIMMONS. Belgium not involved in the war! Belgium, so far as her industries are concerned, Mr. President, is more affected by the war than any other country in Europe.

Mr. GORE. The Senator from Utah said Belgium was involved in the war.

Mr. SIMMONS. Then I misunderstood the Senator; I thought he said she was not involved in the war, and I was not particularly surprised when I understood the Senator to say that, because some of his other statements, I think, have been just about as far from the mark as that would have been.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from Utah is a little more careful in his remarks in the Senate than is the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator may think so, but I do not think that is the judgment of other people. That is doubtless his judgment about the matter, and I will let him have his way about it. But, Mr. President, does the Senator mean to contend that we have a right to expect anything of consequence in the way of imports from France, a country from which we received last year imports amounting to $141,000,000? Will the Senator tell the Senate who is going to produce the products which France sent us last year? Will the Senator tell us who is going to produce the products which Germany sent us last year? Will the Senator tell us who is going to produce the products which Austria and Russia sent us last year? Unless the factories of those countries are running, unless the production is in excess of the domestic demand, the Senator knows there will be no imports from those countries, and the Senator knows that under the conditions that they have there—exceptional, abnormal, unique in the history of the world, where nations are struggling for the fate of their empires, where every able-bodied man is called to arms, where nobody is left to run the factories except the women and the children—the Senator knows that under those conditions they will do well, and mighty well at that, if they succeed in making enough to supply their own demand, to say nothing about a surplus to send to the other countries of the world.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from North Carolina has built a straw man and then has proceeded to demolish him. The Senator from Utah was very particular in saying that the importations from countries not involved in war would increase; and every country that the Senator speaks of, with the exception of Japan, is involved in war. There is no one who does not know that England is controlling the sea with her immense navy. There is no one who does not know that the shipping from England and France to the United States or to any other country is just as free as it was before war was declared. There is no one who does not know that the shipping of Japan is open. There is no one who does not know that she can ship to this country now, without molestation, anything that may be ordered from her by anyone in this country.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. SMOOT. In just a moment.

Mr. President, according to the report made by the committee the countries involved in this war shipped goods to this country from which there was a customs revenue of $133,079,000, and I challenge any Senator here to say that there will not be more than $8,000 revenue to this Government for 12 months from those countries. Any such statement will not be true, for it has already received more than that—many, many times more.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Will the Senator permit, just here——

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senator will restrain his impatience for just a minute, I am going to take my seat.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I do not want to drive the Senator to his seat.

Mr. SMOOT. I shall not be five minutes more.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. All right.

Mr. SMOOT. I also want to say to the Senator that it is quarter to 6 now, and I have been speaking a good deal to-day, and I am a little tired.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I only wanted to say, just at this point——

Mr. SMOOT. I want to get through, and then the Senator can take whatever time he desires to take.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I have no desire to make any extended remarks on the matter. I simply wanted to correct a statement that the Senator made which I think was rather extravagant. He said that England was just as free to ship now as ever. I hold in my hand a statement published monthly by the National Banking Co., of Newark, N. J. They are considered great authority, and apropos of the particular remark of the Senator that England is just as free as ever to ship goods to this country, it says here:

> The trade of every country in the world shows decreases. The figures for England, which have just come to hand, show a decrease in imports during August of this year of 24.3 per cent as compared with August of last year; and the exports of England for the same month show a decrease of 45.1 per cent as compared with last year.

So that England can not be just as free as ever to ship, and we can not receive imports if England can not export; and how, in God's name, are we to derive revenue under those circumstances?

Mr. SMOOT. The report from which the Senator has read was for the month of August.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Yes.

Mr. SMOOT. That was when the war first began; that was before England got her navy into action; that was before she had destroyed the merchant ships of Germany and of Austria; that was before she had driven from all the oceans of the world ships that were owned and controlled by her foes. But to-day is the 12th day of October, and I am really surprised that the Senator from New Jersey should say that there is the least danger in shipping a cargo from any port in the United States to any port in England.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I think if I were a shipper I would consider it quite dangerous to export a cargo, even in the face of the statement of the Senator from Utah. Shipping across the Atlantic is very different from shipping across the quiet waters of Salt Lake.

Mr. SMOOT. The business men are not alarmed about shipping goods to England, and there is no necessity for alarm, because England has bottled up the navies of Germany and Austria. As far as those navies are concerned, they might just as well be off of the ocean; and the shipping outside of the nations involved in the war is going on as usual. I do not say they are exporting as much. Of course, England would not export as much. I do not say England has imported as much. It would be nonsense for anyone even to think of such a thing. What I have said I say because the facts bear me out.

I do not want to make a single statement here that could be questioned in the least, and I am so careful of the figures I quote here that I am not content with having them submitted to me by a man in the Treasury Department. I do not use them until after I have checked every one of them myself. It may be, perhaps, with the mass of figures that are quoted here, that even then there may sometimes be a statement that would need revising, but very, very seldom. If I can not defend the principles of my party with truth and with facts I shall never try to defend them.

I do not think it is necessary, at this late hour of the day, to say more upon this particular point.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, one word before the Senator sits down, if he will pardon me. I hope it is clear that the estimate made here by the House committee is that this bill will bring in one hundred millions, or perhaps a little less; and that the remarks at the bottom of the table, to which the Senator called attention, show that they first gave all of the duties collected upon imports from those several countries, and gave them at $100,000,000, or whatever they were——

Mr. SMOOT. One hundred and twenty-five million dollars.

Mr. WILLIAMS. One hundred and twenty-five million and something, and then added below: "But it is not expected that all imports from these countries will cease," and then they put their estimate at one hundred million. So they provide for a continuance of $25,000,000 of duties, which would mean a continuance of about three times that amount in value of goods.

Mr. SMOOT. Why, certainly; and I want to say to the Senator from Mississippi that there have been more goods than that imported into the United States from those countries since the war began. So that the estimate was based upon 12 months; and I think the Senator from Mississippi will agree with me that the estimate there is not well taken, based upon the importations already made.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I agree with the Senator thus far—that the importations from these several countries, even after the war began, continued for a time, because many of the goods were in neutral storehouses. Many had been ordered and consigned and were en route and reached here; but I suppose they made the estimate upon the basis of the 12 months and upon the assumption that a little over one-quarter of the revenue would continue to be collected. At least that is what they say.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I want to ask if we can not take a vote upon the first section of the bill to-night?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I do not think there will be any question about it in the morning, but I should not like to suggest the absence of a quorum and take up that time to-night. I ask the Senator to lay the bill aside, and we will take it up the first thing in the morning.

THE COTTON INDUSTRY.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I present a letter from Hon. R. L. HENRY, addressed to Hon. William G. McAdoo, Secretary of the Treasury, acknowledging the receipt of his letter of October 9, and replying thereto, relative to relief for cotton growers in the South. I ask that the letter may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

OCTOBER 12, 1914.

Hon. WILLIAM G. MCADOO,
Secretary of the Treasury, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: I beg to acknowledge receipt of your letter of October 9.

1. In reply I still insist that you have the indisputable right under section 5153, Revised Statutes, to deposit public moneys in the national banks throughout the South in any manner you may deem "equitable" to the extent of the funds in your hands or that may be supplied you by congressional action. It would not, under the present law, be "inequitable" for you to deposit in the national banks of the cotton and tobacco States $50,000,000 of the $74,000,000 now due the Treasury.

You deposited $50,000,000 for crop-moving purposes in the agricultural States last year and with justifiable pride flaunted the fact in the faces of the New York bankers, coupled with the statement that if said New York bankers menaced the money market you would cause $500,000,000 additional under the Aldrich-Vreeland Act to be taken out by the banks in the Southern States to thwart the menaces of the bankers in money centers. You were right then, and you would be right again to pursue the same course even if you had to use the just and influential prestige of your high office to induce Congress to furnish you with all the public moneys you need for the present crisis, which far surpasses our difficulties last year.

I still maintain that if you will announce to the world in a ringing proclamation that as Secretary of the Treasury you propose to use the public moneys on hand and to be secured by prompt and adequate legislation, to the extent of any number of millions of dollars necessary for the purpose of saving our cotton crop from sacrifice, you will avert the calamity now overhanging the South from the paralyzed market. Such an announcement by you and the President of the Republic will set at naught the greed and defiance of the spinners, bankers, and speculators in cotton. It will instantly revive our prostrated market throughout the earth.

2. You assert your disinclination to sell Panama Canal bonds or to issue additional United States notes. You doubt that you can sell Panama Canal bonds. Permit me to remind you that I now have in my hands a special rule to bring up for consideration the Alexander bill, "to purchase, construct, equip, maintain, and operate merchant vessels in the foreign trade of the United States," etc. And you not only request the immediate appropriation of $10,000,000 from the Treasury, but in addition provide that you be allowed to call into requisition the acts authorizing Panama Canal bonds, and that you be empowered to "issue and sell or use for such purchase or construction" any of those bonds now available "to a total amount not to exceed $30,000,000." It will convince you, as well as the simplest mind, to merely state that if you can find purchasers of those bonds for the purchase of the Government merchant ships you can easily sell the same bonds to save our cotton crop already produced, and thus avert the impending bankruptcy hanging over the 30,000,000 of people in the South. The President and yourself have asked Congress to pass this ship-purchase bill. Hence I maintain that if you will come to Congress and urge that you be given power to sell Panama Canal bonds at a higher rate of interest, if necessary, and to issue "United States notes" in sufficient amounts to be deposited as "public moneys" in the banks of the South to save our cotton crop, already grown in this temporary war crisis brought on by the appalling conditions in Europe, you will find a quick response on our part. Will you do this to save our southern people through this feasible and perfectly constitutional plan? My deliberate judgment is again reiterated that you should not hesitate a moment.

Third. You further say, "Since the 1st of August there has been issued to the national banks in the Southern States, including Missouri and Maryland, $68,000,000 of additional bank currency. The national banks in those States may, by complying with the law, receive $151,443,000 of additional national-bank currency." Then, after taking note of certain public deposits already in those States and additional national-bank circulation issued since the beginning of the European war, you add: "And there is available to the national banks in the Southern States, upon their compliance with the law, additional national-bank currency amounting in the aggregate to $151,000,000."

Again permit me to suggest that all this "additional currency" has not reached the distressed cotton producer. You will instantly recall that you have just finished a brave fight against the banks for "hoarding" their currency and unjustly monopolizing it and preventing it from going into the hands of the farmers. You have admitted, and must again admit, that a very small per cent of this additional money reached the farmers. Hence it failed in its purpose. The banks "hoarded" it, and by defying your ambition to get it into the possession of the farmers diverted it from the intended course and used it in their own business. So even you are brought by logic and fact to the conviction that the Aldrich-Vreeland Act in this emergency has proved to be nothing less than a huge farce and comes dangerously near being a fraud on the rights of the people and the Government.

Fourth. Again you say, "Moreover, existing law authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury, in his discretion, to issue more than $1,000,000,000 of currency to the national banks throughout the country. * * * I am firmly convinced that neither additional nor unlimited issues of paper money will help the cotton planter. I am equally convinced that the inevitable inflation which such issues would cause would hurt him and hurt the country."

Permit me to redirect your attention to the fact that you charged several weeks ago that banks were "hoarding" this currency. You have been powerless under the present law to get it to those in distress and into the real hands for whom you intended it throughout the South. You know that much of it was shipped back to the money centers to liquidate debts there. It is quite evident that under our present law the banks seem to have the power to expand and contract the currency at their will, to fix prices, depress and inflate values, affect wages and all property; and yet with all this "inflation" pointed out in your letter to me the money has not reached the people in localities where it is to-day needed. Something is wrong with the law or system in this crisis, or you would have been able with your known courage and ability to drive some of this vast amount of boasted new currency into the hands of the cotton and tobacco farmers.

Undoubtedly you need help from Congress, and you should come and aid those of us in that body ambitious to do this work right, in order to secure "public moneys," that will certainly go into the depositaries of the South, to become absolutely available to the farmers upon fixed conditions.

Yes; I think and deliberately reassert that you must issue Treasury notes or sell Panama Canal bonds or other bonds, or both, in order to get the money into the hands of the producers, through the instrumentality of the banks as fiscal agents, at a low rate of interest, upon terms and conditions fixed by law. If you do not do this, the banks will continue to defy and thwart your will; and you must agree they have been doing that for more than 60 days.

Fifth. Finally you present this point to me: "Is it wise to issue $400,000,000 of Government bonds and greenbacks merely to lend on cotton? Tobacco, naval stores, copper, silver, lumber, and other things have been hurt by the European war. All have applied to the Treasury for relief. If we disregard every suffering interest except cotton and make it the sole beneficiary of governmental favor, what becomes of the Democratic principle, 'Equal rights for all, special privileges for none'?"

You must allow me here to mention the "direct loan" of $1,400,000 you recently found and inspired for Tennessee. Perhaps I can afford to call it a "directed loan," and solve the very slender doubt in your favor, inasmuch as the papers indicated that you "directed" Senator LEA and Secretary Snead to the National Park Bank, of New York City, where they could find $1,400,000 available to take up the notes of the State of Tennessee after you had lodged in the hands of that bank the sum of $400,000 of the "public moneys," besides other deposits going before this, so that these gentlemen would not find themselves at the end of a false rainbow when they walked through the doors of that bank and into its vaults. In old fashioned parlance, those gentlemen, in their quest of funds for distressed Tennessee, through the good offices of almost magical financiering, "found the gold at the end of the rainbow." It was not a rainbow of hope, but one of reality. I see nothing wrong or dishonorable in this loan, so efficiently directed by you according to newspaper accounts now in my hand, coupled with your letter to Maj. E. B. Stahlman.

But, Mr. Secretary, you can never convince any reasonable intellect that there is the slightest difference between the principle of that "directed loan" to Tennessee and a direct—or directed—loan through the banks of the South, as fiscal agents of the Government, to the farmer on his cotton or tobacco, at a reasonable rate of interest, of public moneys, in accordance with conditions fixed by law. The Government has as much right to fix the conditions upon which it loans its public moneys as it has to authorize the banks to loan the same funds upon conditions to be fixed by the banks themselves. There is no chance for the Government to lose a penny on cotton and tobacco. They are produced, and will be in warehouses. The principle is the same, and since you have aided in exercising it for Tennessee to save her credit you can not dispute it with the farmers of the South when they beseech you to save their purchasing power and debt-paying power through the same means.

Hence my course is fixed, and I shall go forward and contend for legislation treating the farmers of the South as we have done with Tennessee, with the Dayton banks during the great flood in Ohio, and as was done in New York during 1907, when over $40,000,000 of public moneys were deposited with the banks to relieve the stock market and finance the needs of Wall Street speculators.

Our need is overshadowing and pressing. You should join us and help to get legislation to sell the Panama Canal bonds and issue United States notes. Restrain the banks, hold them in leash, and prevent their further inflation of the currency, which is not reaching the farmers this year.

With cordial regards, I am,

Sincerely, yours,

R. L. HENRY.

ALASKA COAL LANDS (S. DOC. NO. 599).

Mr. MYERS submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 14233) to provide for the leasing of coal lands in the Territory of Alaska, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows:

In lieu of the matter proposed by the Senate insert the following:

"That the Secretary of the Interior be, and hereby is, authorized and directed to survey the lands of the United States in the Territory of Alaska known to be valuable for their deposits of coal, preference to be given first in favor of surveying lands within those areas commonly known as the Bering River, Matanuska, and Nenana coal fields, and thereafter to such areas or coal fields as lie tributary to establishments or existing or proposed rail or water transportation lines: Provided, That such surveys shall be executed in accordance with existing laws and rules and regulations governing the survey of public lands. There is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $100,000 for the purpose of making the surveys herein provided for, to continue available until expended: Provided, That any surveys heretofore made under the authority or by the approval of the Department of the Interior may be adopted and used for the purposes of this act.

"SEC. 2. That the President of the United States shall designate and reserve from use, location, sale, lease, or disposition not exceeding 5,120 acres of coal-bearing land in the Bering River field and not exceeding 7,680 acres of coal-bearing land in the Matanuska field, and not to exceed one-half of the other coal lands in Alaska: Provided, That the coal deposits in such reserved areas may be mined under the direction of the President when, in his opinion, the mining of such coal in such reserved areas, under the direction of the President, becomes necessary, by reason of an insufficient supply of coal at a reasonable price for the requirements of Government works, construction and operation of Government railroads, for the Navy, for national protection, or for relief from monopoly or oppressive conditions.

"SEC. 3. That the unreserved coal lands and coal deposits shall be divided by the Secretary of the Interior into leasing blocks or tracts of 40 acres each, or multiples thereof, and in such form as in the opinion of the Secretary will permit the most economical mining of the coal in such blocks, but in no case exceeding 2,560 acres in any one leasing block or tract; and thereafter the Secretary shall offer such blocks or tracts and the coal, lignite, and associated minerals therein for leasing, and may award leases thereof through advertisement, competitive bidding, or such other methods as he may by general regulations adopt, to any person above the age of 21 years who is a citizen of the United States, or to any association of such persons, or to any corporation or municipality organized under the laws of the United States or of any State or Territory thereof: Provided, That a majority of the stock of such corporation shall at all times be owned and held by citizens of the United States: And provided further, That no railroad or common carrier shall be permitted to take or acquire through lease or permit under this act any coal or coal lands in excess of such area or quantity as may be required and used solely for its own use, and such limitation of use shall be expressed in all leases or permits issued to railroads or common carriers hereunder: And provided further, That any person, association, or corporation qualified to become a lessee under this act and owning any pending claim under the public-land laws to any coal lands in Alaska may, within one year from the passage of this act, enter into an arrangement with the Secretary of the Interior by which such claim shall be fully relinquished to the United States; and if in the judgment of the Secretary of the Interior the circumstances connected with such claim justify so doing, the moneys paid by the claimant or claimants to the United States on account of such claim shall, by direction of the Secretary of the Interior, be returned and paid over to such person, association, or corporation as a consideration for such relinquishment.

"All claims of existing rights to any of such lands in which final proof has been submitted and which are now pending before the Commissioner of the General Land Office or the Secretary of the Interior for decision shall be adjudicated within one year from the passage of this act.

"SEC. 4. That a person, association, or corporation holding a lease of coal lands under this act may, with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, and through the same procedure and upon the same terms and conditions as in the case of an original lease under this act, secure a further or new lease covering additional lands contiguous to those embraced in the original lease, but in no event shall the total area embraced in such original and new leases exceed in the aggregate 2,560 acres.

"That upon satisfactory showing by any lessee to the Secretary of the Interior that all of the workable deposits of coal within a tract covered by his or its lease will be exhausted, worked out, or removed within three years thereafter, the Secretary of the Interior may, within his discretion, lease to such lessee an additional tract of land or coal deposits, which, including the coal area remaining in the original lease, shall not exceed 2,560 acres, through the same procedure and under the same competitive conditions as in case of an original lease.

"SEC. 5. That, subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, lessees holding under leases small blocks or areas may consolidate their said leases or holdings so as to include in a single holding not to exceed 2,560 acres of contiguous lands.

"SEC. 6. That each lease shall be for such leasing block or tract of land as may be offered or applied for, not exceeding in area 2,560 acres of land, to be described by the subdivisions of the survey, and no person, association, or corporation, except as hereinafter provided, shall be permitted to take or hold any interest as a stockholder or otherwise in more than one such lease under this act, and any interest held in violation of this proviso shall be forfeited to the United States by appropriate proceedings instituted by the Attorney General for that purpose in any court of competent jurisdiction, except that any such ownership and interest hereby forbidden which may be acquired by descent, will, judgment, or decree may be held for two years, and not longer, after its acquisition.

"SEC. 7. That any person who shall purchase, acquire, or hold any interest in two or more such leases, except as herein provided, or who shall knowingly purchase, acquire, or hold any stock in a corporation having an interest in two or more such leases, or who shall knowingly sell or transfer to one disqualified to purchase, or except as in this act specifically provided, disqualified to acquire, any such interest, shall be deemed guilty of a felony, and upon conviction shall be punished by imprisonment for not more than three years and by a fine not exceeding $1,000: Provided, That any such ownership and interest hereby forbidden which may be acquired by descent, will, judgment, or decree may be held two years after its acquisition and not longer, and in case of minority or other disability such time as the court may decree.

"SEC. 8. That any director, trustee, officer, or agent of any corporation holding any interest in such a lease who shall, on behalf of such corporation, act in the purchase of any interest in another lease, or, who shall knowingly act on behalf of such corporation in the sale or transfer of any such interest in any lease held by such corporation to any corporation or individual holding any interest in any such a lease, except as herein provided, shall be guilty of a felony and shall be subject to imprisonment for a term of not exceeding three years and a fine of not exceeding $1,000.

"SEC. 8a. If any of the lands or deposits leased under the provisions of this act shall be subleased, trusteed, possessed, or controlled by any device permanently, temporarily, directly, indirectly, tacitly, or in any manner whatsoever, so that they form part of or are in anywise controlled by any combination in the form of an unlawful trust, with consent of lessee, or form the subject of any contract or conspiracy in restraint of trade in the mining or selling of coal, entered into by the lessee, or of any holding of such lands by any individual, partnership, association, corporation, or control, in excess of 2,560 acres in the Territory of Alaska, the lease thereof shall be forfeited by appropriate court proceedings.

"SEC. 9. That for the privilege of mining and extracting and disposing of the coal in the lands covered by his lease the lessee shall pay to the United States such royalties as may be specified in the lease, which shall not be less than 2 cents per ton, due and payable at the end of each month succeeding that of the shipment of the coal from the mine, and an annual rental, payable at the beginning of each year, on the lands covered by such lease, at the rate of 25 cents per acre for the first year thereafter, 50 cents per acre for the second, third, fourth, and fifth years, and $1 per acre for each and every year thereafter during the continuance of the lease, except that such rental for any year shall be credited against the royalties as they accrue for that year. Leases may be for periods of not more than 50 years each, subject to renewal, on such terms and conditions as may be authorized by law at the time of such renewal. All net profits from operation of Government mines, and all royalties and rentals under leases as herein provided, shall be deposited in the Treasury of the United States in a separate and distinct fund to be applied to the reimbursement of the Government of the United States on account of any expenditures made in the construction of railroads in Alaska, and the excess shall be deposited in the fund known as the Alaska fund, established by the act of Congress of January 27, 1905, to be expended as provided in said last-mentioned act.

"SEC. 10. That in order to provide for the supply of strictly local and domestic needs for fuel the Secretary of the Interior may, under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe in advance, issue to any applicant qualified under section 3 of this act a limited license or permit granting the right to prospect for, mine, and dispose of coal belonging to the United States on specified tracts not to exceed 10 acres to any one person or association of persons in any one coal field for a period of not exceeding 10 years, on such conditions not inconsistent with this act as in his opinion will safeguard the public interest, without payment of royalty for the coal mined or for the land occupied: Provided, That the acquisition or holding of a lease under the preceding sections of this act shall be no bar to the acquisition, holding, or operating under the limited license in this section permitted. And the holding of such a license shall be no bar to the acquisition or holding of such a lease or interest therein.

"SEC. 11. That any lease, entry, location, occupation, or use permitted under this act shall reserve to the Government of the United States the right to grant or use such easements in, over, through, or upon the land leased, entered, located, occupied, or used as may be necessary or appropriate to the working of the same or other coal lands by or under authority of the Government and for other purposes: Provided, That said Secretary, in his discretion, in making any lease under this act, may reserve to the United States the right to lease, sell, or otherwise dispose of the surface of the lands embraced within such lease under existing law or laws hereafter enacted in so far as said surface is not necessary for use by the lessee in extracting and removing the deposits of coal therein If such reservation is made, it shall be so determined before the offering of such lease.

"That the said Secretary during the life of the lease is authorized to issue such permits for easements herein provided to be reserved, and to permit the use of such other public lands in the Territory of Alaska as may be necessary for the construction and maintenance of coal washeries or other works incident to the mining or treatment of coal, which lands may be occupied and used jointly or severally by lessees or permittees, as may be determined by said Secretary.

"SEC. 12. That no lease issued under authority of this act shall be assigned or sublet except with the consent of the Secretary of the Interior. Each lease shall contain provisions for the purpose of insuring the exercise of reasonable diligence, skill, and care in the operation of said property, and for the safety and welfare of the miners and for the prevention of undue waste, including a restriction of the workday to not exceeding eight hours in any one day for underground workers except in cases of emergency; provisions securing the workers complete freedom of purchase, requiring the payment of wages at least twice a month in lawful money of the United States, and providing proper rules and regulations to secure fair and just weighing or measurement of the coal mined by each miner, and such other provisions as are needed for the protection of the interests of the United States, for the prevention of monopoly, and for the safeguarding of the public welfare.

"SEC. 13. That the possession of any lessee of the land or coal deposits leased under this act for all purposes involving adverse claims to the leased property shall be deemed the possession of the United States, and for such purposes the lessee shall occupy the same relation to the property leased as if operated directly by the United States.

"SEC. 14. That any such lease may be forfeited and canceled by appropriate proceeding in a court of competent jurisdiction whenever the lessee fails to comply with any provision of the lease or of general regulations promulgated under this act; and the lease may provide for the enforcement of other appropriate remedies for breach of specified conditions thereof.

"SEC. 15. That on and after the approval of this act no lands in Alaska containing deposits of coal withdrawn from entry or sale shall be disposed of or acquired in any manner except as provided in this act: Provided, That the passage of this act shall not affect any proceeding now pending in the Department of the Interior, and any such proceeding may be carried to a final determination in said department notwithstanding the passage hereof: Provided further, That no lease shall be made, under the provisions hereof, of any land, a claim for which is pending in the Department of the Interior at the date of the passage of this act, until and unless such claim is finally disposed of by the department adversely to the claimant.

"SEC. 16. That all statements, representations, or reports required, unless otherwise specified, by the Secretary of the Interior under this act shall be upon oath and in such form and upon such blanks as the Secretary of the Interior may require, and any person making false oath, representation, or report shall be subject to punishment as for perjury.

"SEC. 17. That the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to prescribe the necessary and proper rules and regulations and to do any and all things necessary to carry out and accomplish the purposes of this act.

"SEC. 18. That all acts and parts of acts in conflict herewith are hereby repealed."

And the Senate agree to the same.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, our heavenly Father, we thank Thee for this beautiful day, token of Thy presence and continued care. For all the longings, hopes, and aspirations which fill our minds and hearts. Help us with renewed faith and confidence to work ever toward the higher ideals as we know them in Christ Jesus, that we may awake at last in the consciousness of our likeness to Thee and in fullness of joy hear the words, "Well done, good and faithful servant, enter thou into the joy of thy Lord." And we will ascribe all praises to Thee, for Thine is the kingdom and the power and the glory forever. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday, October 10, 1914, was read.

CORRECTION OF A VOTE.

Mr. BRUMBAUGH. Mr. Speaker, I desire to correct the RECORD and the Journal. On page 6134 of the RECORD of April 1, 1914, I am recorded as not voting. I was present at that time and voted "yea."

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the correction will be made in the Journal and in the RECORD in accordance with the statement of the gentleman from Ohio.

There was no objection.

APPROVAL OF THE JOURNAL.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I move that the Journal be approved.

The motion was agreed to.

COTTON.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit a request for unanimous consent. I ask unanimous consent that I be allowed to print in the RECORD a copy of my letter in reply to the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury. A few days ago the Secretary of the Treasury caused to have printed in the RECORD, at the request of the Senator from New Hampshire, Mr. HOLLIS, a letter to me upon the cotton and currency question, and I should like to have my reply appear in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing in the RECORD his reply to the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to obect, I want to say this: I have uniformly objected to this debate going on upon the cotton question. I had a request from the gentleman sitting on the other side of the aisle on Saturday to print the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury, and I told him that I should object to that and to all such propositions, because I believed the debate should be had here on the floor of the House, open to Members of the House, and for that reason I must object to this request.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman withhold his objection for a moment?

Mr. PAYNE. Very well.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I hope the gentleman will not object to this. I am sure he wants to uphold the dignity of the House. Inasmuch as the Senate has authorized the printing of the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury, it seems to me that a humble Member of the House ought to be permitted to print his reply, so that the membership may see his views. I am doing everything that I can to secure a vote and debate upon this question, and hope and believe that by to-morrow this matter can be presented to the House of Representatives for some sort of action. I am leaving nothing undone to bring it before the House, and if the gentleman will allow this reply to be inserted, I assure him that I will not abate my zeal in endeavoring to secure a vote. I only want my rights as a Member of the House protected. I do not think I ought to be deprived of that privilege.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] and the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] object.

Mr. TOWNER. Oh, I do not object. I only reserved the right to object for the purpose of stating that I hope that no objection will be made.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York objects.

ALASKA COAL LANDS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following communication:

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
October 8 (calendar day October 10), 1914.

Ordered, That the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 14233) to provide for the leasing of coal lands in the Territory of Alaska, and for other purposes, be recommitted to the conference committee.

Attest:

JAMES M. BAKER, Secretary.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I wish to inquire whether or not the Chair holds that the Philippine bill takes precedence over District matters to-day?

The SPEAKER. It does.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Very well.

THE PHILIPPINE ISLANDS.

The SPEAKER. Under the special rule the House will resolve itself automatically into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 18459, and in the absence of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD], the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ADAIR] will take the chair.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 18459) to declare the purpose of the people of the United States as to the future political status of the people of the Philippine Islands, and to provide a more autonomous government for those islands, with Mr. ADAIR in the chair.

The Clerk reported the bill by title.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MILLER. It is rather embarrassing for me to make this inquiry, Mr. Chairman. At the conclusion of the sitting of the committee on Saturday I had offered a motion to strike out a portion of the paragraph now being considered. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] made a point of order against my amendment, claiming it was included in a previous motion to strike out made by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER]. Without any adequate discussion or consideration of the precedents, the Chair sustained the point of order. My parliamentary inquiry is now whether or not the Chair is willing to have that matter discussed in order that the precedents may be presented, with a view to deciding whether or not it would be advisable to overrule the point of order?

The CHAIRMAN. The present occupant of the chair was not in the Chamber at that time——

Mr. MILLER. My embarrassment arises from that fact, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. But as the Chair is informed, the point of order was sustained by the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. MILLER. Without any consideration of the precedents, Mr. Chairman; we did not have time then to present them.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands the point of order was sustained.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will the gentleman from Minnesota yield?

Mr. MILLER. Certainly.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I would like to ask the gentleman how many more amendments he has to this section?

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I am frank to say that this is the only amendment which I had to the section, but since Saturday I have drafted a lot of them. I do not know that I shall offer any of them, but I have them.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I want to see if we can reach an agreement with the gentleman in some way. I want to say, Mr. Chairman, I thought the point of order was well taken.

Mr. MILLER. I shall be very pleased to discuss that.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I do not care to argue it if we can save time otherwise. If we can save time and get away from this proposition, I would be willing to let the gentleman ask unanimous consent, as far as I am concerned, if the chairman of the committee will agree, if this is the only amendment the gentleman has to offer, that he should discuss it for five minutes and then we should vote on it.

Mr. MILLER. I would not be willing to make that kind of an agreement, although I would say to the gentleman I have no disposition to delay the bill at all, but I am firmly convinced the ruling of the Chair on Saturday was erroneous, and I think I can show it in two minutes by the precedents of the House and by the unquestionable parliamentary holdings. Mr. Chairman, I do not care to ask unanimous consent with that feature attached to it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Minnesota that he understands the point of order was made and the point of order was sustained by the then Chairman of the committee, and so far as the present occupant of the chair is concerned that ends the matter.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman from Minnesota yield?

Mr. MILLER. Certainly.

Mr. STAFFORD. How much time does the gentleman desire to discuss this amendment? I understand there will be no other amendment to this section offered on this side. Perhaps the gentleman from Tennessee will agree to further extension of time in order to expedite the consideration of the bill. I understand this is the only amendment the gentleman proposes to offer.

Mr. MILLER. No; I would not want that to be understood.

Mr. BRYAN. No; I would not care to agree to that.

Mr. MILLER. I am not quite certain of my parliamentary situation, but I should imagine, inasmuch as that is the last act of the committee, if the Chair were so disposed, the Chair could open the discussion for further consideration of the point of order and change the Chair's position if he thought proper so to do.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would not feel warranted in setting aside the action of the former Chairman.

Mr. MILLER. I assumed that is true, and that is the unfortunate situation.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. If the gentleman will permit me to proceed for a moment—we are exceedingly anxious now to make progress upon this bill. I think everybody in the House understands why. There has been very liberal debate, under the five-minute rule; in fact there has been no attempt at any time, as I recall, to close debate, and it has not been closed at any time except by unanimous consent. I reiterate that I believed the point of order was well taken, and I felt like it was my duty to make the point of order, because I thought we ought to protect the bill, not because I had any objection to the proposition offered by the gentleman from Minnesota being voted upon by the House. Now, I should be willing myself to ask unanimous consent that the point of order be vacated and that it may be offered and voted upon if we can reach some reasonable agreement. I understand the gentleman from Washington [Mr. BRYAN] wishes to offer an amendment other than the amendment which has been offered. Does the gentleman object to stating what the character of his amendment is——

Mr. BRYAN. No.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. So that we can proceed?

Mr. BRYAN. It is a phase of this suffrage proposition.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Of course I think the gentleman, if he has examined the precedents himself, will agree that that ruling was undoubtedly right.

Mr. BRYAN. I have nothing against that, and I am not going to raise any question on any ruling heretofore made.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I should be very glad if we can reach an agreement in order to save time.

Mr. MILLER. I will say to the gentleman, after considering the matter since Saturday, I concluded that I have enough material to occupy about 10 minutes in presenting it. Now, I have one other amendment, which I do not care to discuss, but I am willing to offer it with possibly a moment of consideration.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will the gentleman state what that amendment is?

Mr. MILLER. Yes; it was suggested to me by persons very much interested in the islands, and it provides that American citizens in the islands shall have the right to vote and hold office, but I would not care to enter upon a discussion of that.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. That amendment would undoubtedly be in order.

Mr. MILLER. I have another amendment that, I think, is in order.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Do I understand that the gentleman wishes to offer three amendments?

Mr. MILLER. No; two.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. That is, the one offered the other day, excluded by the point of order, and this one?

Mr. MILLER. I am not particular about the one offered the other day. I have one that I think the committee will vote down, because it has been disposed to take that action.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Let us see if we can not reach an agreement. How much time will the gentleman from Washington desire in reference to this matter?

Mr. BRYAN. I shall only want five minutes. Five minutes is all I care for on my amendment, and I am willing to agree that I have that time.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 21 minutes, 11 minutes to be controlled by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER], 5 minutes by the gentleman from Washington [Mr. BRYAN], and 5 minutes by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. JONES].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that all debate on this section and amendments thereto close in 21 minutes, 11 minutes to be controlled by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER], 5 minutes by the gentleman from Washington [Mr. BRYAN], and 5 minutes by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. JONES]. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment:

After the word "write," in line 4, page 12, insert "any section of this act in."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 12, line 4, after the word "write," insert the words "any section of this act in," so that the paragraph as amended will read:

"(c) Those who are able to read and write any section of this act in either Spanish, English, or a native language."

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I should really much prefer that the amendment should have been that which I offered the other day, namely, to strike out the words "or native language." I think the amendment was entirely in order, as sustained by the precedents of the House, but inasmuch as it was decided it was not in order, that ends it so far as that amendment is concerned. This amendment requires any person to possess the ability to read or write any section of this act either in English, Spanish, or native language. I am firmly of the opinion that the language employed in this act will open a Pandora's box in the Philippine Islands.

Now, I sincerely trust that no one will feel that I am in a critical attitude particularly, and certainly will not imagine that I am in any degree hostile to any of the ambitions or aspirations or desires of the Filipino people. I hope I shall never say anything or do anything that will be opposed to any of their legitimate aspirations. I am deeply in sympathy with most of them. But there are some facts associated with that which you are about to write into this act which you ought to know. I do not ask, Mr. Chairman, that you take my word for it. I am going to read to you, first and foremost, from a very distinguished Democrat, a gentleman who has had a great many years of experience in the islands, who has had many years' experience as a judge, and whose whole life and fortune are wrapped up in the future welfare of the islands. This is what he says:

The words "or a native language" should be stricken from paragraph (c) of this section. The insertion of these words was obviously for the purpose of enlarging the electorate, and it would give in the election statistics a false appearance of literacy of the population. If this provision remains in the law it will result in qualifying as electors thousands of ignorant natives who will be managed, controlled, and voted in blocks by the petty politicians in the rural districts, as are now those electors qualifying under provisions of existing law exactly the same as those contained in paragraph (a) of section 15. Ninety per cent of the turmoil resulting from contested elections in this country, of which there are an astounding number, is due to this provision of the election law now in force. The great majority of men who qualify on account of having held petty municipal offices under the Spanish Government are ignorant and illiterate peasants who are herded to the polls like cattle at the will of the village bosses. As for being able to read and write a native language, thousands of natives have received sufficient instructions in the village schools to enable them to read after a fashion such simple literature as is printed in the various native dialects, and laboriously to write a little of their native language. This knowledge, to say the most for it, is about equivalent to that of a 6-year-old child in the United States of English, and carries with it nothing of real qualification for the suffrage. Under this extension of the franchise, local native election boards would, when it suited their purposes, give to it a liberal interpretation, permitting to qualify as electors hordes of ignorant natives with no conception of the rights and duties of citizenship, with absolutely no will of their own in public matters, and subject to the control of the worst class of politicians. It would make worse a situation already bad enough. As a matter of fact, there is not in this country to-day any such thing as real representative government, and most elections are the merest farces. President Wilson speaks of his "passion for the submerged 85 per cent" of the Mexican people. About 95 per cent is the figure in the Philippine Islands. These masses have not the faintest conception of republican government, no will or opinion as to public questions, and no means of expressing them if they had; and not until, after many years, the education of the children of the people now going forward as rapidly as possible has produced its effect will such a thing as republican government be possible in this country. I suppose that the pretense of popular government and playing at elections initiated under and continued by the past administration must be kept up, but let us be as sensible as possible about it and not make the farce still more ridiculous.

My only reason for inserting that is that it is from the viewpoint of a Democrat; a man who knows the facts. It is not that there shall be urged hostility to the Filipino people. It is to call attention to a great number of voters who will be enfranchised by this, but who are not now ready to assume the responsibilities of that franchise. The Filipino people are making remarkable progress, but give them a chance. Do not deluge them with political troubles while they are making this advance.

Mr. JONES. Will the gentleman give us the name of the writer of that letter?

Mr. MILLER. I have not his permission to give it publicly, or I would be glad to do so. I would not care to place it in the RECORD without his sanction, and I have not his sanction.

Now, this is the opinion of a Republican:

The extension of the franchise to those who can read and write a native language would be disastrous. Probably 75 per cent of the present electorate is incapable of independent or intelligent voting, and the present scandalous practices in elections are due to the great proportion of ignorant and helpless voters. Obviously the class to be added would be of scant education and would increase the number of voters and lower the average capacity. With complaisant election officials almost every adult male could qualify, cacique rule would be more firmly established, and the party now in control of the machine would be fortified. It is very well to increase the number of voters if this can be done without lowering the standard; the schools are gradually adding educated voters, and it might be well to consider extending the franchise to women who can qualify by education or wealth. The character of the women of the Philippines and the position they now hold in society and in the family and even in business would make their enfranchisement reasonable and proper.

Now, the gentleman from Ohio some time ago made the statement, and he made it correctly, as I recall, so far as it went—I am referring to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GORDON]—as to the literacy in the islands found by the census of 1903, but the statement standing by itself does not tell the whole story. I find in that report the following language:

Those who were able to read but not write numbered 1,208,845, which was 24.3 per cent, or a little less than one-quarter of all the inhabitants 10 years of age and over. Those able to both read and write numbered 1,002,588, and constituted 20.2 per cent, or about one-fifth of those who were at least 10 years of age. In this part of the population was included a small element who had received superior education. They numbered only 76,627, or 1.6 per cent of the population over 10 years of age.

I find in the report of the executive secretary, recently made, a comment pertinent and important, and I desire to read it at this point. In speaking of the elections and the difficulty they are having by reason of ignorant voters, he says:

Although the educational qualification for voting is not high—consisting only of ability to speak and write either English or Spanish—the proportion of electors shown to possess this degree of education, including the city of Manila, where 86 per cent were literate, was nearly, but not quite, one-third of those registered. In the Provinces alone but 30 per cent were educated. This lack of education required a large number of ballots to be prepared by the inspectors, a proceeding which opens the door to fraud and which is known to be one of the chief reasons for the large number of protested elections, which was 240. The proportion of literate electors to the population in the territory affected was 1.47 per cent.

Now, it comes, Mr. Chairman, only from my sincere desire that we give to the people of the Philippine Islands an election law that will help them and not hurt them that I offer this amendment. They are progressing rapidly. The time is going to come when the percentage of literacy will be high and widespread. They are moving toward it rapidly and showing an eagerness for education most commendable; showing a development that should give them great national pride. But do not for any reason on earth put into the hands of this class of people a ballot which they do not know how to use.

Mr. Chairman, how much time have I left?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has two minutes left.

Mr. MILLER. I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, when I shall have occupied two minutes I hope the Chair will call my attention to the fact.

Mr. Chairman, I do not think it is necessary for me to repeat the arguments made by myself and others upon the subject of this amendment. It is not different in purpose and effect from the amendment just offered by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER]. If this amendment should be adopted, it certainly would not be in line with the liberal policy which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], the leader on that side of the House, declared it to be his desire to follow in dealing with the Philippines. It would be exactly the reverse. It would restrict the right of suffrage to a far greater extent than this bill proposes to do.

I hope that no friend of the Filipinos, no one who wishes to give to them the fullest control over their affairs, consistent with American sovereignty, will vote for this amendment.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES. I have only two minutes. I will say to the gentleman that if the Filipinos he would cut out of voting in the Philippines were to come to the United States and settle in his State and become naturalized citizens thereof—for I understand in his State they have manhood suffrage—they would be permitted to vote there. The gentleman would therefore permit Filipinos to vote in Minnesota without requiring of them any knowledge of English and would not permit them to vote in the Philippines unless they could read and write English. The very statement of this proposition demonstrates the absurdity of it. I hope the amendment will be voted down.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER].

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. MILLER. A division, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. A division is called for.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 15, noes 40.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I would like to offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by adding a new section after line 5, page 12:

"That all citizens of the United States who can qualify under clauses A, B, and C of the preceding section, and who reside in the Philippine Islands, shall have the right to vote for all elective offices and the right to be chosen to fill any office in said islands."

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, may I ask the chairman if he is disposed to accept that?

Mr. JONES. I am not.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I hope the chairman of the committee appreciates the very difficult position the American citizen will be in in the islands unless some such provision as that is accepted. This provision was brought to my attention very forcibly by people whose interests in the islands are very great. I certainly think an American citizen living in the islands, paying property tax and qualified in every way, ought to have the right to vote without renouncing his citizenship in the United States.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, just one minute. I am opposed to any man voting in the Philippine Islands who is not a citizen of the Philippines. I object to an American retaining his citizenship and his right to vote in the United States and at the same time exercising the right to vote in the Philippine Islands. I am as much opposed to an American doing this as I would be opposed to an Englishman or a German or a member of any other nationality doing it. It would be outrageous to permit such a provision as this, in my judgment, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES. I want to occupy but one minute, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. MILLER. Will the gentleman yield for just a word?

Mr. JONES. I have but two minutes in which to discuss the other amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington [Mr. BRYAN] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer that amendment as a new paragraph in this section, to come in between lines 5 and 6.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 12, after line 5, insert the following:

"Every female citizen qualified for suffrage under this section except as to sex shall be eligible to vote in school elections and on all candidates for school director or other offices whose sole official function is connected with education."

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask to be notified when I have used one minute, because I have another amendment to offer. I merely want to state, so that every Member will understand, that this simply allows women to vote in school elections. We had that provision in the State of Washington before we gave universal suffrage to women, and I understand other States have that provision. A large number of the teachers in the Philippine Islands are women. Women are eligible to do the teaching, women are eligible to train the children, and why should they not be allowed to vote on problems affecting purely and simply elections of school directors and other similar officers. On such matters this limited and qualified suffrage ought by all means to be granted, and I think that if Congress, having already gone on record against universal suffrage, also goes on record against this qualified suffrage, it will take a step that is so remote and so resembles the cliff dwellers that Congress ought to be ashamed of itself.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Washington [Mr. BRYAN].

The question being taken, the Chairman announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. BRYAN. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 11, noes 27.

Accordingly the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 12, after line 5, insert the following:

"Every female citizen qualified for suffrage under this section except as to sex shall be eligible to vote in all elections if she owns real property to the value of ₱500 or annually pays ₱30 or more of established taxes."

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask to be notified when I have used one minute.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I make a point of order against that amendment, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. That is in effect precisely the same proposition which was offered on Saturday last and to which a point of order was sustained by the then occupant of the chair. There is no difference whatever in it.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, if the Chair wants to hear me on the point, I will say this amendment is different. This amendment takes up the matter of women voting who own property, just as the amendment preceding took up the question of women voting in school elections.

Now, for the Chair to rule that it is in order for us to take up amendments here as to various phases of citizenship, but because we have decided that universal suffrage shall be extended only to men that it is out of order for us to raise this question of qualified suffrage to women who own property, is, it seems to me, utterly illogical. The fact that some other occupant of the chair has made some other ruling in reference to some other amendment in some other place in the bill, does not make any difference. This Chairman certainly ought to be asked to make a ruling, simply because universal suffrage is extended only to males; that it is out of order to add a provision that when women own property they may vote; and while from the Democratic standpoint, while from the standpoint of the gentleman who has just spoken, it may be considered impolitic or a bad amendment, it certainly is in order for us to fix that qualification. Although the State of Louisiana, for instance, has a provision for male suffrage, it nevertheless has a provision giving women who own property the right to vote on certain things.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will ask the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] if he will send to the desk the amendment to which he refers, against which a point of order was sustained.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. If the Chair has before him the RECORD of the proceedings of Saturday last, it is in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has the RECORD.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I should like to be heard on the point of order.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. On page 16439, at the top of the second column, is the amendment offered by the gentleman from Washington [Mr. BRYAN]. If the Chair will hear me a moment, I think I can state briefly the contention about it. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] offered an amendment providing for female suffrage in every instance coming within the provisions of this section where male suffrage is permitted. That opened up the entire question, and was voted down by the committee. That covered every phase of it.

Now, the gentleman from Washington [Mr. BRYAN] subsequently offered an amendment to one of these sections, which the Chair has before him, and that amendment appears at the top of page 16439. The point of order that I made against that amendment was that the exact proposition involved in his amendment has already been voted upon by the committee. If the gentleman from Washington [Mr. BRYAN] had offered his amendment that was offered on Saturday, or if he had offered the amendment which he now offers, prior to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], it would not have made the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois out of order, because it was broader than that offered by the gentleman from Washington; but the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois brought the whole question before the committee. It was voted upon and passed upon. If the gentleman from Washington [Mr. BRYAN] can offer the amendment which he has just offered, then he can again open up another paragraph and nullify the complete proposition that was decided by the committee by the rejection of the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN]. In other words, it is simply a repetition of that which the committee has already passed upon; and upon the theory that we must at some time, somewhere, be rid of these matters and make progress, I think the point of order is well taken.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], as stated by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT], was to extend the right of franchise to women of all classes; all women who could come in under class A; all women who could come in under class B, the property qualification clause; and all women who could come in under class C, the literacy qualification clause. It was a general, comprehensive amendment. That offered by the gentleman from Washington [Mr. BRYAN] is very much less in extent. It contemplates extending the franchise to just one of the three classes.

I trust that I can get the point that I have in mind before the Chair. The amendment which the gentleman from Illinois offered extended the right of franchise to women of three classes. It was voted down. Now it is proposed to extend the right of franchise to one of the three classes. The query is, Does the previous action of the House in respect to all three classes prevent consideration of an amendment embracing one class? I would like to read to the Chair some comments of the patron saint of Democracy, Thomas Jefferson, in his Manual, on a situation precisely like this:

A motion is made to amend by striking out certain words and inserting others in their place, which is negatived. Then it is moved to strike out the same words and to insert others of a tenor entirely different from those first proposed. It is negatived. Then it is moved to strike out the same words and insert nothing, which is agreed to. All this is admissible, because to strike out and insert A is one proposition.

That is the proposition submitted by the gentleman from Illinois.

To strike out and insert B is a different proposition—

That is the proposition submitted by the gentleman from Washington—and to strike out and insert nothing is still different. And the rejection of one proposition does not preclude the offering of a different one.

Now I find that precise question has been before the House or the committee and has been passed upon. Section 5769 of volume 5 of Hinds' Precedents reads as follows:

5769. A motion to strike out certain words being disagreed to, it is in order to strike out a portion of those words. On March 2, 1904, the District of Columbia appropriation bill was under consideration in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union when the following amendment was proposed and disagreed to:

"Strike out, in line 1, page 15, the words 'register of wills,' and in line 2 the words 'and the police court.'"

Thereupon Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH of Michigan moved to strike out the words "and the police court" in line 2.

Mr. Maecenas E. Benton, of Missouri, suggested the point that the amendment had already been voted on.

The Chairman held:

"The Chair will remind the gentleman that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. Smith] was to strike out the words 'register of wills' in the first line and the words 'and the police court' in the second line. No one called for a division. The proposition offered by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH] to strike out simply the words 'and the police court' is a different proposition. Perhaps it would have been better to have called for a division of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa, but that was not done, and the Chair must hold that this is a different proposition—one which has not been acted upon. The question, then, is upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan.

Again, in section 5570 it says:

It is in order to perfect words proposed to be stricken out by striking out a portion of them.

It seems to me very clear, Mr Chairman, that the action of the committee in disagreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois was one proposition, and this offered by the gentleman from Washington [Mr. BRYAN] is clearly another.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I would like to be heard on the point of order for a moment. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Washington [Mr. BRYAN] may or not be important. That depends on one's point of view. But the question as to what shall be the rule of the House of Representatives with regard to amendments is certainly very important from everyone's standpoint. It is true that on Saturday the Chair made a certain ruling. My own impression is that the Chair had made his ruling before he clearly understood what the proposition was, and while the gentleman who then occupied the chair is an exceedingly fair man it is sometimes a little difficult, even for a Chairman, to adjust himself to new light that may come to him.

Now, this is the proposition, and it strikes me as being so clear and important that it would be a very great misfortune if we should establish a rule here which is certain to plague us in the future.

What is the situation? This bill has three sets of qualifications for electors—first, those who have held office; second, those who own property of a certain amount; third, those who are able to read and write. Now, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] favored allowing women of all these classes to vote. The committee voted down that proposition. The committee might have been in favor of allowing women who had formerly held office to vote; they might have been in favor of women owning property to vote; a majority of the committee might have been in favor of allowing women who are educated to vote. The committee might be in favor of one or two of these propositions and yet not be willing to allow all three classes of women to vote.

Now, if we are to hold that a blanket amendment, if offered, precludes all separate amendments on different propositions, this is what is likely to occur: Some one opposed to any amendment whatever may rise and offer a blanket amendment, realizing or believing or hoping or expecting that the blanket amendment will be voted down, and by so doing prevent the committee from exercising its judgment and expressing its opinion with regard to one or more clear and concrete propositions included in the amendment.

We certainly do not want to establish that sort of a situation in the House. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] does not desire it any more than the balance of us do. The object of the rule is to give the House an opportunity to express its opinion. The gentleman from Tennessee says if you allow this, then there is no end to the amendments that may be offered. Oh, yes; there is; and the end is well in sight. There are three different propositions. A general amendment could be offered covering them all, and then, from my view of the matter, it would be permissible to offer three other amendments covering each one of these classes; and that is the end of it; and that is not so long and wearisome a road that we need be disturbed about traveling it if we desire to give the committee an opportunity to express its opinion or its view.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER] has already offered two amendments, so far as that is concerned; but does not the gentleman conceive that in its ultimate effect it would bring the committee to vote twice upon precisely the same question?

Mr. MONDELL. Not at all; and I think the Chair will have no difficulty in understanding the propositions involved. It is proper to offer a general amendment, covering a variety of conditions, and certainly the offering of such an amendment should not preclude the offering of amendments that cover only part of the subject matter covered by the general amendment. I have already called the attention of the Chair to the effect of such a holding. It would give some one opposed to any amendment an opportunity to offer a general blanket amendment, and thus defeat the will of the committee.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a suggestion?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. BRYAN. I want to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that it is impossible to word a special amendment affecting one of these particular subdivisions or classes so that you can insert it in this first paragraph, where the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] sought to amend. Here it says "every male citizen," and so forth, and you can not put a specific amendment in there ahead of the classes A, B, C and do it so that it will be intelligent. The specification for qualified suffrage must be put after the first paragraph, whether the specification refers to man suffrage or woman suffrage.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Tennessee has suggested that had the gentleman from Washington [Mr. BRYAN] offered his amendment first, a specific amendment covering but one class, then the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] might have offered a general amendment following that. By what curious process of reasoning the gentleman arrives at that conclusion and then insists that you can not turn the thing the other way around, I can not understand. Of course the amendment referring to one particular class could have been offered by the gentleman from Illinois, and another amendment referring to another class might have been offered by him or some one else, and another amendment referring to another class might have been offered by some one else. Those three amendments would have covered the whole ground, and then a general amendment perhaps would not have been in order, although there may be some question about that.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. JONES. I would like to ask the gentleman if, when the general amendment was offered to which he refers, it would not have been perfectly competent for either the gentleman from Washington or the gentleman from Minnesota to have asked that that be divided and that each proposition be voted upon separately; and if that was done, would not his object have been accomplished?

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I do not think a demand for a division could have been made, because as presented it was not divisible. Possibly it could have been amended in a way to cover only one or taking in two classes, in which event certainly another amendment could have been offered that would have taken in the other class or the other two classes or a general amendment. Mr. Chairman, it is very dangerous, and would establish a rule that we would all regret—a rule that would rise to plague us many times in the future—if it were held and became the rule of the House that a general amendment could be offered covering a variety of subjects, and then no specific amendment covering a portion of the subject, or one feature of the subject, could thereafter be offered. It would be very easy for a designing person to prevent amendments and prevent the committee from expressing its view and opinion by doing that very thing.

Mr. BRYAN. The amendment of the gentleman from Illinois was to strike out the word "male"; and if somebody wise in procedure will tell me how to divide that, I will learn something.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, clearly that amendment would not have been divisible on any theory of parliamentary law with which we are acquainted. Perhaps the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. JONES] could give us some explanation of how it could be done.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman has referred to me. The gentleman himself spoke of a general amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER], and I submit that that was subject to a division.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, we are talking now about the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN]. The present occupant of the chair has proven himself in other days worthy and qualified to pass judgment intelligently upon these subjects. I am sure that he is well qualified to pass upon this subject, and I am taking the time of the Chair because of the fact that this is an exceedingly important proposition. It is not a matter that may be decided one way or the other without seriously affecting the business of the House. It is a matter that is far-reaching; and a decision such as is suggested by the gentleman from Tennessee would place us in a position where the hands of the committee would be tied. The opportunity of the committee to express its opinion would be prevented. Rather than have that condition arise, we might better spend a few moments discussing and voting upon various amendments.

Mr. HELM. Mr. Chairman, if the Chair has the bill before him and will turn to page 11, line 15, he will see the language of the bill—

> Every male citizen of the Philippines 21 years of age—

And so forth.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] offered an amendment at that point to strike out the word "male," so that it would then have read:

> Every citizen of the Philippines—

And so forth.

Now, in the nature of the case, every citizen must be either male or female, and the whole is equal to and includes all of its parts, and therefore the committee in its wisdom, having voted down the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], thereby in effect says that female suffrage in the Philippine Islands will not be permitted or authorized by this bill.

Mr. BRYAN. The committee did not say that.

Mr. HELM. Yes, it did. The effect of the Mann amendment was that every female over 21 years of age, who has resided in the Philippine Islands for one year and in the municipality for six months, and possessing the qualifications set forth in subsections a, b, and c should be permitted to vote.

Mr. BRYAN. That is right; that is what Mr. MANN proposed, and the committee said that everyone and every kind shall not be permitted——

Mr. HELM. I did not yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BRYAN. But it did not say that a certain kind should not be permitted to vote.

Mr. HELM. The Mann amendment said, in effect—I will repeat it—that every female in the Philippine Islands over 21 years of age possessing the qualifications mentioned in sections 15 and embraced in subsections a, b, and c should be permitted to vote.

Mr. BRYAN. That is right.

Mr. HELM. The committee voted that down. And, now, how can you come back and say that some woman of the Caucasian race or some woman who pays $15 taxes or some woman who has held an office or some woman who reads and writes the Spanish language shall be permitted to vote?

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HELM. In just a moment.

Mr. MONDELL. If the gentleman will put in there, under all sections; but the committee has not expressed——

Mr. HELM. The committee is on record as being opposed to female suffrage in the Philippine Islands——

Mr. MONDELL. As a whole.

Mr. HELM (continuing). No matter whether the woman pays $15 taxes, no matter whether she can read and write Spanish or read and write English or whether she can read or write a native language or whether she has been one of those Spanish officers, whose names I can not pronounce—every one has been excluded.

Mr. MONDELL. If the gentleman will allow me. What the committee has done is to vote down an amendment giving universal suffrage, but the committee has not expressed itself on the question of limiting suffrage at all.

Mr. HELM. It has excluded every one of them.

Mr. MONDELL. That is what I wanted to call the attention of the chairman to——

Mr. HELM. The committee says woman suffrage shall not prevail in the Philippine Islands. How can you now, in the name of common sense, say any particular kind of woman shall vote? Now, just one other word. The regular chairman of this committee has gone on record after this matter has been argued as fully and as thoroughly and as completely as it has been argued here, and if we are going to continue this merry-go-round, one day riding the pony and the next day the sleigh, around and around, we will never get anywhere, and in the interest of business and in the interest of orderly procedure I think it ought to be disposed of without any further waste of time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] provided that all women included in all of the sections of the bill should have the right to vote in the Philippine Islands. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Washington [Mr. BRYAN] provides that certain women owning so much property or paying so much taxes shall be permitted to vote. The Mann amendment covered all women in the Philippine Islands, those owning property as well as those not owning property, those who do not pay taxes as well as those who do pay taxes, and in view of the fact that the Mann amendment covered all women in the Philippine Islands, it is perfectly clear in the opinion of the Chair that this amendment offered by the gentleman from Washington is not in order, and the Chair therefore sustains the point of order.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment. There is only one minute's debate on that amendment.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the Chair if all time under the agreement has not been exhausted?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington has two minutes and the gentleman from Virginia has two minutes.

Mr. BRYAN. I have only used one minute. I have not spoken except on the first amendment and since then except on the point of order. I have four minutes remaining.

The CHAIRMAN. Did not the gentleman offer two amendments?

Mr. BRYAN. I offered two amendments, but was not permitted to debate the second one at all. The point of order was raised on it before I spoke a second. If I had been permitted to speak on it, it would have been too late to make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair finds that he is mistaken. The gentleman is entitled to four minutes. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert as a new paragraph in section 15, between lines 5 and 6 on page 12, the following:

"Every female citizen qualified for suffrage under this section, except as to sex, shall be eligible to vote on all propositions submitted to the people on the incurring of indebtedness or the issuance of bonds if she owns real property to the value of ₱500 or annually pays ₱30 or more of established taxes."

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, I wish to be notified when I have used one minute. This amendment provides for the voting of women who own property only on questions of bonded indebtedness and on the incurring of indebtedness. You have provided that a man can ride in there on a horse, or a donkey, or anything else, and if he pays $15 tax on that particular property he can vote, but a woman, no matter how much property she owns, can not vote; and you say it is out of order to think about it. You would not permit an amendment, so absurd from your viewpoint, to be even considered. It is ruled out of order.

Now, this proposition is that at a special election on a matter of bonds, or the incurring of indebtedness which would tax the property of a woman for which the authority of the electorate is necessary, in such a case the woman owning the property possessing all the qualifications for suffrage except that she is a woman, may, notwithstanding that impediment, be allowed to vote. That certainly is a right that ought to be recognized. It was adopted in Louisiana over 10 years ago, I know. The women who own property and pay taxes vote on the question of the issuance of bonds down there, and in any civilized community you should not tax a woman and then refuse to let her vote as to whether or not her property shall be taxed, in a special election held for the very purpose of determining whether such unusual indebtedness shall be incurred and such bonds be issued.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Washington.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. BRYAN. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 9, noes 27.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BRYAN. Now, I have one more amendment to offer.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert, as a new paragraph to section 15, after line 5, on page 12, the following:

"The Philippine Legislature is hereby authorized to extend the right of suffrage to female citizens at any time hereafter."

Mr. BRYAN. Now, Mr. Chairman, you say that this bill is designed to give the Filipino independence. You say that you are going to let the Filipino govern himself and you are going to open the door to removal of the jurisdiction of the United States. But you have a provision here that even though every member of the Philippine Legislature should want to pass a law letting women vote where they own property, letting women vote in school elections where women do most of the teaching, letting women vote on bond issues where they own property, and under various other conditions, or letting them have universal suffrage, even if every gentleman is like the distinguished gentleman from the Philippine Islands [Mr. QUEZON], and all members of the legislature like him favor the women in this matter, nevertheless the strong hand of the United States Government comes down and says, "No; you shall not permit the women to vote under any conditions in the islands, notwithstanding the fact that we boast about giving you independence, notwithstanding that we boast about giving you liberty. Have we not mothers? Do we not know that women voting will disturb the conditions over there? Have we not mothers and wives and sisters, and do we not know that women voting will promote immorality in the islands? Have we not observed the female characteristics, and do you suppose that we are going to allow you to permit women to disturb your political conditions and infuse immorality into your politics? No; we will not permit it! What do women know about education? What do women know about taxation, even if they do own the property? We want you to have self-government, but we will never permit you to bring such a calamity down on your heads as would come to all your institutions from permitting your wives and mothers and sisters to vote. Never!"

I hope this committee will come to their senses on this thing. Every one of these votes, including the one for universal suffrage, have been characterized by this feature, that the Democratic side of the aisle is the only side where that kind of votes can be had, and we have a demonstration in this Congress to the effect that there is only one party that stands practically unanimous against the mothers and the wives and the sisters, so far as political rights are concerned. [Applause.]

You have not only gone on record against votes for women in the Philippines on the same terms as men, but you have voted against permitting taxpaying women to vote merely at special elections where no subject is up for consideration except "Shall we vote bonds and extra taxes," for railroad help, for waterworks, for light plant, or other public works. A man may be drunk and a pauper, but he can vote, if he can read or ever held an office; but a woman may own her home and a substantial business, and may have been a college teacher the greater part of her life, and she can not vote even as to taxes. Ignorant men may vote on school elections and school bonds; but the very teachers themselves, who are women (and most of them are), can not vote even at a school election. Mothers and widows can not vote at school elections.

Then you go further, and say that you will not permit the Philippine Legislature to grant any kind of qualified suffrage to any woman at any time, even if every member of the legislature desires such legislation. You tie the legislature's hands by making it impossible for the insane, the criminals, and women to vote. What becomes of your State-rights talk. Here you deny it as a right of the Filipino to determine this matter, although you allow him to determine very nearly every phase of local government.

The Democratic Party is an enemy of woman suffrage in the State, in the Nation, in the islands, anywhere and everywhere. You will be the only party in the next presidential campaign whose platform does not contain a plank for equal suffrage. I am in hearty sympathy with the movement of the Congressional Union to hold the party responsible in the 10—soon to be 14—suffrage States for this. No individual is responsible; it is a great party that is blocking the way to equal suffrage, and I congratulate Miss Paul, of the Congressional Union, for locating the trouble. Suffrage workers in the suffrage States should apply the remedy.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I do not care to discuss this question. Almost the whole of Saturday was occupied in discussing the suffrage matter, but I do wish to say to the gentleman who has just spoken that it does not lie in the mouth of any gentleman on that side who has assailed this bill to charge the Democrats—those who favor it—with inconsistency. I think the gentleman himself voted to restrict the suffrage in the Philippine Islands to those who could read or write English or Spanish. After having cast that vote, it does not lie in the gentleman's mouth to talk about the Democrats not being liberal toward the Philippines.

Mr. BRYAN. I was talking about the liberty of the women.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Washington [Mr. BRYAN].

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a division in order to see where they stand up.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 11, noes 27.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 16. That for the purposes of the first election hereafter to the Philippine Legislature, the Philippine Islands shall be divided by the Philippine Commission into 12 senate and ninety representative districts. In establishing senate and representative districts the commission shall establish in the territory not now represented in the Philippine Assembly one senate and nine representative districts. The first election hereafter shall be held on the first Tuesday of June, 1915, and there shall be chosen at such election senators and representatives to the Philippine Legislature: Provided, That the Governor General of the Philippine Islands shall appoint, without the consent of the senate and without restriction as to residence, senators and representatives who will, in his opinion, best represent the senate district and those representative districts which may be included in the territory not now represented in the Philippine Assembly: Provided further, That thereafter elections shall be held only on such days and under such regulations as to ballots, voting, and qualifications of electors as may be prescribed by the Philippine Legislature, to which is hereby given authority to redistrict the Philippine Islands and modify, amend, or repeal any provision of this section.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. TOWNER: Page 12, line 13, after the word "districts," strike out all the remainder of the line, all of line 14, all of line 15, all of line 16 down to and including the word "Legislature," and insert in lieu thereof "The first election under the provisions of this act shall be held on the first Tuesday of June, 1915, and there shall be chosen at such election one senator from each senate district for a term of three years and one for six years. Thereafter one senator from each district shall be elected from each senate district for a term of six years. That at said first election each representative district shall elect one representative for a term of three years, and triennially thereafter."

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I want to move that the committee do now rise in order to get in a formal matter.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. JONES] moves that the committee do now rise. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. ADAIR, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 18459) to declare the purpose of the people of the United States as to the future political status of the people of the Philippine Islands, and to provide a more autonomous government for those islands, and had come to no resolution thereon.

LEASING OF COAL LANDS IN ALASKA.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the further conference asked by the Senate on the Alaskan coal bill (H. R. 14233) to provide for the leasing of coal lands in the Territory of Alaska, and for other purposes, be agreed to, and that two new conferees be appointed in lieu of the two that are absent.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS] asks unanimous consent that the House agree to the conference asked by the Senate on House bill 14233, and that new conferees be appointed on account of the absence of two conferees.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. STAFFORD. As I understand the precedents, I believe the bill is still in conference, and if it were not for the absence of two of the House conferees, the House conferees could proceed with this matter without any action on the part of the House. I wish to be advised by the Speaker if that is not the ruling of Speaker Cannon?

The SPEAKER. Which side has the papers?

Mr. FERRIS. The Senate.

The SPEAKER. The House can not do anything in regard to the conference until the Senate gets through with the papers. It may be that the first half of the gentleman's request is surplusage, but the last half is necessary because two of the conferees have gone away.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I understood from the proceedings that the conference report was rejected in the Senate on a point of order.

The SPEAKER. It was rejected by the Senate, and the Senate asked for a new conference. The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS] asks that we agree to the request of the Senate for a new conference, and the Chair will appoint the new conferees. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Chair will appoint the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS], the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR], and the gentleman from Washington [Mr. LA FOLLETTE]. Under the special rule the House resolves itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of House bill 18459, with the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CLINE] in the chair.

THE PHILIPPINE ISLANDS.

Thereupon the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 18459) to declare the purpose of the people of the United States as to the future political status of the people of the Philippine Islands, and to provide a more autonomous government for those islands, with Mr. CLINE in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is again in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of House bill 18459—the Philippine bill.

Mr. TOWNER. The amendment I offered, Mr. Chairman, is merely a perfection or continuation of the amendment which was discussed the other day with regard to the election of senators and representatives, making the term of senators six years, forming a continuous senate, electing one-half of them every three years, and fixing the term of members of the assembly at three years.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] assures me that that is the amendment we agreed upon, and I have no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I offer another amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. TOWNER:

"Page 12, line 16, after the word 'Legislature,' strike out the remainder of line 16, all of line 17, all of line 18, all of line 19, all of line 20, all of line 21, all of line 22, and the words 'Philippine Assembly' in line 23, and insert, at the end of the section, as a new section, to be numbered '16a'"——

Mr. HELM. I will ask the gentleman where that amendment is inserted in the bill?

Mr. TOWNER. It is to strike out the provision for the representation of the inhabitants of non-Christian territory, I will say to the gentleman, and to insert the provision which I introduced in the committee for a commission.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk has not reported the real amendment yet that the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] intended to offer. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 16a. That the provisions of this bill shall not be applied to the territory occupied by nor to the people known as the Moros or other non-Christian tribes. That such peoples and non-Christian tribes shall be allowed to maintain their tribal organization and government subject to the provisions of this section. That the government of the territory now occupied by the said Moros and other non-Christian tribes and of said peoples is hereby committed to a commission to be known as the Philippine Commission, to consist of three persons to be appointed by the President by and with the approval of the Senate of the United States and the Governor General or Acting Governor General of the Philippines. That said three members so appointed shall receive a salary of $5,000 each, and shall hold their offices for four years and until their successors are appointed and qualified. That said commission shall have such powers in general, except as modified by existing conditions, as were granted to the commission appointed by the President of the United States by the order of April 7, 1900. That said commission shall have power to transfer from time to time such territory and peoples to the government and jurisdiction of the Philippine Government, as provided for in the preceding sections of this act, by and with the consent of the Philippine Legislature. That any tribe or people of such Moros or other non-Christian tribes, sufficient in number and of such contiguous residence as to constitute an entity capable of municipal organization which shall desire to be admitted to the jurisdiction of the Philippine Government established in preceding sections of this act, and who shall present a petition, signed by a majority of the males over 21 years of age of such tribe or entity, to that effect to the Philippine Legislature, may be admitted upon the acceptance of the transfer or jurisdiction by the Philippine Legislature and the approval of the President of the United States. The right to amend, modify, or repeal this section is hereby reserved to Congress without in any way affecting the other provisions of this act.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I am going to ask the gentleman if we can not agree to some little time for debate on the proposition?

Mr. TOWNER. Does the gentleman think 10 minutes would be sufficient?

Mr. JONES. I think that would be sufficient for me, but other gentleman on this side will want time. Does the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER] want time on this question?

Mr. MILLER. Yes. This is one of the most important paragraphs, if not perhaps the most important paragraph, in the entire bill. This is one, and coupled with it there is one that deals with a kindred subject, namely, the government of the non-Christian tribes, and it ought to be discussed at some considerable length.

Mr. JONES. Then, Mr. Chairman, I will ask that the debate on this subject be limited to 20 minutes.

Mr. MILLER. On this particular amendment alone?
Mr. JONES. Yes. There will be another one.
Mr. TOWNER. I do not know anything about that.
Mr. MILLER. Make it 25 minutes.
Mr. JONES. We are getting along so awfully slowly——
Mr. STAFFORD. But this is very important.
Mr. JONES. I will say 25 minutes, if the gentleman suggests it.
Mr. STAFFORD. Twenty minutes of that time to be controlled on this side?
Mr. JONES. Oh, no; half on that side and half on this.
Mr. STAFFORD. We can not agree to that.
Mr. TOWNER. It will be impossible for me to speak upon this amendment and explain it in less than 10 minutes' time, as the gentleman himself knows.
Mr. JONES. I said 25 minutes at the suggestion of the gentleman from Wisconsin.
Mr. TOWNER. I am speaking for myself.
Mr. JONES. Then I will say 30 minutes. That certainly is abundant time for one amendment.
Mr. TOWNER. How is the time to be divided?
Mr. JONES. Half and half.
The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. JONES] asks unanimous consent that debate on the amendment now before the committee be limited to 30 minutes, 15 minutes to be controlled by himself and 15 minutes by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER]. Is there objection?
Mr. TOWNER. I shall object, Mr. Chairman. We shall want 20 minutes on this side.
Mr. JONES. Then I will not agree to any time now.
Mr. TOWNER. Very well; let the gentleman make a motion on the proposition.
Mr. JONES. We will take it up later.
Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, this amendment raises the most important and difficult question regarding the government of the Philippine Islands, that which relates to the government of the non-Christian tribes. I presume it is well known that in the Philippine Islands there are variously estimated at from seven hundred thousand to a million people who belong to non-Christian tribes. These consist of natives of the islands ranging from the very lowest degree of intelligence to those who are capable of understanding their own native languages, most of them maintaining their independent tribal forms of government, and all of them being non-Christian, pagans, or Mohammedans. The Negritos are of the very lowest order of manhood and womanhood in the islands, and are among the lowest orders known in the entire world. They are the so-called dwarfs, and, so far as we know, are practically incapable of civilization. The Igorotes are another tribe, very much higher in the scale, but still maintaining almost entirely a separate tribal organization, which has been slightly modified during the American occupancy. They are the old head-hunters and still retain a great many of their ancient characteristics. Then there is a very large group, the most important and the largest of the non-Christian tribes, the Moros or Moors. They are entirely distinct from the others. They profess and are very strongly devoted to the Mohammedan religion. They are a very warlike people, and have been able to keep up their independent organization against the rest of the islands, as well as against the Spaniards when they were in the occupancy of the islands. All of these different tribes have been governed down to the present time by what may be called a commission. Their government has always been separate and apart from the general government of the Philippine Islands. They have never been subjected to the same form and kind of government as have the rest of the islands.

It is now proposed by the terms of this bill to bring these people under the general government of the Philippine Islands; in other words, to the government of the Filipinos. More than half of the territory of the entire islands is occupied by the non-Christian tribes. It is proposed that they shall be represented in the Philippine Assembly, not by persons elected by themselves, because in most part that would be manifestly impossible, in fact, ridiculous; but they are to be represented by representatives who are to be appointed by the Governor General of the Philippine Islands, and in this way they are to be subjected to the general Philippine Government which we are instituting in this bill. In other words, the Legislature of the Philippine Islands will have the power to bring these people absolutely under its control. It is true that there is a bureau provided for afterwards in this bill, but that is administration only and does not change the fact that the power of legislating for all the non-Christian territory and all the non-Christian tribes is in the hands of the Philippine Legislature under the terms of this act.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. TOWNER. I ask unanimous consent that I may have five minutes more.
Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, pending that, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this amendment be limited to 30 minutes, 15 minutes to be used on that side and 15 minutes on this side. Gentlemen on that side have already had 5 minutes, and that will give them 20 minutes.
The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent that all debate on this amendment be limited to 30 minutes, 15 minutes to be controlled by the gentleman from Virginia and 15 minutes by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER]. Is there objection?
There was no objection.
Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I have no doubt that the provision that the majority of the committee have put into this bill is as wise a provision as could have been made for the government of the non-Christian territory and tribes if they are to be subjected to the government of the Philippine Legislature. However, I am absolutely certain that it will be exceedingly unwise to attempt to do this. In the first place, it will bring into the politics of the Philippine Islands an element of discord that will, in my judgment, make issues that ought, if possible, to be avoided. It is a responsibility which we ought not to place upon the legislature at this time. It is injecting into the future politics of the islands questions which they ought not to be called to pass upon.

That is one side of the question. On the other side is the still more important question that between the Negritos, the Igorrotes, the Moros, and the Philippine people there is and has been for years. I might say for centuries, an intense hatred. That has been occasioned by the many acts of hostility that have occurred between them. It is ingrained in the very nature of all these non-Christian tribes. One of their most pronounced characteristics is that of hostility against the Filipinos. I can not take the time to give testimony regarding that, which might be given almost ad libitum. Time and time again these people, when they have been visited by Members and others, have said that they were willing to submit to the government of Americans, but they were unwilling under any circumstances to submit to the government of Filipinos. I believe that it would lead almost surely and certainly to revolt and revolution on the part of the Moros if Philippine oversight, supervision, and control and government were to be put in the hands of the legislature. If it be understood by them that they were afterwards subject to the control of the Filipinos, I do not believe that there would be any more peace in at least the southern half of the islands.

I have provided in this amendment which I offer, Mr. Chairman, for a commission to be appointed that shall have the control and government of this territory, so that in form, and for the present at least, the same form of government to which they are now subject shall be continued. The civil government which has been constituted now may be continued, so that from time to time, whenever it may be desired by the people themselves, of any part of this territory, they may be set aside from the non-Christian territory and become a part of the Christian territory. By these provisions they may themselves determine when they desire to come under the control of the Philippine Government. Eventually, as we all believe and hope, there will be unity in the government of the Philippines; but now it will not hasten—it will rather postpone—that day if we endeavor to force upon them the subjection, as they will view it, of their territory and their tribes to the Philippine Legislature. Mr. Chairman, how much time have I remaining?
The CHAIRMAN (Mr. CLINE). The gentleman has used five minutes.
Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from the Philippine Islands [Mr. QUEZON].
Mr. QUEZON. Mr. Chairman, I can not permit the statement just made on this floor, that there is hatred between the non-Christian Filipinos on the one hand and their Christian brethren on the other, to pass unchallenged. The statement is not new. It has several times heretofore been circulated from one end of this country to the other, and has been accepted by many people in the very best of faith. Such a statement should not be allowed to go further without the most energetic protest on the part of those who know the true state of affairs in their own country.

The Moros in times gone by have sometimes invaded certain of the small villages inhabited by Christian Filipinos. It is also true that until a few years ago there were a handful of savages in the Philippines, known as head-hunters, who occasionally decapitated some Christian Filipinos. But it is not true, indeed it is very wide of the mark, to say that such happenings as these prove that there is any particular hatred or antagonism between the Christian and non-Christian inhabitants of the Philippines.

The lack of discrimination in forming opinions on Philippine issues shown by persons who habitually act otherwise on matters of personal moment to them is most astonishing. They seem to take at face value whatever they hear or read regardless of its soundness and without analyzing the motives that might have prompted the statement.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Iowa is a very able lawyer, and if he would only apply to the information or statement he probably thinks he has in support of his contention regarding the supposed hatred between Christian and non-Christian Filipinos some of the common and rudimentary principles of evidence he would at once discover that such testimony is by no means plausible—indeed, is absolutely unreliable.

We are told, Mr. Chairman, that the Moros have attacked and killed Filipinos. We are told, moreover, that these Moros have again and again emphatically reiterated that they would forcibly resist any attempt at a government of their territory by the Christian Filipinos. We are further told that they love the Americans and are happy under their rule, and that they are begging to be permitted to continue to live under that rule. What are the facts? The fact is that while it is true that the Moros have attacked and killed some Filipinos, it was long ago that they did so. On the other hand, up to two years ago they have been in the habit of attacking and killing American soldiers. Why, Mr. Chairman, the number of the American troops killed by the Moros in their resistance to American control exceeded by far the number of Filipinos that they even attempted to kill in past years, not to say of those they actually did kill. That Filipino heads have become a part of the trophies of the head-hunters in times gone by is undoubtedly a fact; but, unfortunately, Spanish and American heads have also been taken to make up these trophies. What is the conclusion—the only logical conclusion—to be derived from these premises? That the Christian Filipinos were never singled out as the most desired victims of warlike Moros and head-hunting pagans, and that the Moro aversion to the Christian is a matter of religious fanaticism. It made no difference to these Mohammedans whether the victim was an American, a Spaniard, or a Filipino. All these bore the mark of the cross. With the savages their head-hunting occupation was a part of their superstition, and the color of the head mattered not.

Mr. Chairman, the problem of governing the Moros and other non-Christian inhabitants of the Philippines is by no means as serious a matter as the question of governing the Indians which the Americans had to face in the early days of this Republic, and if the Christian Filipinos were given an opportunity to take care of their backward brothers they would demonstrate that the task did not even deserve to be termed a problem. In my opinion there is as much ground for the suggestion that the non-Christian Filipinos be placed outside the control of the Philippine Legislature as there would be for the suggestion that the Indians of this country should be beyond the control of Congress. There is more community of interest and race between the Christian and non-Christian Filipinos on the one hand than between the American Indians and the white Americans on the other.

The amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa will retard the final solution of this question. I am decidedly opposed to it, and I should be against the passage of this bill if that amendment were to be adopted.

I have already stated in my main speech on this bill that the plan of representation given to the inhabitants of the non-Christian tribes does not appeal to me; but that I have submitted to that proposal, because, after all, the number of the appointed members who are to represent the non-Christians is so small in comparison with the rest of the legislature that in practice the result will be that the whole of the Philippines will be under the control of the elected representatives of the Filipino people.

In support of the theory that there is a very deep antagonism between the Christian and the non-Christian inhabitants of the Philippines there have been printed, Mr. Chairman, not only in the newspapers, but also in Government publications, alleged speeches made by Moro chiefs on different occasions. I have also read—it was not my good fortune to be present at the time—the speech of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER], informing this House of similar addresses delivered to him during his recent visit in the islands by some important heads of tribes and by prominent dattos among the Moros. It has always been a matter that puzzled me to find all these speeches and addresses as good pieces of literature as the best of our orators upon the floor of this House could present, for it was too difficult for an ordinary intellect like mine to explain how uneducated people, some of them indeed thoroughly uncivilized, could match their oratorical qualities with highly educated men who made it their business to study and practice eloquence.

I wonder if the hand that penned these speeches was a gloved hand? I wonder if the translator of these speeches—for they were translated into English in order that they might be understood by the addressee—was really making a speech of his own? Be that as it may, we have on our side reason and eloquent facts that tell the situation more convincingly than any words, certainly than all these speeches and addresses. To these facts I wish to call the attention of the committee, so that it may learn something besides the old theory regarding the Philippine situation.

The Moro Province is to-day governed by a civil governor. No longer is the Moro constantly pursued by a man with a gun. A new law has been enacted since Gov. Harrison became Governor General of the Philippines for the administration of the affairs in the territory mainly inhabited by the Mohammedans. This change has taken place with the approval of the War Department, and the result demonstrates that the Moro lives peacefully under civil authorities and that the Moros can get along together with Christian Filipinos and can work hand in hand with them for their common welfare. The governor of the Moro Province, it must be said, is one of the ablest and most industrious American officials who ever landed on Philippine soil. If at all possible to govern the Moros through civil agencies, the man who has the qualifications to show its practicability is the man chosen by Gov. Gen. Harrison—Frank W. Carpenter.

Gov. Carpenter has been in full charge of the Department of Mindanao—that is the name given now to the old Moro Province, and it includes the territory in the island of Mindanao inhabited by pagans—for fully 10 months, and during that time there has been no disorder nor have the Moros ever risen in arms against their government. Gov. Carpenter was given definite instructions by the Governor General as to the policies he should pursue in governing the Moro country. He was told to make that country as much a real part of the Philippine Islands as any other Province of the archipelago. That meant that good and friendly relations between the Mohammedan and Christian Filipinos should be fostered and that the Moros should be as early as possible given the same opportunities for education, sanitation, and material development as the inhabitants of other Provinces of the archipelago.

Gov. Carpenter, with that quickness of mind that is his peculiar gift, grasped at once the task he was called upon to discharge, and, with the energy and determination with which he always enters on his undertakings, he saw to it that the instructions of Gov. Harrison were at once put into effect. And so we now have in the Moro Province more schools, more roads, better sanitation, and more cultivated land than there ever was before.

A spectacle doubtless astonishing to men who feel as does the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] is likewise offered—a provincial board administering subprovinces of the department of Mindanao and Jolo and composed of a Filipino as governor, a Mohammedan as third member, and an American as treasurer. How nearly true it is that the Moro hates to have anything to do with the Filipino, how much he dislikes any other government but a strong, purely American-controlled government, we can judge from the address which this Moslem third member delivered on the inauguration of the provincial government—of which he is a member by appointment of Mr. Carpenter. I shall call the attention of the committee to this paragraph of that speech:

> He who thinks that it is impossible for the Moslem and the Filipino to live together in peace and participate together in the government is foolish and lacks wisdom.

We therefore see, Mr. Chairman, a Filipino and a Moro working together in the government of their common province, and this gives us the best evidence that the Moro and the Filipino do like each other and that they can live together not only peacefully but harmoniously.

With regard to the other non-Christian inhabitants of the archipelago I shall have very little to say. Even he who is most pessimistic as to the possibility of placing this people under the Philippine Government admits that in this case the difficulties are less than in the case of the Moros. I say without hesitation that there is no difficulty whatever in having this people governed by Christian Filipinos. Had a different policy been pursued by the former secretary of the interior in the management of the affairs of this people, they would have advanced more than they have thus far, and there would have been to-day a fully established intercommunication between them and the Christian Filipinos. The new secretary of the interior is, thank God, wise enough to see that the old policy was wrong and injurious, and his new policy is to promote the intermingling of these pagans with the Christian Filipinos. He has appointed a delegate whose paramount duty is to bring about this result. Less appropriation for so-called scientific researches and more for the education, sanitation, and means of communication of this people is the watchword of Secretary Winfred T. Denison. In connection with this remark I wish to insert in the RECORD a quotation from an address delivered by Secretary Denison before the Manila City Club, as follows:

To be concrete: Within the last few days the question has come to me whether I would authorize the expenditure of ₱500, more or less, for the photogr..phing of mollusks.

Now, it happens that I have just returned from the Mountain Province where I found a deep necessity and a great demand for school-teachers and no money to provide them. I had this choice: Should I spend ₱500 for photographing these mollusks, or should I spend it for a school-teacher? I could pay the whole share of the Insular Government in another teacher for the cost of these photographs. I am not unaware that the world outside of the Philippines may possibly prefer the photographs of the mollusks to teachers in the Mountain Province, but can there be any doubt in the mind of anyone that my duty is to spend that money for the interest of the Philippines, rather than to further what may be considered the interest of the scientific world at large?

This is a type of the questions which are constantly arising. It is an extreme one, and one that is unusually ridiculous, but nevertheless it serves to make the point.

Every requisition for expenditure involves a choice of the purpose proposed as against all other possible purposes, and it behooves an alien administrator to have a care lest he gives the hobbies of his own nation priority over the interest of the people whose money he is spending.

PEOPLE WITHOUT MEDICAL CARE.

A similar thing happened in the first month I was here. I had been to Palawan, and had found there 40,000 people without a doctor. This gave me a shock which I shall never forget, and which has not been minimized by my having subsequently found the same thing on a still larger scale in the Mountain Province. I had visited the Moros in the southern end of Palawan, and had found them eager for a school-teacher—even grown men petitioning for leave themselves to go to school. I had been to the Culion leper colony, and had received the petitions of those 6 sisters of St. Paul de Chatres who were doing all the nursing for 250 hospital patients and caring for the whole out-patient and dispensary service besides; and they had asked for 2 more nurses and ₱50 a month for extra delicacies for the more desperate among their cases.

With these things in my mind I returned to Manila; and there the very first thing that came to me was an application for leave to spend ₱14,000 for printing the results of ethnological research into the habits of the Bukidnons and other non-Christian tribes, and I said to myself: Is it for the interest of the Filipino people that these manuscripts should be printed at such a cost, rather than that school-teachers and doctors should be sent to Palawan and more help to those weary sisters of St. Paul de Chatres and the lepers in their care?

Is it for the interest of the Filipino people to make such researches and to print their results in order to inform the American people and the outside scientific world about the ways and habits of the Bukidnons, rather than to send school-teachers to teach the Bukidnons the ways of the outside world?

It was urged that these expenses for printing were a mere bagatelle compared with the cost of collecting the information, and that it was a pity to lose the results of these researches for a sum so small when compared with the vast total of cost already incurred in collecting the information.

But for ₱14,000 I could either cover the Mountain Province with school-teachers or cover Palawan with doctors or fill Culion with nurses, while the outside world, if it finds itself in peremptory need of this knowledge, may possibly be able to find the money somewhere except in the pockets of the Filipino people.

Then it was urged that the administrative officers of the Mountain Province, the governor, the lieutenant governors, and all the Americans who have to deal with those people up there, needed these researches to guide them in their work. That might possibly, to my mind, be a justification for the expense, so I set that question aside until I could visit the Province, and then I asked everyone of these officers the question, and I found that not one of them had ever made any practical use of any of these things. "Interesting," they said, "from the point of view of the advancement of the science of the world, but of no actual practical use to the Mountain Province."

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from the Philippine Islands has expired.

Mr. QUEZON. May I have one minute more?

Mr. JONES. I yield one minute more to the gentleman.

Mr. QUEZON. The foregoing statement is very interesting, since it shows—at least by implication—what had been done before Secretary Denison's time, and was then heralded as the greatest thing certain men ever did.

Mr. Chairman, I sincerely hope that the gentleman from Iowa will not press his amendment. The gentleman from Iowa knows that the Philippine Commission has absolute control over the Moro and non-Christian tribes, and that since the appointment by the President of a majority of Filipinos on the commission that the actual fact is that the Moros and other non-Christian inhabitants of the islands are absolutely governed by Christian Filipinos. Were it true that there was a dislike on the part of these Christian Filipinos for the Moros, it would have been plainly shown in the conduct of the present Philippine Commission; yet the fact is that although the revenues of the Philippine Islands have fallen off, and in spite of the absolute necessity for retrenchment, this Filipinized commission has appropriated more money than ever for the pagans, and has given for the department of Mindanao and Sulu ₱225.000; for Agusan, ₱17.000; and for public works of general character to be carried out in these countries, ₱27.225. With these concrete facts I believe the gentleman must be convinced of the lack of foundation for what he heard or read about antagonism between the Christians and non-Christians. [Applause.]

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER].

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I appreciate, of course, that to discuss an important subject like this in five minutes is entirely out of the question. I want to refer to one or two items in the time left to me. The gentleman from the Philippine Islands, who has just spoken, believes all that he has said or he would not have said it. I have that faith in his intellectual honesty. If there was one thing, however, that I found that surprised me more than any other, it was the absolute and complete ignorance of the Christian Filipinos in respect to the non-Christians in the Philippine Islands. While I think the gentleman from the Philippine Islands has stated the situation as he believes it, yet if he had been with me and visited the wild tribes——

Mr. QUEZON. Oh, I have visited them a good many times.

Mr. MILLER. My dear sir, without entering into any controversy about that, as a matter of fact the non-Christian people, whether they ought to or whether they ought not, do look with very great hostility upon the Christian people. There is no question about that at all; it is as plain and straight as that A, B, and C are the first letters of the alphabet. I think that condition is being removed. It is going to be removed, of course; but it exists to-day.

The gentleman from the Philippine Islands said something about the splendid results from establishing the civil government among the Moros. What he said is true. For several years they have been preparing the way to establish a civil government in the Moro territory.

They reached a condition of pacification in the Moro part of the islands such that a civil government was instituted about a year ago, and the man who has been put in charge is one of the very best men to be found for the purpose; but everybody knows this, that it was never dared to put that civil government into existence until after the Governor General publicly, before an assemblage of Moro datos, gathered at Lake Lanao, guaranteed to them that the civil governor would be an American and not a Filipino. I hope we can be correctly understood. That condition exists. It is a vital condition. It is being eradicated. There is no reason why Christian and non-Christian Filipinos should be fighting each other or should hate each other. The present resulting situation comes from previous ages and times of warfare and strife. They have not yet become acquainted with each other. When they do become acquainted with each other and recognize that they are children of the same race there will be a change in their condition, but the change is not now. If anybody should really desire to know just how a great many of the wild people feel there is plenty of literature in which they have expressed themselves. I myself have a great pile of manuscript, testimony taken down verbatim by a Christian Filipino stenographer, showing the ideas and desires of the wild men of the north, of the south, and throughout the islands. There was not a dissenting voice anywhere, from one end of the islands to the other, among those wild people, and while I am in favor of a system of government here that will gradually let the Christian Filipino have complete control over all of the territory, yet, it seems to me, to do so now without considerable restriction would be to permit a grave situation to result. As soon as the Christian Filipinos become better acquainted with the non-Christians and the non-Christians become better acquainted with the Christians, so that they know and understand each other and their purposes are found not to be hostile to each other, then you can have a result making possible the principle of this bill. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa may not meet exactly in every respect my own ideas——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I agree entirely with what has been said by gentlemen on the other side as to the difficulty surrounding this particular subject, but I can not agree that the Moros are as much averse to being governed by the Filipinos as has been stated, or that the Filipinos, having no sympathy for them, would not treat them fairly. On the contrary, Mr. Chairman, I wish to give to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER] a concrete fact which I think will change, or at least ought to change, his opinion upon this subject. It is well known that the revenues of the islands have fallen off to such an extent that retrenchment has become absolutely necessary, and yet the Philippine Commission, now under the control of the Filipinos, there being five Filipinos to four Americans, has increased the appropriations for Agusan, Neuva Vizcaya, and the mountain Provinces, and has granted a subsidy of $112,500 to be used in the Moro Province, now called the Province of Mindanao and Sulu. This was done upon the motion of a Filipino member of the commission. As long as the commission was dominated by Americans no such thing as this ever occurred.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. MILLER. Will the gentleman explain further by saying what he means by the statement that nothing like that was ever done by the American commission?

Mr. JONES. I mean to say that the American commission has never granted a sum like that—a subsidy, as it were—to the Moro Province. The increased appropriations of which I have spoken—oh, the gentleman shakes his head, but it is absolutely true—were made for the wild tribes at the very time that the appropriations for the civilized Provinces were being cut down.

Mr. MILLER. The gentleman must know that heretofore the whole Moro country has been military, and now there is a civil governor.

Mr. JONES. That has absolutely no bearing on the subject whatever. They have a civil governor now instead of a military governor.

Mr. MILLER. Certainly.

Mr. JONES. In other words, the Governor General of the Philippine Islands has selected as the governor of the Moro Province a civilian instead of a military man, as has been the case in the past. The Government itself has not been changed. The facts which I have stated constitute an absolute and irrefutable reply to the charges that have been so frequently made to the effect that the Filipinos, if given control of the Government, would neglect the interests of the wild tribes.

Mr. Chairman, further on in this bill, in the twenty-second section, it is provided:

> There shall be established by the Philippine Legislature a bureau, to be known as the Bureau of Non-Christian Tribes, which said bureau shall be embraced in one of the executive departments to be designated by the Governor General, and shall have general supervision over the public affairs of the inhabitants of the territory represented in the legislature by appointive senators and representatives.

Under this provision the administrative affairs of the non-Christian tribes will be cared for. There is no necessity for the appointment of a commission of three members at a salary of $5,000 each, to be paid by the Filipino people. I repeat, Mr. Chairman, that the provisions of this bill relating to the wild tribes gave the committee a great deal of concern. I, for one, consulted with a great many Americans familiar with affairs in the islands, and one of those was the former Vice Governor General, Mr. Gilbert. He thoroughly indorsed and approved these provisions of the bill, although he did not give his approval to one or two other provisions, particularly the preamble and the requirement of the confirmation by the senate of the appointees of the Governor General. I did not inform Gov. Gilbert as to all the provisions of the bill, and he might not have approved others; but he was outspoken in his approval of the one relating to the appointment of senators and representatives for the Provinces not now represented in the assembly. Gov. Gilbert has returned to the islands, I may add, to make his permanent home there. I have talked with no one familiar with governmental affairs in the Philippines who did not approve this provision save only one member of the supreme court, for whose judgment, I may say, I have great respect. Justice Trent alone of all those consulted by me was of the opinion that the provision contained in the bill was not the wisest solution of this difficult problem.

Mr. Chairman, no one can doubt but that the Governor General will appoint high-minded, experienced, and able men to represent the wild tribes, that he will select the very best men that can be found. Such men will see to it that the interests of the wild men are not neglected. It is proposed to rid the Philippines of the Philippine Commission, which, under American control, became so odious to their people.

Mr. Chairman, I reserve the rest of my time.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, the last statement which the gentleman from Virginia makes upon the floor of this House, that nearly everybody thinks the commission system of governing the non-Christian tribes ought to be abolished, is so absolutely far from the truth, in my judgment, that it is almost ridiculous. Mr. Chairman, it is ungracious always to say anything regarding people derogatory of them, and if the statement which I made had not been challenged on the floor regarding the feeling between the Filipinos and the non-Christian tribes, I should not now read and put into the RECORD this testimony, but I am going to quote from two very good Democratic authorities, one of them the present Secretary of Commerce, Mr. Redfield, and this is what he says:

> It is common knowledge that deep hatred exists between the Igorrotes of the mountains and the Tagalogs of the plains, and that the Moros look with fanatical contempt upon the non-Moslem and physically weak dwellers in the seacoast cities. It did not need the plain statement of the Moro chiefs to Mr. Dickinson, that though they had laid down the bolo at the American command they would take it up again should the American leave, to show that the removal of the strong hand of law from the Moro people would mean a continuance of that riot and bloodshed which has for centuries prevailed where they were free to follow their natural training and habits. But let the Moros speak for themselves.

And remember, gentlemen, this is Secretary Dickinson, a Democrat, who was sent there for the express purpose of making this investigation.

> At a meeting between the Secretary of War and the Moro leader at Jolo, August 24, 1910, the former secretary to the Sultan of Sulu was selected by the Moros to speak for them. He said:
> "We have only a little to say, and that says we are happy to be under the sovereignty of the Americans. There has been some talking about that the Filipinos want to tear themselves off from the Americans and that they want to tear us away, too—tear us away with them. If the Americans should give the Moro country over to the Filipinos they would be responsible to God for the blood that would be shed, because it would be the same thing as if you put two fighting cocks into one bag, for there would be fighting, sure."
>
> On August 23, 1910, a public meeting was held in the theater at Zamboanga, Island of Mindanao. At this meeting Datu Sacaluran said:
>
> "I am an old man. I do not want any more trouble. But if it should come to that—that we should be given over to the Filipinos—I still would fight."
>
> He was followed by another leader, who said:
>
> "I am not a civilized man, but I have learned that slavery, killing, and stealing is a bad thing; we do it no more. But if after that it should be that we shall be given over to another race we had better all be hanged."
>
> The final speaker was Nadji Nungnui, who spoke as follows:
> "The Secretary of War must look the matter in the face. We are a different race; we have a different religion; we are Mohammedans; and if we should be given over to the Filipinos, how much more would they treat us badly when they treated even the Spanish badly who were their own mothers and their own fathers in generation? How did they treat them? Think about it. Think twice. We far prefer to be in the hands of the Americans, who are father and mother to us now, than to be turned over to another people."

And that is the feeling that now exists between the non-Christian tribes and the Filipinos.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. TOWNER. Does that exhaust my time?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman is exhausted.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask how much time I have left?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia has three minutes remaining.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] has challenged the correctness of my statement that the Filipinos would treat the members of the wild tribes fairly if permitted to govern them and has read extracts from a speech delivered by the Secretary of Commerce upon this floor when he was a Member of this body to support his statement that they would not do so. I do not care to comment upon the statements in that speech. Immediately upon its delivery I made a reply to it, as the gentleman knows, or, if not, as he will find upon examining the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. I need not repeat what I then said, but I stand by every word of that speech now.

But, Mr. Chairman, it has been several years since the Secretary of Commerce was in the islands. It has been several years since Secretary of War Dickinson, from whose report he quoted, was in the islands. I have furnished the House with concrete facts that absolutely overthrow and refute everything that has been said by those who hold that the Filipinos would not govern the wild men justly. I have shown that, despite the fact that it was said in the Philippine Islands when the Philippine Commission was Filipinized by President Wilson, it would result in the mistreatment of the wild tribes, the very reverse has been true. So far from those evil predictions materializing, the Filipinization of the commission has resulted in more being done for the wild tribes than had ever before been done for the improvement of their condition, and that at a time when the insular revenues were falling off and retrenchment was the order of the day throughout the civilized Provinces.

This statement the gentleman has not attempted to answer. It is a full and complete answer to the oft-repeated assertion that the Filipinos had no sympathy for the Moros, at least, and therefore ought not to be entrusted with their government.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. All time has expired. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment:

In line 3, on page 13, I move to strike out the words following the word "Islands"—all the remainder of the section.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 13, by striking out, in line 3, all of the section after the word "Islands."

The words stricken out are: "And modify, amend, or repeal any provision of this section."
